THE PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

IN THE SECOND SESSION OF THE FORTY-NINTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND

THIRTY-FOURTH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF HER MAJESTY QUEEN ELIZABETH II

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 75

NINTH VOLUME OF SESSION 1984-85

House of Commons

Monday 11 March 1985

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

ENERGY

Solar Heating

1. Dr. Mawhinney asked the Secretary of State for Energy what preliminary results he has received from the Peterborough Development Corporation's experiment on solar heating of private residences.

The Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. David Hunt): Results from these experiments have been made available to the Polytechnic of Central London, which is using them in work for my Department on computer simulation models relating to buildings.

Dr. Mawhinney: Is my hon. Friend not being unduly coy? Will he confirm that energy savings are about 20 to 30 per cent.? If so, when does the Department intend to make wider use of the scheme in the building of private houses?

Mr. Hunt: The results of the research and development that has been supported by the Department on passive solar design show that certain measures are economically viable now, whereas active solar space heating measures are not economic in the United Kingdom. However, I agree with my hon. Friend that preliminary results are encouraging. Like him, I shall follow with great interest the analysis that is now being carried out.

Coal Industry

2. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the current situation in the coal mining industry.

5. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the current situation in the mining industry.

7. Mr. Douglas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a further statement on the dispute in the mining industry.

8. Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the current situation in the coal mining industry.

12. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a further statement on the coal mining dispute.

13. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the miners' strike.

18. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the miners' strike.

19. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the miners' strike.

The Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Peter Walker): This morning there were full attendances at virtually all collieries. I hope that the industry will get back to normal working very quickly and take advantage of the opportunities available to it.

Mr. Proctor: My right hon. Friend will know that that statement meets with the approval of the House as a whole. Will he confirm that there will be no general amnesty and that the National Coal Board will consider individual cases on their individual merits?

Mr. Walker: Yes, I can confirm that.

Mr. Parry: Will the Secretary of State ask for urgent talks with Mr. MacGregor in support of the case for an amnesty for sacked miners? Surely the NCB is adopting double standards. During the strike, to boost the return-to-work figures, it reinstated striking miners who had been sacked. Is the present stance of the board vindictive and hypocritical?

Mr. Walker: No, Sir. Many of those who were convicted during the strike have returned to work during the past week following the decision for a continuation of work.

Mr. Douglas: Would the Secretary of State care to arrange an urgent examination of the happenings this morning at the Comrie colliery, Fife, where, contrary to what he said, the management, in a vindictive, boneheaded and stupid fashion, locked the men out? These were men who wanted to go to their work. They were locked out [Interruption.] This is no laughing matter. Will the Secretary of State arrange for Mr. MacGregor to come to his office immediately with Mr. Wheeler to explain why Scotland should be excluded from the language that he is using today? Will he do that immediately? If not, will he immediately sack them both?

Mr. Walker: I am informed—I hope accurately—that the men marched from Oakley village to Comrie this morning, held a meeting and returned home.

Mr. Douglas: Nonsense. I was there.

Mr. Walker: There are about 25 NUM members at the pit and about the same number of NACODS members.

Mr. Barron: The Secretary of State talks about full attendance at the Comrie colliery this morning. Why were miners sacked last Monday who had been working in collieries in my constituency for two months before the settlement? The Secretary of State and the Prime Minister praised these men in the House over many months, yet they have been sacked. Why have miners been sacked in the Yorkshire coalfield after being found not guilty in the courts? Why have miners whose cases will not be heard by the courts for perhaps many months been suspended from work with no pay? What type of settlement will the industry end up with? Will it be one that will take it forward? Surely the vindictiveness and victimisation that is now being practised will, more than any strike, help to destroy the industry.

Mr. Walker: I completely disagree with the hon. Gentleman's assessment of the case. Hundreds of men are working today who were convicted of offences during the strike. The hon. Gentleman's portrayal of the scene is wholly inaccurate.

Mr. Hamilton: Has the right hon. Gentleman's attention been drawn to the report in The Guardian this morning about elderly miners who have committed relatively minor offences and been fined small amounts but, nevertheless, have been dismissed by the Coal Board and stand to lose £30,000 or more redundancy pay? If that is the case, how can any hon. Member or any member of the Government defend such injustice? Will the right hon. Gentleman issue a directive to the Coal Board at all levels to give a firm assurance that that will not happen to such men who are possibly being deprived of their rights? The right hon. Gentleman knows my views on the strike. If the Secretary of State, the Government and the Coal Board persist in this victimisation and terrorisation, there will be no end to the trouble in the coal mines.

Mr. Walker: I recognise the hon. Gentleman's views. There is certainly no Coal Board policy to dismiss people because they are elderly and, therefore, possible candidates for substantial compensation. There is no reason why the Coal Board should hold such a view. All the redundancy payments and early retirement provisions are paid out of a separate fund which has nothing to do with the Coal Board. The Coal Board has no financial vested interest whatsoever in those payments.

Obviously, I cannot give the figures for Polmaise, because the people are not at work. Leaving aside Polmaise, and taking Scotland generally, of 900 people convicted during the strike, 181 have been dismissed, not 900, as is sometimes the impression given by certain people. Having carefully examined all of the individual cases, the Coal Board considers that those dismissals are justified.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the tragedy could have been avoided if the NUM had stuck to its rulebook and held a national ballot?

Mr. Walker: My hon. Friend's view has been completely confirmed this week by a certain publication known to be close to Mr. Scargill and his supporters, called the Socialist Worker. A leading article stated:

"In the aftermath of the strike one of the criticisms bound to be levelled at the miners is that the strike was lost because there was no ballot.

But this ignores one central fact. If there had been a ballot there would not have been a strike."

Mr. Knox: Now that this unfortunate dispute is over, will my right hon. Friend confirm that the Government will do everything that they can to bring about a reconciliation in the coal industry, in keeping with true Conservative principles?

Mr. Walker: Yes. It is encouraging that this morning there have been large attendances at virtually all pits. There is no doubt that the majority of miners want to return to normal working. The Government and the Coal Board will do everything that they can to encourage that.

Mr. Foot: Has the Secretary of State had time to study the disgraceful interview yesterday given by Mr. MacGregor to the Sunday Telegraph? Having read that interview, does the right hon. Gentleman agree that Mr. MacGregor is as unfit to run an amnesty as he is to run the coal industry? Does the right hon. Gentleman accept Mr. MacGregor's statement in that interview that the Secretary of State has had nothing whatsoever to do with any of the decisions? Is Mr. MacGregor telling the truth? Would it not be better to send Mr. MacGregor back to America as soon as possible?

Mr. Walker: On the radio programme yesterday Mr. MacGregor made clear the relationship which always prevails between the Government and a nationalised industry. I saw nothing in the Sunday Telegraph article yesterday—about ensuring that no amnesty was given to people who had committed serious crimes—that differed from the view of either the Leader or the Deputy Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Andy Stewart: Will my right hon. Friend assure those miners who chose to go to work before the strike ended that they will be afforded protection? We do not want a repetition of the incidents that we saw on television on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday nights with the Watson family in south Wales. Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that those union members in Yorkshire who chose to go to work before the strike ended and who have not been able to go to work since last Tuesday will be afforded protection? Such behaviour is unacceptable in this country.

Mr. Walker: It is important that proper protection is given to those who under difficult conditions courageously exercised their legal right and freedom to go to work. I find it interesting that those who ask for an amnesty for those who have committed grievous crimes——

Mr. Barron: What about those found not guilty?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Walker: —of violence against others are the same people who argue that no forgiveness should be shown to those who legally went to work during the dispute.

Mr. Mason: How does the Secretary of State react to MacGregor's words over the weekend that people were discovering the price of insubordination and insurrection and, by God, was he going to make it stick?
Does the Secretary of State agree that those are the words of an angry, foolish old man and cannot be a prerequisite to conciliation and negotiation? The Secretary of State should tell him to curb his tongue. Will the right hon. Gentleman now take the lead in encouraging negotiations between both sides, and will he not allow the overtime ban to be a bar to those negotiations? The ban has been running since 17 weeks before the strike, and it should not be a bar to negotiations beginning.

Mr. Walker: Alas, many miners throughout the country are finding that during the dispute appalling damage was done which was completely unjustified on any basis. I am afraid that they have paid a heavy price and are continuing to do so. With regard to the overtime ban, I am surprised that the right hon. Gentleman, with his knowledge of the industry, does not recognise that the industry's best opportunity of recovery from the disaster of the past year is to get back to normal working.

Mr. Skeet: Will my right hon. Friend say how many coal faces have collapsed, what money he is prepared to spend on them and what can be done to think positively and not destructively about the coal dispute?

Mr. Walker: During the dispute 39 working faces have been destroyed. Apart from that, a great deal of machinery has been damaged and a great deal of repair work will have to be done before any form of normal working can be achieved. I am afraid that instead of having, as the industry would have done, £800 million of capital investment last year and a similar amount in the coming year, we now have the problem that substantial capital investment will have to go into restoring the appalling damage that has been done.

Mr. Wallace: By the creation of NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. the Government have accepted, to some extent at least, the need to put new jobs into communities threatened with closure. If and when a closure is threatened, will the Government support, including with financial support, the deferral of any closure until adequate new employment opportunities have been created?

Mr. Walker: If we did, it would be a different policy from that pursued by the Lib-Lab pact when it was in operation.

Mr. Yeo: As the benefits of the Government's resolute handling of the dispute will be felt by the country as a whole and not just by the coal industry's customers, will my right hon. Friend use his best endeavours to ensure that the cost of the dispute isborne by the country as a whole and not by the industry's customers?

Mr. Walker: The cost of the dispute, in all its forms, will be a complicated calculation. It will have effects over several years in both directions. The overall cost is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Hardy: In support of the reconciliation to which the Secretary of State has already favourably referred and which is urgently needed in the industry, will the right hon. Gentleman consider the case of a number of my constituents who have been sacked by the National Coal Board, although their cases have not yet been decided by the courts, and who have been given no opportunity to explain their position or defend themselves? Does he accept that that is an embittering factor at a time when we should see the healing of wounds?

Mr. Walker: I assure the hon. Gentleman that the objective of the National Coal Board is to look at every individual case on its merits. If there are any cases in which that is not being done, the board will be willing to re-examine them very carefully. If any mistake is made, the power of the industrial tribunals in that respect is considerable.

Mr. Patrick McNair-Wilson: In any future discussions on pay, will my right hon. Friend encourage the chairman of the board to spend more money on an improved bonus production scheme—an area in which Mr. Scargill so lamentably failed?

Does my right hon. Friend agree that those who talk about continuing the dispute, and about anarchy and guerrilla warfare, are more concerned to disguise their own failure as leaders of the industry than to help those in the industry who have already suffered enough misery?

Mr. Walker: Yes, I agree with my hon. Friend. There is no doubt that Britain's coal reserves and the skills of its miners and mining engineers are such that, with high productivity, the industry has a good and secure future. In pay agreements and in any other sphere, it is in the industry's interests to ensure that there is maximum encouragement for improved productivity.

Mr. Orme: Will the Secretary of State, having heard the genuine and various points of view put to him this afternoon by Opposition Members, accept that in the present situation the position of the NCB is untenable? Will he also accept that the situation in Scotland is unacceptable? If there had been a negotiated settlement, as in 1972 and 1974, the present difficulties would not have arisen, and the problems could have been resolved without the bitterness that has been engendered in the industry.

Mr. Walker: That is why I regret that the Opposition did not do far more to encourage the ACAS compromise proposals, and far more to move Mr. Scargill from the completely intransigent position that he adopted.

Electricity Industry

3. Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he has plans for reforming the structure of the electricity industry.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Alastair Goodlad): I have no present plans to reform the structure of the electricity industry, though this will be kept under review.

Mr. Eggar: Now that the miners' strike is over, will it not be necessary to think in terms of restructuring the finances of the electricity supply industry? If so, is that notyet another reason to move radically towards privatisation of the industry?

Mr. Goodlad: I know that my hon. Friend has devoted considerable thought to the subject. He will be aware that the Government have already encouraged, by the Energy Act 1983, a more open market in electricity supply by removing the legislative and institutional constraints on private generation and establishing a framework for fair dealing between private generators and the electricity boards.

Mr. Welsh: If the Minister is considering different sources of electricity supply and hoping that there will be an improvement in coal production up to 125 million tonnes per year, surely he must be expecting that more of that coal will be fed to the electricity industry than is at present the case.

Mr. Goodlad: The hon. Gentleman has raised a very interesting point.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Does my hon. Friend recall that, in the last Parliament, the Oil and Gas (Enterprise) Act 1982 provided for the gas distribution system to act as a common carrier for private gas supplies? Will he bear in mind the principle of the common carrier in any thoughts about the denationalisation of the electricity industry?

Mr. Goodlad: Yes.

Mr. Rowlands: The Minister mentioned the Energy Act and applications for the private generation and distribution of electricity. How many applications under that Act has the Department approved?

Mr. Goodlad: Private generation involves considerable substantial investment and long lead times, and it is too soon to judge clearly how the private sector is responding to the Act.

Coal Industry

4. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is his latest estimate of the expected loss on deep-mined operations by the National Coal Board in the current financial year.

Mr. David Hunt: I am not able to estimate the loss on the NCB's deep-mined operations this year until the board has had time to assess fully the damage which the strike has inflicted on the coal industry.

Mr. Wareing: In view of that answer, the Minister no doubt recognises that the loss must be considerable. Can he tell us anything about the difference in the cost of producing a tonne of coal as between the beginning of March 1984 and the beginning of March 1985? What was the level of import substitution?

To ensure that there is a return to proper working in the industry now that the strike is over, after the intransigence of the Government and the immoral acts against the mining communities, should not the Government's first act be to get rid of MacGregor so that he can return to the United States?

Mr. Hunt: The strike has inflicted substantial damage on the industry, and let no one in the House underestimate the extent of that damage. The president of the National Union of Mineworkers talks of the fight continuing, but it must be the view in all parts of the House that the only fight that now matters is to rebuild the industry, which has been shattered by Scargill's strike.

Mr. Rost: When planning the reconstruction of the industry, will the Government consider that miners should have the same advantages as are enjoyed by employees who have been liberated from state ownership in other industries, in companies such as National Freight, Jaguar, British Telecom and British Aerospace? In those companies many of the employees own shares and participate in the profitability and better industrial relations in their companies.

Mr. Hunt: My hon. Friend raises a very important point, which I shall take up with the chairman. But let the House understand that there are no plans for privatisation. What matters for this industry is now a period of consolidation to recover from this damaging dispute.

Mr. Allan Rogers: Will the Minister consider the industry's projected loss over the past year and hope that it will improve? Will he look at specific instances such as a miner from my constituency who was convicted for having in his possession a plastic bag full of coal worth £1·32—far less than most people in the city of London take home by way of pens, blotting paper and so on? In that instance, the miner lost all his seniority and his privileges. Further, so that there will be some harmony in the coal industry, will the hon. Gentleman start wiping the blood off the teeth of his neo-Fascist friends behind him?

Mr. Hunt: I hope the House fully recognises that it has been said repeatedly from the Conservative Benches that there must be no talk of victory or defeat. All that matters is the success of this very great industry.

Mr. Hanley: Since Mr. Arthur Scargill has repeatedly asserted that we in Britain enjoy the cheapest deep-mined coal in the world, will my hon. Friend either confirm or deny that statistic, as it seems to be both a vital plank of NUM policy and a test of Mr. Scargill's own veracity?

Mr. Hunt: The statement is, of course, incorrect. It is one further example of the festering falsehoods used by the president of the NUM to perpetuate this pointless political strike.

Mr. Redmond: Does the Minister agree that when the NCB breaks the law—that is, the Mines and Quarries Act 1954—on the appointment by the NUM of section 123 inspectors, he will prosecute and sack the officials responsible, or does he have dual standards?

Mr. Hunt: That is not so. It is up to the hon. Gentleman to give further details of that particular instance if he believes that there are grounds for action. I should have thought that it was for everyone in the House to recover the ground that has been lost as a result of the dispute. I would have hoped that the Opposition would start condemning the irresponsible talk of guerrilla action in the pits, which can only destroy the industry.

Mr. Franks: Does the Minister accept that the real issue over the past 12 months has not been about pit closures, union rules or amnesties, but about the right way and the wrong way to run a modern industry, and about the right of management to manage? Does my hon. Friend further accept that the only way to run a successful industry, whatever it may be, is to expose it to the full blast of competition? Does he accept that at the end of the day it is the consumer who keeps the industry in business, and not a Government ladling out money ad nauseam? Finally, does my hon. Friend accept that the only way to run a modern mining industry is to privatise it?

Mr. Hunt: No, but I agree with my hon. Friend that if the coal industry can bring its costs under control and become financially viable once again, it has a very bright future, capable of offering secure and well-paid jobs to those who work in it.

Mr. Meadowcroft: How far does the "bright future" of the industry depend on concentrating on those pits where coal can be produced most cheaply? Given the effect of the changes in exchange rates, does the hon. Gentleman foresee the possibility of selling more coal and creating more jobs in the industry?

Mr. Hunt: If the heavy burden of uneconomic coal can be lifted from the industry's back, the future should be very bright indeed.

Mr. Orme: Is the Minister aware that getting rid of the so-called "guerrilla activity" in the pits means getting a negotiated agreement? This morning I met representatives of both NACODS and the NUM, and NACODS gave me a copy of its letter of 6 March to Mr. Spanton asking for a meeting on the modified colliery review procedure and calling for all parties to attend. Does the Minister agree that that meeting should go ahead?

Mr. Hunt: The Government have always wanted a negotiated settlement. It was a great tragedy for the future of the industry that the right hon. Gentleman did not support the TUC initiative in presenting the document that it obtained from the NCB as the best possible offer. That offer is still open to the NUM.

Coal Prices

10. Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Energy what has been the effect of the recent fall in the exchange rate on the international competiveness of coal mined in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Walker: This is essentially a matter for the NCB. Depreciation of sterling against the dollar should increase pithead returns on coal exports, but the benefits of this to the NCB will be small in relation to the board's losses on deep-mined production.

Mr. Foulkes Despite that convoluted answer, will the Secretary of State concede that on the central question of the economics of the pits the slump in the value of the pound has changed matters considerably and the change in NCB accounting procedures could change the economics of pits overnight? Will he give an assurance that imports of coal and oil will be curbed immediately and admit that due to the slump in the value of the pound there is now no need to close any pit in the foreseeable future?

Mr. Walker: When the exchange rate of the pound was £2·40 I doubt whether the hon. Gentleman was as vocal to the effect that, according to his calculations, that meant that all pits should be closed.

Mr. Skinner: Will the Minister confirm that before the strike the cost of deep-mined coal, averaged over all the areas, was £38 per tonne, but that since the value of the pound has fallen against many other currencies, not just the dollar, the spot price for coal on the Rotterdam market is now about 50 per cent. higher? Will he also confirm that the Common Market imports 62 million tonnes of coal from third countries? Does that not provide a great opportunity for us to take up some of that and thus have a demand of 125 million tonnes, as suggested by someone very close to the right hon. Gentleman on the box the other night?

Mr. Walker: If the hon. Gentleman is right and the changes in the exchange rate mean that British coal can now compete with imports, we should be happy to allow that to happen. I believe, however, that the hon. Gentleman wishes to stop all imports of coal. If his argument is correct, there should be no need to do that. I think he will find, however, that the changes in the exchange rate will not make all that much difference.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: Does my right hon. Friend agree that any improvement in the prospects for coal as a result of recent changes in exchange rates are almost certainly counteracted by the loss in expectations of reliability in the supply of coal to clients as a result of Scargill's absurd strike and that it is thus unlikely that prospects for coal will be improved until the NUM is under the presidency of someone who has the good of the industry more in mind than has the present incumbent of that office?

Mr. Walker: It is certain that in the past year the cost of coal production has been far above what is likely to be the average market price, and the same is likely to be true this year.

Mr. Ryman: Will the Secretary of State investigate the "Alice in Wonderland" economics perpetrated by the NCB in Northumberland? Eighteen months ago the NCB invested £2 million in the purchase of new pit props for Bates's pit, while a year later, before the strike began, the NCB contemplated closing the seam for which the pit props had been purchased and thereby making 800 men redundant. Were those not absurd conditions for the investment of money in the industry? Does it not give the lie to the Government's persistent argument that uneconomic pits must close, when the NCB invests money on such a basis?

Mr. Walker: There are plenty of economic pits and good coal faces to invest in, and it is a pity that during the past year £800 million of capital investment has been adversely affected.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Does the Secretary of State agree that it will be impossible for the NCB to become internationally competitive if it has to bear the whole financial burden of the dispute? Will the Secretary of State tell us that that will not be the case? When will he be able to present us with plans for the financial reconstruction of the NCB?

Mr. Walker: The future financial reorganisation of the industry is a matter that the Government will have to consider, as both Labour and Conservative Governments always have considered it. However, the industry will have scope to do well in the future only if it takes full advantage of the capital investment that has taken place and will take place, and if it has very high productivity levels.

Mr. Benn: When the right hon. Gentleman precipitated the last miners' strike in 1974, the Central Electricity Generating Board bought a large amount of coal from Australia. When the coal was delivered it proved to be so much more expensive than British coal that it was sold at a loss to Electricité de France. Is it not a fact that, now that British coal costs half as much in foreign currency as it did when the exchange rate was £2·40 to the dollar, and foreign energy imports cost twice as much, the economic arguments on which the strike was precipitated have proved to be entirely false?

Mr. Walker: If we are talking about entirely false statements, the last time that the right hon. Gentleman mentioned my role in the 1974 strike was on 7 June 1984, when he said:

"I believe that the leadership of Arthur Scargill and the NUM executive has been brilliant throughout the dispute. The Secretary of State . . . lost his job as Secretary of State for Trade and Industry by mishandling the miners and he will lose his job again".—[Official Report, 7 June 1984; Vol. 61, c. 483.]

That was because he believed that the NUM would again succeed.

Coal Stocks

11. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the current level of coal stocks held at power stations and by the National Coal Board.

Mr. David Hunt: The latest published figures are for the end of December. They show stocks held at power stations in Great Britain of 14·402 million tonnes and stocks held by the National Coal Board of 20·753 million tonnes.

Mr. Hardy: Would the Minister care to offer an estimate now, or publish one later, of the improvement in the value of those stocks as a result of the change in the value of our currency? Should not that change in value suggest restraint to those who are currently lusting for extensive colliery closures, and should not one factor in encouraging reconciliation be the need to make sure that the industry takes advantage of the opportunity presented by changing values?

Mr. Hunt: I agree about the need for reconciliation, but I disagree with most of what the hon. Gentleman says. The existence of those stocks shows that the full demand for electricity was met during the dispute. The nation should be grateful to those who fought to keep industry at work and to keep the home fires burning.

Mrs. Currie: Will my hon. Friend join me in recognising not only the hard work of the power station workers in keeping the power stations going throughout the dispute, but their incredible skill? Will he say that, as far as possible, the coal-fired power stations in the Trent Valley will continue to operate, and that their life will not be shortened by the technical extremities to which they have been pushed during the dispute?

Mr. Hunt: The CEGB coped admirably with a major disruption to its fuel supplies. As long as we can lift the heavy burden of uneconomic coal capacity off the industry, coal can be extremely competitive.

Mr. Allen McKay: Does the Minister know whether any of the coal stocks include coking coal? If so, why are we importing American coking coal to South Wales and why is there not more investment in coking coal, so that we do not have to import it?

Mr. Hunt: The CEGB has not imported any foreign coal during the strike. I shall look into the hon. Gentleman's question about coking coal.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Will my hon. Friend consider the stocks produced by Leicestershire coalfields and join me in congratulating Leicester NUM, especially its leader Jack Jones, on working throughout the strike and producing mammoth amounts of coal?

Mr. Hunt: I join in those congratulations. Nobody could overestimate the tremendous courage, bravery and determination shown by the working miners throughout the strike.

Mr. Eadie: Does the Minister realise that coal stocks and coal production are bound to be jeopardised if the Government Front Bench are telling us that they do not want to do anything about victimisation in spite of the fact that they know what is happening in Scotland? They do not want to do anything about getting talks started between the mining unions, including the NUM, because of the argument of the overtime ban. Yet talks took place in 1972, 1974, 1981 and even 1984, when there was an overtime ban. Are the Government telling us that there will be no talks and that they even want to sabotage the ACAS/NACODS agreement?

Mr. Hunt: I shall not begin to answer all of the nonsenses put forward by the hon. Gentleman, except to recognise that I know that he cares about this great industry. I just wish that he would use his influence on Mr. Scargill.

Electricity Generation

15. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Energy what percentage of public electricity supply has been generated by oil-fired power stations during the duration of the miners' strike.

Mr. Goodlad: On a fuel used basis, 44 per cent. of the electricity produced by the United Kingdom public supply system in the period April to December 1984 was derived from oil.

Mr. Colvin: Will my hon. Friend use this opportunity to pay tribute to the workers at oil-fired power stations, who stepped up production substantially during the miners' strike to maintain supplies? Is my hon. Friend aware that the strike included a period when demand in Britain reached an all-time peak?

Mr. Goodlad: I gladly join my hon. Friend in those congratulations. The CEGB coped admirably with the difficulties.

Pressurised Water Reactors

16. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Energy what plans Her Majesty's Government have for further construction of pressurised water reactors in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Goodlad: The decision by my right hon. Friend on the construction of a PWR at Sizewell depends on the outcome of the public inquiry.

Mrs. Clwyd: What percentage of total investment in manufacturing industry do the Government's plans for the expansion of nuclear generation of electricity represent?

Mr. Goodlad: Plans for future power stations, whether PWR or other types, must await my right hon. Friend's decision on Sizewell, which I cannot anticipate.

Electricity Generation

17. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give the percentage of electricity generated by the Central Electricity Generating Board from coal on a fuel used basis for the last month for which figures are available and the comparative figure for the same month a year previously.

Mr. Goodlad: The latest published statistics are for the month of December. They show that, on a fuel used basis, 36 per cent. of the electricity produced by the Central Electricity Generating Board in December was derived from coal compared to 82 per cent. in December 1983.

Mr. Pike: I thank the Minister for those figures. Will he assure everybody that the cost of additional generation for electricity from oil will not be passed on to consumers, and that the Government will not blame the miners and pass any burden from the CEGB to the consumers? Will the Government accept their responsibility and bear the additional cost?

Mr. Goodlad: I note the hon. Gentleman's view. As he will be aware, no decision on how the extra costs will be met has yet been taken.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Telephones

32. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Lord Privy Seal when he expects the report of the Services Committee on new telephone equipment for hon. Members to be published.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): The Committee's resolution on the choice of new telephone handsets appears in the minutes of the Committee's proceedings on 30 January 1985, which were published on 14 February.

Mr. Howarth: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that new telephones, comparable with those available to modern industry, will be made available to hon. Members and that they will include features such as loudspeaker and redialling facilities? Perhaps my right hon. Friend will also let us know whether they will be untappable.

Mr. Biffen: I understand that the answer to all of those questions is yes.

Dr. M. S. Miller: Will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that, when new telephones are installed, hon. Members and the public will get as good reception from those telephones which are not bugged as from those which are?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman is a bit pushed if he is trying to get Tuesday's speech into this modest Question Time. I am sure that the answer must be yes.

Mr. Proctor: Will my right hon. Friend ensure that the new telephone equipment is not necessarily purchased from British Telecom, but that it comes from the cheapest supplier?

Mr. Biffen: The Committee decided to purchase Facilityphone, which is a BT product.

Mr. Foulkes: I do not oppose the introduction of these modern telephones, but does the right hon. Gentleman agree that it is ironic that we and, even more importantly, our staff, will use the telephones in unhygienic, often ill-lit and unventilated rabbit hutches?

Mr. Biffen: And still in droves they come to try to work here.

Secret Ballots

33. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will refer to the Select Committee on Procedure the possibility of initiating an experiment in the use of secret ballots in the voting procedures of the House.

Mr. Biffen: No, Sir.

Mr. Hamilton: That is a very disappointing reply. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this would be a much more exciting place if we had some secret ballots, as Divisions would be much less predictable? Is he aware that there is now a reign of terror on the Tory side of the House, operated by the Whips' Office? Is he further aware that at least 100 Conservative Members are straining at the leash to express their deep disquiet at the Government's policies? Why do he and the Government urge the NUM and other unions to have secret ballots when we seem to be frightened of them here?

Mr. Biffen: As ever, I am touched by news of the effective tyranny of the Whips' Office, and I now realise that my daily Fleet street diet of Tory dissent and rebellion is entirely an illusion fostered by the masters of Fleet street——

Mr. Rogers: "Reading."

Mr. Biffen: I am not reading at all; this is absolutely from the heart. The hon. Gentleman might to wish draw certain facile comparisons with secret ballots outside this House, but for generations we have proudly proclaimed that we vote openly, on the basis of accountability to our electorates. To do what the hon. Gentleman wishes would simply be to reverse centuries of history.

Mr. Greenway: Would not secret voting within the House lessen accountability to our electorate, as my right hon. Friend has said, thereby diminishing democracy in the mother of Parliaments?

Mr. Biffen: Absolutely. As there is already mass puzzlement in this place about why the vote does not follow the voice, how much more would speculation be fanned if we adopted the suggestion of the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton).

Mr. Skinner: Is the Leader of the House aware that on this occasion I agree with his healthy attitude to representative democracy? I very much favour this House continuing what I call the British Leyland voting system, with one lot going to one side of the field, known as the Lobby; the other lot going to the other corner of the field, known as the Lobby; and with shop stewards, known as the Whips, herding people in. At the end of the day everyone is accountable for what he does. Long may it continue. Let us try to extend the system wherever we can, including within the trade unions, and let us throw out the Bills which the right hon. Gentleman has stupidly supported during the past two or three years.

Mr. Biffen: I am so glad to have that warm endorsement from the hon. Gentleman. I would only say that us grammar school boys must stick together.

Mr. Forth: Would my right hon. Friend be prepared to reconsider this matter on humanitarian grounds, as perhaps the only effective method of protecting Opposition Members from their general management committees would be to have some secret ballots in this House?

Mr. Biffen: But general management committees are such that nothing can save hon. Members from them.

Mr. Rogers: Given the right hon. Gentleman's grave concern for public accountability, will he suggest that his hon. Friends give up all their part-time jobs and start doing their jobs as Members of Parliament full time?

Mr. Biffen: I would gladly take issue with the hon. Gentleman on that point, but it goes very much wider than the original question.

Sittings of the House

34. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Lord Privy Seal what is the average time at which the House rose on Mondays to Thursdays in this Session to date; and how this compares with the corresponding average of the last five Sessions.

Mr. Biffen: The average time of rising on Mondays to Thursdays during the last five Sessions was 12.17 am. The corresponding figure for this Session so far is 12.55 am. Coincidentally, however, if one discounts the time taken by proceedings on the Water (Fluoridation) Bill, this Session's figure would be 12.17 am: exactly the same as in previous years.

Mr. Bruinvels: My right hon. Friend will excuse me because I took part in the water fluoridation debate. However, does he agree that it is a poor state of affairs that the House should have to sit so late? Does he agree also that perhaps we are legislating too much and are perhaps being distracted by European Community documentation? Could it be that the timetable needs to be readjusted?

Mr. Biffen: I have sympathy with my hon. Friend's point, but votes in the Council of Ministers are effectively binding on this country, and I am sure that he would not wish those votes to be cast without this House having had a chance to express an opinion.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Is not the point of the matter that long sittings are ineffective? Whatever side one takes, long sittings make no difference in the end to the outcome of the debate. Furthermore, is it not a fact that they spoil the following day's business, and prevent hon. Members planning in which debates they will take part and members of the public coming to hear them?

Mr. Biffen: I seriously counsel the hon. Gentleman not to disparage the role of the House in influencing legislation, both through its voices and votes as legislation proceeds through the various stages, and the use of time to secure that end.

CIVIL SERVICE

Code of Confidentiality

35. Sir David Price asked the Minister for the Civil Service whether he will open discussions with the Civil Service unions to establish a basic code of confidentiality governing relations between Ministers and officials.

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mr. Barney Hayhoe): This aspect of relations between Ministers and civil servants was dealt with in the recent note on the duties and responsibilities of civil servants, issued by the head of the Home Civil Service on 26 February. I understand that he has agreed to meet the Civil Service unions for a discussion.

Sir David Price: Will my hon. Friend take the earliest opportunity to impress upon the Civil Service unions the fact that the maintenance of confidentiality of Government information and discussion is a key to the implicit social contract between a permanent civil servant and the political Ministers of the day of whatever party? In other words, if civil servants want permanent jobs, they must respect the confidentiality of the Government of the day and not seek the privilege of leaking to the press aspects of that Government's policy which they do not like.

Mr. Hayhoe: I certainly endorse my hon. Friend's comments.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: When a civil servant witnesses the deliberate deception of Parliament for whatever purpose, what should he do about it? Should not that be embodied in a code of confidentiality?

Mr. Hayhoe: I presume that the hon. Gentleman is talking of largely hypothetical circumstances. Where a conflict exists in the mind of a civil servant, the note to which I have referred gives guidance on the action that he or she should take.

Mr. Latham: Will my hon. Friend confirm that unless we get this matter right and the Cabinet Secretary's minute is taken seriously in future, there will be growing pressure for what many of us would regard as an unwelcome development, that is, for Ministers to have European-style cabinet offices around them, filled by political appointments?

Mr. Hayhoe: It is important that the whole of the Civil Service should take due note of the restatement of what has been the practice for many decades. I agree with my hon. Friend that it would be a grave mistake to move towards a political Civil Service.

Mr. Foot: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it would have been wiser for the consultations with the unions to have taken place before the document was issued? Since that was not done and the proper procedures were infringed, will he guarantee that if the trade unions wish to make representations about altering parts of the document the Government will be prepared to consider it?

Mr. Hayhoe: I have already made it clear in my initial answer that the head of the Home Civil Service, Sir Robert Armstrong, has agreed to meet the Council of Civil Service Unions on that matter. Obviously, if the council wishes to see me or another relevant Minister that can be arranged.

Mr. Soley: Is it not right in principle that civil servants should be protected from instructions that may lead them to deceive the House? If they were not so protected, would they not be guilty of subversion in the sense of trying to overthrow the properly elected representatives? Cannot the Minister see the dangers and the trap that he sets himself if he does not give civil servants protection?

Mr. Hayhoe: If the hon. Gentleman were to read carefully the note that Sir Robert Armstrong circulated, he would find that that dilemma should not arise.

Unions (Meetings)

36. Mr. Parry asked the Minister for the Civil Service when he last met the Civil Service unions; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 18 February about my last meeting with the Civil Service unions on 4 December 1984. My right hon. and noble Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster met representatives of the Society of Civil and Public Servants on 25 February to hear their views on the extension of unified grading in the Civil Service.

Mr. Parry: I thank the Minister for that reply. The next time he meets the Civil Service unions, will he discuss with them the reluctance of some civil servants regarding transfers to areas such as Merseyside, which has high unemployment? I refer him specifically to members of the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate, who oppose transfer to Bootle.

Mr. Hayhoe: I note what the hon. Gentleman says, and I shall refer his remarks to the Minister responsible for those civil servants.

Mr. Jessel: Will my hon. Friend invite the Civil Service unions to discuss the working environment of civil servants near Heathrow airport and how their efficiency and conditions might be affected by the construction of a fifth terminal?

Mr. Hayhoe: As the Member for a constituency which neighbours that of my hon. Friend, I can only admire his ingenuity in raising this point. I acknowledge that there is considerable local concern among civil servants and others about possible changes in their working and living environments should a fifth terminal be constructed.

Merit Pay

37. Mr. Eggar asked the Minister for the Civil Service if he will make a statement on progress introducing merit pay within the Civil Service.

Mr. Hayhoe: As I told the House on 5 December, a scheme for performance bonuses is being introduced for an experimental period of three years. The necessary arrangements are now being made.

Mr. Eggar: Has my hon. Friend noted reports about the slowness of the introduction of merit pay? Is he not worried about the number of high-fliers who are leaving all Departments in Whitehall? Does he believe that morale would be improved if he moved speedily towards introducing merit pay and linking it with a more fluid promotion system?

Mr. Hayhoe: The scheme is planned to start in April, which means that payments will not be made until much later in the financial year 1985-86. I assure my hon. Friend that there is no dragging of feet on this issue. On the wider questions that he raised about early leavers and promotion prospects, our proposals for merit pay will assist in retaining the services of some who might otherwise leave.

Dr. McDonald: Is the Minister aware that the Civil Service has been characterised by openness about pay and promotion? Will he confirm that the merit awards will be given to unnamed individuals? If so, will he explain what possible justification there is for secrecy over such merit awards?

Mr. Hayhoe: Individual payments will not be published, but the criteria by which Departments will decide upon those payments are being discussed with the Council of Civil Service Unions, and I want them to be published

Mrs. Kellet-Bowman: Has my hon. Friend had the benefit of studying the way in which merit awards work in Canada, where they prevented the early leaving of high-fliers and gave much job satisfaction to civil servants?

Mr. Hayhoe: I was not aware of the circumstances to which my hon. Friend refers, but I am delighted to have her assurance that this will be a helpful scheme with regard to the early leaver problem.

Questions to Ministers

3.31 pm

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will have heard, in answer to a supplementary question put by me, the Secretary of State for Energy making a statement about the happenings today at Comrie colliery in Fife. He said, if I have got it right——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not persist in that line, because that is not a question that I can answer. I cannot answer for the Secretary of State.

Mr. Douglas: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is my constituency, and in my humble view the Secretary of State——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows very well that I cannot deal with questions that emanate from answers that he may have received. It is not a point of order for me by any stretch of the imagination. There are numerous other ways in which the hon. Gentleman can pursue matters such as this. I cannot allow him——

Mr. Douglas rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is an important Opposition day debate to follow this, in which a large number of Labour Members wish to speak. The hon. Gentleman is only taking time from them.

Mr. Douglas rose——

Mr. Speaker: Unless this is a point or order that I can answer, I am not prepared to allow it.

Mr. Douglas: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. What do hon. Members do when, to their own knowledge, the Secretary of State is lying?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must ask the hon. Gentleman to withdraw that.

Mr. Douglas: I will put it another way. What if the House——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not want it put another way. The hon. Member must withdraw the word and then put his point of order in another way.

Mr. Douglas: I withdraw the word "lying". When the Secretary of State——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is very experienced. Will he please withdraw the word "lying" —[HON. MEMBERS: "He did".]—and then rephrase his question?

Mr. Douglas: With respect, Mr. Speaker, I have withdrawn the word "lying". What do hon. Members do when the Secretary of State mendaciously deceives the House, when hon. Members have it in their knowledge what happened? What do we do when the Secretary of State tells the House something that is completely untrue, on the basis of information that he could get only from the NCB in Scotland? If we know that that is the quality of information that he is accepting, he should sack the director in Scotland.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Did I hear that word again? Did I hear the hon. Gentleman say that the Secretary of State was lying?

Mr. Douglas: Yes. I apologise to you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I want the word withdrawn, please. We cannot have it.

Mr. Douglas: I apologise and withdraw the word, but something has to be done about the quality of information that the Secretary of State accepts.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows that there are numerous ways in which matters of this kind can be raised. I understand his strong feeling, but there are many ways in which he can raise these matters.

National Health Service (Charges)

3.33 pm

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. Norman Fowler): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall make a statement on charges to be applied within the Health Service in the coming year.

In the next financial year the Health Service plans to spend an extra £800 million, bringing total spending up to some £17½ billion. That is an increase of over 20 per cent. in real terms since this Government came to power. In England alone the Health Service will be spending an extra £670 million next year. The great bulk of that extra spending will be paid for from taxation and national insurance, but, as the Government's detailed spending plans made clear, the Government believe that there should be some increase in the contribution from direct charges.

From prescription charges we are seeking an extra £19 million of income to help offset the cost of the drugs bill, which now stands at £1½ billion a year. Because of the exemptions policy, almost three-quarters of prescriptions are dispensed free of charge. This means that the retired, those on low incomes including those on supplementary benefit and family income supplement, children, expectant and nursing mothers and people suffering from certain conditions do not pay any charges. In addition, more than one in five of the prescriptions which are paid for are covered by prepayment certificates. It has been suggested recently that we should narrow the range of exemptions rather than seek other ways of reducing the drugs bill. The Government believe that it is right to protect those in need from the impact of charges, and we do not, therefore, intend to make any change in the categories which are exempt from prescription charges. However, we believe that those who can afford it should make a larger contribution. We have therefore decided to raise the basic prescription charge to £2. Even so, the charge will cover well under half the cost of the average prescription, which is now about £4·50.

There will also be equivalent increases in the cost of the prepayment certificates.

For dental treatment, there are again wide exemptions from charges. The existing range of exemptions—for children, those on low incomes and expectant and nursing mothers—will continue. These exemptions account for almost one half of all chargeable courses of treatment. Dental examinations will continue to be free of charge for all. The charges for specific treatments—crowns, inlays, bridges and dentures—will increase by between 6 and 10 per cent. The maximum charge for any single course of treatment will increase by just 4½ per cent. We have decided to change the structure of charges for routine treatment such as fillings and extractions and to relate the charge more closely to the cost of treatment. In future, patients will pay the full cost of routine treatment up to a maximum of £17—rather than £14·50 as at present—but they will also pay two-fifths of any cost above that level.

In the hospital service, we intend to increase the charges for private patients and overseas visitors so that the charges meet the full cost of the services provided, including all overheads, some of which have not been fully allowed for in the past. This will mean an average increase of just over 14 per cent., although there will be variations for different types of charge and hospital. These charges will now make a total contribution of more than £60 million a year to health authorities' budgets.

I am today laying the necessary regulations before the House so that these changes will come into effect at the beginning of April. My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Northern Ireland will be taking the equivalent steps. A note providing full details of the changes is available in the Vote Office.

The result will be that the Health Service remains predominantly funded by general taxation — which accounts for some 86 per cent. of expenditure. A further 11 per cent. is derived from national insurance contributions. After the changes that I have announced today, charges will account for only some 3·2 per cent. of total Health Service spending.

The net effect of the changes that the Government are making to all health charges this April will be to increase total income from charges by some £40 million next year. This will be a contribution towards the extra £670 million of health service spending that we are planning for next year. If we want to see more resources going to the health service, charges must make a contribution to that growth, provided that exemptions policy protects those who cannot afford to pay.

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): Is the Secretary of State aware that his announcement of a tenfold increase in prescription charges since 1979, like the trebling of unemployment, is the hallmark of the disaster of six years of Thatcherite Government? On 25 April 1979 the present Prime Minister, then Leader of the Opposition, said:

"We have no intention of increasing prescription charges."

After this series of huge prescription charge increases every year since 1979, the Secretary of State should apologise for the deceitful and weasel words of the Prime Minister six years ago.

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this latest huge increase, at five times the current rate of inflation, is paralleled by an equally big reduction in the tax component of NHS funding since 1979, so that under the Conservatives the sick are having to pay more for their medicines to pave the way for even bigger tax handouts to the rich in budget after Tory budget?

How does the Secretary of State justify this deliberate financial penalty on the sick, five times greater than is warranted by inflation, when the great majority of drugs prescribed have not shown excessive cost increases and when some have actually become cheaper per unit to the NHS since the mid-1970s? How can the right hon. Gentleman justify imposing a charge of £2 per item when the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State stated in a written answer in November last that nearly 41 per cent. of prescriptions written by GPs

"had a net ingredient cost of less than £1·50." — [Official Report, 16 November 1984; Vol. 67, c. 386.]

Is it not a fact that many people will in future be paying more for their prescription than the cost to the NHS? Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that that will apply to no fewer than 170 million prescriptions dispensed in the coming year? Will he acknowledge that a substantial number of those who will be paying over and above the market cost of the drugs that they receive will be in non-exempt, low income households, and only slightly above the supplementary benefit poverty line?

[Mr. Michael Meacher]

As for the increase in dental charges, is the Secretary of State aware that the maximum charges—which are what more than 90 per cent. of people have to pay when they go to the dentist—have now reached a level at which the principle of a general dental service readily available to all in need is in real danger of collapsing? Does he realise that the damage inflicted by these further huge price increases will be most severe among the worst off and worst educated, who already have the poorest dental health?

The one innovation in the right hon. Gentleman's statement — the two-tier structure of dental charges which he is now proposing—will be administratively more costly and more difficult to operate. A similar scheme introduced in 1971 had to be abandoned in 1976 because of administrative complexity.

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, instead of charging ordinary people who are sick £2 for a prescription, he could raise the extra £40 million revenue, and more, he says he needs by stopping the haemorrhage of funds from the NHS as a result of the widespread abuses of private medicine, as revealed by his audit reports? If he will not do that—because the Government are too soft on private medicine — he could make the necessary savings out of the swingeing tax cuts to the rich which the Chancellor is no doubt planning to hand out yet again in a week's time.

These huge increases in prescription and other charges for the sixth year running under Tory rule are unjust, and discriminatory, and represent a vicious attack on some of the poorest and most vulnerable people in society. Even at this stage we call on the Government to withdraw them.

Mr. Fowler: The hon. Gentleman really must make up his mind about what he wants. Does he want more resources for the National Health Service, or does he want cuts in the service? That is what the question comes down to. If he wants more resources for the service, they must be found and paid for, and the only options are tax, national insurance or charges. Tax and national insurance are already providing 97 per cent. of the cost of the NHS. It is totally hypocritical for the hon. Gentleman to call for more spending on health but to condemn every means of raising the money.

When the right hon. Gentleman talks about the impact on the public, he must recognise that almost three quarters of prescriptions are prescribed free. Almost half of dental courses are free. The hon. Gentleman referred to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and quoted what she had said at the general election. My right hon. Friend said that it was important that exemptions remain. The exemptions will remain. He referred also to the proportion of NHS costs that are raised by prescription charges. Charges now raise 3·2 per cent. of NHS costs, compared with 3·5 per cent. during 1969-1970 when the previous Labour Government were in power.

It is ludicrous that the hon. Member should talk as he does about dental services. About 70 per cent. of the cost of the service is provided by the taxpayer and only 30 per cent. from charges. He commented about private patients, but he knows that I sent in the statutory auditors to examine the raising of income. I am determined to raise income and ensure that there is no abuse. However, the hon. Gentleman would abolish pay beds and, with that, £60 million of income for the Health Service.

Mrs. Jill Knight (Birmingham, Edgbaston): Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind that it is not altogether satisfactory for Members to read in the weekend press that a statement is to be made the following Monday? I ask my right hon. Friend to stress, and stress again, that the poorest and most needy are protected all the way along the line and that even those who are neither poor nor needy will still pay only £2 for a prescription which is worth £4·50, which is a bargain in anyone's language. The true danger and threat to the Health Service will be posed by a Government who will not allow it to be financially viable.

Mr. Fowler: I agree with everything that my hon. Friend has said. About 72 per cent. do not pay prescription charges, and another 6 per cent. have prepayment certificates. That means that only about 20 per cent. pay full prescription charges. About half of dental courses are provided free. The exemption policy——

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): Come to my surgery.

Mr. Fowler: The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition is commenting from a sedentary position. I am describing a policy which has been pursued by previous Labour Governments as well as by this Government. If he does not know that, he knows even less than we thought he did.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): Why has the Secretary of State chosen this time to introduce a substantial increase in charges when he aims by an order to be laid next Monday, to increase income by £75 million by means of the limited list proposals? Does he realise that many pharmacists are being asked regularly by clients which of the prescribed items is the most important because they cannot afford to pay for them all?

Mr. Fowler: In 1985-86 we shall be spending £17·5 billion on the Health Service. I am being pressed constantly by the hon. Gentleman and by Labour Members to spend more and to provide even more resources. We shall provide £800 million more for the Health Service next year, and the issue is how the money is to be raised. I am saying—it is as well that the Labour party listens to this as well—that charges must make a contribution.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): Is my right hon. Friend aware that many people will feel that this charge of £2 for prescriptions imposed on those who can well afford to pay it is not an unreasonable figure when compared with the cost of a packet of cigarettes, a pint of beer or a cinema seat? Is my right hon. Friend aware also that the list of chronic conditions which enjoy exemption is relatively limited and that some people feel that it should be widened? Will he be open to representations on that matter?

Mr. Fowler: I shall certainly examine that matter again. I have looked at it in the past, and I know that there are strong views about it. My hon. Friend is right to point to the exemptions policy, which means that those who are unable to afford the prescription charges are protected from their impact.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): When this matter was discussed in Cabinet and it was argued that £19 million should be obtained from increasing prescription charges by a colossal amount—an increase which is five times the general level of inflation—did the right hon. Gentleman tell the Prime Minister and other Cabinet Members that the increase was tiny compared with the amount spent on Trident — [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] Government Members are dropping their heads. Perhaps they would drop a lot more if Trident were ever used. Did the right hon. Gentleman tell the Cabinet that the amount that the Health Service needs is a tiny proportion of the amount that has been spent on Trident? Did the right hon. Gentleman put to the Secretary of State for Defence that argument for sanity and good health, instead of destruction?

Mr. Fowler: I want more resources to be devoted to the Health Service, and that is what the Government are providing. I believe that charges must make a contribution to those increased resources.

Mr. Roy Galley (Halifax): My right hon. Friend will no doubt be aware that many sensible people will welcome the fact that those who can afford to pay a contribution will now be increasing revenues for vital health services, such as more kidney dialysis. Will my right hon. Friend confirm my interpretation of the figures that the total full-year effect will be an increase in revenue of £100 million? Will he clarify the position of prescription season ticket holders who, while they are still eligble for a season ticket, become able to claim free prescriptions?

Mr. Fowler: There have been complaints, and I hope that I can help, so that refunds can be made available. The £39 million to £40 million of revenue which is to be raised is a net figure. The overall figure is not £100 million, but £74 million.

Mr. Derek Foster (Bishop Auckland): Why does the Secretary of State not come clean to the House and admit that he has had to impose this swingeing tax on the sick because he has been a pushover in the Cabinet? Is it not an insult to the country to make this announcement today when, in a few days, the Chancellor will announce that he is stuffing pounds into the pockets of those who do not need the money?

Mr. Fowler: It would be an insult to the country if the Government were cutting back on resources to the Health Service. The hon. Gentleman has to make up his mind. If he wants cuts in the Health Service, let him say so. I shall make my stand on seeking to increase resources to the Health Service by adopting a reasonable charging policy.

Sir Raymond Gower (Vale of Glamorgan): Will my right hon. Friend reconsider, in the context of these changes, anomalies which bear harshly on many people? As he knows, long-term bulk prescriptions are available to people with certain chronic ailments. Yet, inconsistently, such prescriptions are withheld from other persons who have serious long-term chronic illnesses.

Mr Fowler: I shall take another look at that matter. As I said earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Mrs. Knight), 72 per cent. of prescriptions are free. The percentage is rather less for dental services. We are moving from a position where about three quarters of prescriptions are at present free.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): Is the Secretary of State aware that, despite what he says about the Government's expenditure on the Health Service as a whole, everyone can see that the Health Service is falling apart because of a lack of resources, and that therefore young children and old people are dying day by day? The right hon. Gentleman says that there will be a saving by this exercise of about £40 million. He asks where we shall find the resources if we do not have this measure. Is it not the case that the Government's official figures show that this year the Government are spending £552 million on defence in the Falkland Islands, to defend 1,200 people, 8,000 miles away? Do not tell the Opposition or anyone else that we are short of resources to save life when we are spending that amount of money to kill people.

Mr. Fowler: We are spending that sort of money to defend people, not to kill them. I am prepared for the public to decide that point. Next year we shall spend £17½ billion on the Health Service—£800 million more than this year.

Mr. Hamilton: Do not give us that.

Mr. Fowler: The hon. Gentleman can work it out for himself. It represents a real increase in resources of 20 per cent. When the hon. Gentleman talks about £500 million, he must remember that the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), by his promise to abolish all charges in the Health Service, will remove £500 million of income which would go to the Health Service.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, however little importance Opposition Members attach to the sacrifice made by our defences forces, those in receipt of war disablement pensions will continue to be included among the exemptions from prescription charges?

Mr. Fowler: Yes, they are exempt for their accepted disabilities. That will continue.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Is not the truth of the matter that the Secretary of State has come here today to turn the tax screw again on the sick because he has lost the battle with the Treasury? Why did the Secretary of State not make up his mind to tell the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he was not prepared to increase prescription or other charges until the Chancellor had recovered some of the thousands of millions of pounds a year that he is losing through the City slickers avoiding and fiddling their taxes and otherwise depriving the Revenue of the money which the Secretary of State has to make up from the sick and others who can ill afford to make up that money?

Mr. Fowler: I did not put that case because I think that it is silly and indefensible.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the problem with the increase in charges for drugs and dental supplies is that they must be imposed on too narrow a base? Have not Governments of both parties made a mistake by restricting the private sector in the National Health Service because if it had been expanded it would have brought in more money for the Health Service?

Mr. Fowler: I have some sympathy with what my hon. Friend says, but the Opposition intend to abolish all that. If they do, it will mean that they will turn their back on over £60 million of income coming to the National Health Service. That is why I say to the Labour party that if it wants to expand the Health Service it will have to explain where the money will come from.

[Mr. Fowler]

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): The Minister mentioned a gain of £40 million. Can he tell the House upon what basis that was calculated? Is it on the current prescribing, or is it on the basis of the so-called new lengthy list that he wishes to introduce? How do he and the Cabinet reconcile a five-times increase in the cost of medicine with the precepts of St. Francis of Assisi?

Mr. Fowler: On the first point, the figure is based on an estimate of what prescribing habits will be and what prescriptions will take place. On the second point, we believe that this system is fair and just, and so, I am sure, will the hon. Gentleman when he has had time to consider it.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Does my right hon. Friend accept that my constituents are not so much worried by the rise in prescription charges as by the fact that some drugs on which they rely will no longer be obtainable? For example, elderly arthritics who in the past have taken soluble distalgesics will no longer be able to obtain them. They will have to take Paracetamal combined with Dextropropoxyphene. Will he put soluble distalgesics back on the list, or help the drug companies find a cheaper alternative?

Mr. Fowler: The two ingredients that my hon. Friend has named are the ingredients of distalgesic, and they will be available under the limited list proposals.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): Does the Secretary of State accept that, notwithstanding the exemptions from prescription charges, some families will find it difficult to pay £2 for a prescription? If he accepts that, and is personally responsible for it, what estimate has he or his Department made of the number of deaths that will occur each year as a result of the extra charges? In the long run, some people will not be able to pay the £2 charges.

Mr. Fowler: I repeat that three quarters of the prescriptions are free, and the exempted groups include pensioners, children under 16, expectant and nursing mothers, people on supplementary benefit, people on family income supplement and people with low incomes. Therefore, I do not believe that the exemptions policy can remotely be criticised for not being wide enough.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): I am sure that my right hon. Friend was as concerned as I was to hear a doctor in a radio interview this morning saying that apparently pharmacists are advising patients on best buys, rather than doctors doing it. Are doctors not supplied with a list of prices of the same medicines so that they can do their bit to save money for the National Health Service?

Mr. Fowler: That information is provided for them.

The other point made incorrectly in the same interview this morning was that prepayment certificates—season tickets—were not available as well. That is a sensible way for someone who expects to have a number of prescriptions over a period to make an economical choice in that area.

Mr. James Lamond (Oldham, Central and Royton): Has the Secretary of State's Department made any estimate of the drop in the number of prescriptions that will be issued following the price increase? If there is a drop, will that not show that the price will have risen to a level which even those who are not exempt cannot afford for each item? Can the Secretary of State tell us of any other necessary item of everyday use which has increased tenfold in the time that the Government have been in office?

Mr. Fowler: The answer to the hon. Gentleman's last point is that it is a matter of the proportion of NHS income, and I am seeking to maintain the 3 per cent. proportion.

The hon. Gentleman's first point is an interesting one, but it does not sustain his case. In 1979, 300 million prescriptions were dispensed. By 1983 the number had increased to 315 million, and today it is estimated at 320 million, so the number of prescriptions has increased, not reduced.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to bear in mind that after questions on the statement there is to be an important Opposition Day debate. I shall endeavour to call all those hon. Members who are standing, provided that they keep their questions brief.

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe): Is my right hon. Friend satisfied with the manner in which consultants use the facilities for private health care within the NHS? In particular, what steps are taken by him or his Department to ensure that NHS waiting lists are not artifically long, or longer than they would be were facilities not available to consultants to carry out private health care within the NHS?

Mr. Fowler: As I have already made clear, I asked my statutory auditors to investigate the position in 37 health authorities. The result was that my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health wrote to all authorities drawing their attention to the findings in the report. They have now been asked to report back to me on what action they are taking. They were given full permission—that is why my hon. Friend has the information—to make the reports available in public session of the health authorities. Therefore, we are taking all possible action to ensure that no money is being wasted in this area.

Mr. Robert Litherland (Manchester, Central): Is the Minister aware that a recent area health authority report in Manchester described that city as having one of the highest short-life expectancies in the United Kingdom? Is he also aware that the number of children dying before they are one year old is one of the highest in the United Kingdom? Does he not think that the new prescription charges will lead to a worsening of the position and that that should be on his conscience, because he is making it a luxury to be ill?

Mr. Fowler: The hon. Gentleman has made rather better than I have the case for more resources to go to the National Health Service, and that is the purpose of the charging policy.

Mr. Timothy Wood (Stevenage): Will my right hon. Friend comment again on the amount that is contributed to the NHS by way of charges? Will he further comment on how the NHS might be affected if such charges were not contributed to the overall Health Service provision.

Mr. Fowler: At present in England, out of a total budget of £14½ billion, about £460 million comes from charges. If the Labour party had its way, we would simply turn our back on that £460 million. That is the policy of the Labour party, and it has never——

Mr. Kinnock: No.

Mr. Fowler: I am glad to hear that the Leader of the Opposition is now reversing the policy. Perhaps he will have a word with his hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher). It is the first time that we have had any light from the Opposition on its exact policy in this area. Up to now we had understood—the Leader of the Opposition appears to be correcting the position—that the policy was that all charges should be abolished.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): Can the Secretary of State assure the House that, under the proposed charge of £2 per item, no one will be paying more than the proper cost of an item? How does the right hon. Gentleman square his announcement with the statement of his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in April 1979, when she made an absolute promise that prescription charges would not go up?

Mr. Fowler: The Prime Minister did not make a pledge at that time——

Mr. Corbett: It is here in the Daily Mail.

Mr. Fowler: I am delighted to see my neighbour from Birmingham quoting the Daily Mail. If the Daily Mail said what the hon. Gentleman claims, it is an inaccurate report. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] Even the Daily Mail makes mistakes at times. [Interruption.] "Labour's Dirty Dozen". It hardly seems to be the right quotation. The £2 prescription charge will cover only 44 per cent. of the cost of the average prescription, which is about £4·50.

Mr. Tim Eggar (Enfield, North): How does the 3·2 per cent. of NHS expenditure to be covered by charges, as a result of my right hon. Friend's announcement today, compare with the situation in 1968, when the Labour Government reintroduced prescription charges?

Mr. Fowler: It is almost precisely the same. In 1968-69, 3·1 per cent. was provided by charges under the Labour party's policy. In 1969-70, that figure rose to 3·5 per cent., so the Labour Government were ahead of this Government in what they were asking for in charges.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Quite apart from the other areas of spending that could be cut instead of imposing the new charge, why does the Secretary of State prefer to raise the money through a scheme which is expensive to administer and takes money from those who are unlucky enough to be ill, rather than raising it through general taxation? If he followed that method, the cost of administration would already be covered, and those who had to pay would include those of us who are lucky enough to be well.

Mr. Fowler: Under the present charging system, those who are most in need of help do not pay and the charges fall on those who can afford to pay. Two of the groups helped over prescription charges are those on family income supplement, and retirement pensioners, who would be adversely affected if the charges were to be transferred to the tax bill.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the reactions of most people in this country to the £2 per item prescription charge will be, "Ouch"? Does he agree also that most people have not the faintest idea of the cost of the drugs being prescribed to them? Is not the time now here when we should adopt a system of prescription charges which relates much more closely to the cost of the drugs and the service being provided—35 or 40 per cent. of the scrip? It would be much the same as for dentistry. In that way we could be assured that people appreciated what they were getting.

Mr. Fowler: We can look at that, but the £2 prescription charge, with the exemptions, is a better way than the proportionate type of prescription charge which we have looked at in the past.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): May I remind the Secretary of State that in 1979, after his Government came to office, the Royal Commission on the National Health Service, of which I was a member, recommended abolishing prescription charges altogether? The right hon. Gentleman has completely ignored that recommendation. Secondly, why has the right hon. Gentleman ignored the recent statistics, which show that rises in dental treatment charges are already affecting the quality of treatment, and that dentists who previously used clinical judgment in prescribing treatment now have to prescribe it according to the amount of money that the patients have to pay for it? Finally, may I say that the right hon. Gentleman made a misleading statement this afternoon——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady has asked two questions. She must now put her third one briefly.

Mrs. Clwyd: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Is the Minister aware that he made a misleading statement, in that he said that expectant mothers do not pay any charge? That is not true. If a woman becomes pregnant after she has started her treatment, she pays for that treatment. Surely the right hon. Gentleman should put that anomaly right instead of raising charges.

Mr. Fowler: I shall look at that anomaly.

It is all very well for the Royal Commission on the National Health Service to say that it wants prescription charges to be abolished, but it must explain how that would be financed and paid for. There is no evidence of any lasting effect on demand for dentistry. Courses of treatment have risen from 24 million in 1973-74 to 27 million in 1979, and to almost 31 million now. Between 1979 and today there has been an increase of 2,000 dentists.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that roughly half the medicine prescribed under the National Health Service is not consumed and that, as everyone knows, people have bathroom cupboards chock-a-block with half-empty bottles of medicine? Does my right hon. Friend accept that some people need drugs, that many people who receive drugs do not need them, and that the health of the nation at large would be much improved if people took more sleep, more exercise and less tobacco?

Mr. Fowler: That all sounds rather good advice.

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside): Is not the prescription charge a cruel tax on ill health? Those who are just over the poverty line and who suffer from ill health could have more pain and suffering and might even die prematurely. As the right hon. Gentleman supports this increase and this heartless Government, he should do us all a favour and resign.

Mr. Fowler: I prefer to make more resources available to the Health Service, and that is what I shall continue to do.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): As the poorest section of the community does not pay prescription charges anyway, the only effect of holding down charges, as advocated by the Opposition, would be to increase the effective subsidy paid on each subscription to better-off people. As that would reduce the resources available for those in real need, does my right hon. Friend agree that in that respect the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) is acting like Robin Hood in reverse—robbing the poor to increase subsidies for the rich?

Mr. Fowler: My hon. Friend is right. What became clear during the exchange between the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. Member for Oldham, West, the Opposition social services spokesman, is that the Opposition do not have the first idea of what their health policy actually is.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): The Secretary of State and his hon. Friends constantly reiterate the amount of money to be raised, but it will be so small that his action will be interpreted, particularly in Wales, as mean, spiteful and malicious. As a Welsh Member, I deplore the fact that the Secretary of State for Wales is not here for the statement. I suggest to the Secretary of State for Social Services that the reason why so many prescriptions are free is that many people are living in dire poverty.

Mr. Fowler: I shall put the hon. Gentleman's first point in reverse. He takes a grand view of £40 million. If I had come to the House and said that I was proposing to cut Health Service expenditure by £40 million, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would have been the first to condemn that as a monstrous policy.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): I accept that prescription charges must be raised to a more realistic level, but does my right hon. Friend agree that the time is now ripe to promote the prepayment scheme, because many people will still get their prescriptions free as before, so it is important that the service that is available to others is as wide and detailed as possible?

Mr. Fowler: I agree with my hon. Friend. We shall certainly do so.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is Mr. 1,000 per cent. aware that only he can compete with the Prime Minister in vindictiveness against the disabled and those least able to bear it? As for the exemptions, what good will they do to Ben Gibson in my constituency, who is crippled with emphysema and who has to go into hospital three times a year? When he manages to get his breath and ring me, he says, "Can you get me a prescription for that nebuliser, Dennis?", and I write to the Secretary of State, and he says no. Is he saying no again?

Mr. Fowler: I do not know the case, and I shall not make a flip reply to a case that I have not seen. I shall look at it and give a full reply.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Why did the Secretary of State avoid having these increases announced in the Budget next week, at the same time as the reductions in capital gains tax, capital transfer tax and tax on the higher paid generally are announced? That is what will be done in the Budget next week. Could the real reason be that he knew that the British people would see the transparent nature of the Government's economic policy, which is to transfer from the poor directly to the rich?

Mr. Fowler: It is much simpler than that. We followed the precedent of last year. It is almost precisely to the day that we announced the increase in charges last year.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Even as a member of a Tory Government who has seen prescription charges rise faster than the pound has come down, will the Secretary of State tell us of any further commodity or service which, since 1979, has seen a tenfold increase? Not even the £2 gallon of petrol compares with that. Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that when the Government came to office the sick paid only 10 per cent. of the drugs bill, whereas he now expects them to pay nearly half? Further, how can the right hon. Gentleman justify his statement that the hospital services benefit from a profit of £60 million from private patients and overseas visitors when his own statement says that they have not been meeting the full cost up to now, which is why he is increasing the charges? I come back to the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) and other hon. Members have raised. What can the right hon. Gentleman do to explain the Prime Minister's statement, recorded in the Daily Mail:

"We have no intention of increasing or introducing prescription charges."?

If the Prime Minister did not agree, why did she not issue a denial? She did not do so. She gave David English a knighthood for his pack of lies.

Mr. Fowler: The matter to which the hon. Gentleman referred in his concluding comments has been raised unsuccessfully by the Leader of the Opposition with the Prime Minister. The fact of the matter is that the Prime Minister said that no responsible Government could ever promise not to increase prescription charges. The important thing is that the exemptions remain.

I repeat what I said previously about the scale of the charges. The charges today are raising about 3·2 per cent. of NHS costs, which is rather less than at the end of the 1960s, when the Labour party was in power. With regard to the pay bed contribution, I assure the hon. Gentleman that I shall want to ensure that we get the maximum income from pay beds, but that does not remotely square with his policy of simply abolishing pay beds and that income as well.

Statutory Instruments, &c.

Mr. Speaker: With the leave of the House, I shall put together the five Questions on the motions relating to statutory instruments.

Opposition Day

[9TH ALLOTTED DAY]

Unemployment and Industrial Policies

4.20 pm

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): I beg to move,

That this House condemns the Government's policies which have resulted in the highest level of unemployment this century; affirms the widely and rightly held conviction that governments can and should regard the systematic expansion of the economy, the reduction of unemployment, and the development of youth and adult training as essential policy objectives; and calls upon the Government to end its indifference to the disastrous decline of manufacturing industry and to embark upon an urgent programme of national economic recovery based on investment in the renewal and expansion of British industry, the improvement of the social and productive infrastructure and the strengthening of science and technology.

Mr. Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister and I intend to operate the 10-minute limit on speeches between 6 pm and 8 pm. As a large number of right hon. and hon. Members wish to take part, I hope that everyone will bear that limit more or less in mind.

Mr. Prescott: Today's debate is about employment and jobs, the creation of wealth and the standard of living of our people. It is about the failure of six years of Conservative policies, which have resulted in unprecedented levels of unemployment, and about the Government's indifference to the misery and deprivation arising from mass unemployment, much of it created by their own policies. It is about challenging the use of mass unemployment as a deliberate part of Government strategy to discipline the labour force into accepting further reductions in wages, welfare and employee rights. It is also about the waste of the tremendous potential of our young people, the growth of long-term unemployment and the decimation of our industrial base, especially the manufacturing sector.

Today's debate is also about focusing public debate on the Government's claim that there is no alternative to their disastrous policies, which promise further unemployment, increased poverty and deprivation and a growing disparity between rich and poor, north and south. We firmly believe that those policies can and should be reversed. The reduction of unemployment must become a priority and that process must begin with the Budget next Tuesday.

The Government came to power in June 1979 with the slogan, "Labour isn't working", but their record since then has been far from good. They convinced the electorate that they would get people back to work. They said that they would restore the economy by reducing inflation, lowering taxes, improving profits, cutting public expenditure and reducing Government intervention, which they said would bring an inevitable reduction in unemployment through the creation of genuine jobs. According to the Government, 1985 is the third year of economic recovery, but unemployment is at its highest this century and is predicted to rise still further.

I have no desire to subject the House to a welter of statistics, which so often dominate employment debates, but I make no apology for using some statistics to remind the House of the scale and depth of the problem arising out of unemployment and perhaps to convince the Government of the need to reduce it, as well as to challenge and disprove the many half-truths and misleading statements constantly repeated by Government spokesmen in debates of this kind.

Last week's unemployment figure of 3·3 million or 13·7 per cent. of the registered working population is a massive indictment of six years of Tory policy. To any normal Government, it would be a badge of shame, but to the present Government, wallowing in the belief that there is no alternative, it is simply a statement of the casualties. Despite the rejigging of the figures, on any fair analysis unemployment is at least 4 million—three times greater than the total of 1·3 million that the Government inherited in 1979. For every month of the Government's period of office, 12,000 of our people have been thrown on the scrap heap. Indeed, the total for long-term unemployment—now 1·3 million — is as great as the total for all unemployment in 1979. Yet far from reversing their policies, the Government have sought to blame the world recession and even the weather, using selective statistics from other countries to justify the high levels of unemployment.

In a previous speech, using the OECD figures, I showed that if the United Kingdom had kept the average level of unemployment as it was in the 1960s and 1970s there would be 1 million fewer unemployed which could be directly attributed to the Government's own policies. Of late, the Secretary of State for Employment and the Prime Minister have sought refuge in the claim that the employment-to-population ratio is better in the United Kingdom. In 1979, it was 71 per cent., but by 1983 it had fallen to under 64 per cent. The average for the OECD countries fell from 64 per cent. to 63 per cent. in the same period, so the decline has been far greater in Britain. The Secretary of State shakes his head. My figures come from table 2 on page 15 of the 1984 OECD report. I am sick and tired of hearing the Secretary of State refer to tables of statistics which are wrong. He will have the chance to correct the figures in today's debate. It is important that we correct some of the untruths put forward by the Government.

Another favourite candidate when the Government are looking for scapegoats is Socialist France. The Government are fond of pointing to that country's problems, but France has halved its inflation rate and growth is higher than in Britain — built on industrial investment, more than half of it by public enterprise. Moreover, living standards in France have increased by more than 5 per cent. compared with 1·5 per cent. in Britain in a similar period.

Further twisting of the figures and of the truth is to be found in the Government's working population figures for the United Kingdom, which they claim are increasing. Between 1974 and 1979, despite an average growth in population of 200,000 per year, the Labour Government's policies increased the working population by 245,000. After six years of Tory rule, with a growth in working population of only 40,000 per year, the labour force is 1·8 million smaller. In reality, the 350,000 extra jobs claimed by the Government are part-time jobs and must be seen against the background of a massive fall in the number of full-time jobs, including 1·25 million in the manufacturing and engineering industries alone since 1979.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): The hon. Gentleman referred to France. Although he disputes some of the figures, does he accept that employment is now increasing in the United Kingdom but not in France?

Mr. Prescott: There is a time lapse in growth and employment between the various economies, but in France the increase in the number of jobs has not led to a decline in the full-time working population, as it has in the United Kingdom. That is clear from the OECD reports. I do not put forward my own figures. I simply go to the book so often referred to by the Government. France is not, therefore, a correct analogy to take when considering why unemployment is so high in this country.

The unprecedented loss of full-time jobs in Britain is readily understood when one appreciates that the Government's declared policy was to shake out overmanned industries and to cut the number of their own employees in the Civil Service. They were elected on that platform and claim credit for it. The Department of Employment's statistics show that in the transport industry alone 150,000 jobs have been lost, primarily because of the cut in financial support for the industry, already at one of the lowest levels in Europe.

There has also been a reduction in the rate support grant, which has had considerable effect in reducing numbers of local authority employees, and the Government take credit for the expectation that the abolition of the GLC and the metropolitan councils will involve the loss of another 8,000 jobs. The Government's claims that high rates reduce local jobs have been cruelly exposed by their own leaked report from Cambridge university, which rejects the idea that the increase in rates leads directly to a reduction in local employment. A reduction of 90,000 jobs in the steel industry is now to be followed by many thousands—who knows how many?—in the coal industry, if the Government get their way. The Government spent £4 billion on defeating the miners and consider that to be a good investment. They now offer us NCB (Enterprise) Ltd., funded by a derisory £10 million in compensation. That is utter nonsense and a reflection of their priorities.

Finally, a collapse of fixed capital investment in the construction industry and the industrial sectors has certainly led to the loss of many hundreds of thousands of jobs. That is part of the Government's deliberate policy on unemployment, which distinguishes them from any other civilised European Government.

A further disturbing feature of the Government's policies involves the growth of the part-time labour market. We have seen the loss of 2 million full-time jobs and the growth of 300,000 in the number of part-time jobs. The regional implications are alarming. The loss of full-time jobs has not been spread equally throughout the country. The rate of loss of full-time jobs in the north has been four times greater than in the south. The manufacturing decline has hit the north and the midlands far harder than the south. The long-term unemployment rate is twice as great in the north on average as in the south, and affects the growing regional difference in income, further accentuating the north-south polarisation that exists after six years of Tory Government.

The final insult to such growing regional disparities is offered by the Government's own regional policy. They are now preparing to reduce expenditure on regional policies to a level below the real level of 1964, when only half a million people were unemployed. That is the scale on which resources are being reduced at a time when regional disparities are growing ever faster as a direct result of the Government's policies.

The great tragedy is that we have not during the recession used the £12 billion of oil money to invest and retrain in the so-called sunrise industries after the Government's destruction of the smokestack industries. The growth in information technology has been slower than it has been in the economies of our competitors. I refer the Government to the recent report of Professor Ashman into the future of our information technology industry. His fears about shortages of proper skills and of adequate financial backing for the industry have proved to be correct. His prediction of a growing deficit by 1990 became all too true in 1984 when we experienced a deficit of £2,000 million in information technology to add to the ever-growing record deficit in manufacturing trade.

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West): Can the hon. Gentleman explain to the House why it was left to a Conservative Government to launch a scheme that brought mini-computers into all our primary and secondary schools? The hon. Gentleman criticises the growth in the number of part-time jobs. Does he object to women taking part-time employment?

Mr. Prescott: I certainly do not object to anyone finding work. I believe that the Government have a responsibility to do all that they can to create jobs. I will not accept that comment from an hon. Gentleman who constantly votes for a policy that is directly increasing unemployment. On computer skills, I refer the hon. Gentleman to the Government's report on computers and the supply problems of information technology. The report points out the tremendous shortages of graduates and computer people available to work in those industries.

Dr. Hampson: We have done something.

Mr. Prescott: The fact that there are now computers in our schools is welcome, but we have set aside for information technology only one eighth of what Germany devotes to that industry, and the Government have placed a moratorium on the amounts of money made available to information technology industries. If the hon. Gentleman showed more concern for those facts, we would have more respect for his criticism.

It is tragic that we have not used our oil money to support and equip that basic future industry. The income that the Government received from the privatisation of British Telecom would have been better used for re-investment in information technology than for funding the outdated monetarist policy that has created much of our unemployment.

I do not attribute all the unemployment directly to the Government's policies—that is not my case—but during the recession unemployment in the United Kingdom has increased by a third more than unemployment in competitor countries. We could use this time as they have done, to embark on a massive training programme. The Government speak of the £2,000 million allotted to the YTS programmes and other schemes, but they are not providing adequate training to re-equip our labour force to meet the challenges that it faces. Our criticism of the Government's training programme is not that they are not providing enough money, or that they are not using it in the right way, but that they have set back training in this country by 20 years. They have undermined the whole basis of thinking on training.

For decades, Britain's failure to train has been a significant factor in our poor economic performance. The percentage of qualified workers in Britain is half that in the United States, Germany and Japan. The percentage of 20 to 24-year-olds with higher education is considerably lower here than in our competitor countries.

The network of 23 industrial training boards covering 53 per cent. of the working population and supported by statutory enforcement powers and levies was introduced by a former Conservative Government. Labour Governments built on the sound judgments of the ITBs, which provided apprenticeships for 43 per cent. of youngsters leaving school.

With the creation of the Manpower Services Commission national training objectives were established. However, tragically, the brave new world of the present Government's economic theories, with their one major disciple, the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) as Secretary of State for Employment, set about destroying the ITBs. On 10 November 1981 the right hon. Gentleman announced the Government's policy of reducing the number of ITBs from 23 to seven. He said:

"the training requirements of the sector concerned can be met effectively on a voluntary basis with less cost and bureaucracy." —[Official Report, 16 November 1981; Vol. 13, c. 30.]

Previous Tory Administrations had come to quite a different conclusion when they established the ITBs. We shall have three or four years in which to judge the effectiveness of the new policy. The right hon. Gentleman was challenged by Mr. Eric Varley, then the Opposition spokesman, who said that the Government's policy would damage training in Britain and undermine our competitive position and that it was against the advice of the MSC, which required a strong statutory system. The right hon. Member for Chingford made it clear that the policy was in response to what industry had requested, and that he had acted accordingly.

Many reports have brought home one underlying truth about British industry. It is that our employers fail to give the necessary priority to training or to provide resources for it. A number of reports published in the past few years have reaffirmed the analysis that led to the establishment of the ITBs in 1964. It is interesting to read some of those reports. We have witnessed the return to a voluntary training system, even though some of the boards remain. We have seen the poaching of skills, and there have been demands from the National Economic Development Council, the TUC and the CBI that something be done about the desperate shortages of skills from which our economy is suffering, even though 3 million or 4 million people are unemployed.

The Department of Trade and Industry's report shows that there is a shortage of about 5,000 graduates in information technology, that employers should make a greater contribution to training, that technological progress in the United Kingdom has been hampered by our failure to develop human resources and that industry should accept more responsibility for the training and education of recruits. It shows that there are low levels of initial training, inadequate continued training and that correction of skill shortages lies principally in industry's hands.

The most recent report from another place on education and training in new technologies recommends the introduction of a national training levy across all sectors of the industry and a national training plan. These were the arguments of the 1960s. Now that technological change is more rapid than ever and we have severe skill shortages, the Government respond by dismantling the very structure that improved training by more than 25 per cent. in its first four years. Report after report tells us that we should return to statutory training requirements and levies from employers. The indictment of the Government is not so much that they have abandoned any intelligent approach to training but that they have overthrown what was accepted by earlier Tory Administrations in the 1960s.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): How was it that the 1984 Labour party conference condemned the youth training scheme, in opposition to the line taken by the Labour party's national executive and the Trades Union Congress?

Mr. Prescott: I am delighted to have the opportunity to put on record the TUC and Labour party policy to extend YTS to two years, finance it properly, have proper safety control and proper allowances. The hon. Gentleman should visit some of the schemes. Some are excellent, but others are no more than shifting cardboard boxes around warehouses. The hon. Gentleman might be satisfied that the latter meets the challenge of the future, but I am not.

The Government's stupidity in dismantling the training system is most clear when we consider our tremendous lack of skills as compared with our competitor countries. The Secretary of State recently came to the House to endorse the policy to close 29 of Manpower's 83 skillcentres in the name of not wanting to keep bricks and mortar. Inspectors must now get on their bike and cycle around to give training. The skillcentres are necessary because there is a shortage in all skills.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle (Lincoln): I am sure that the hon. Gentleman agrees that it is important that training is relevant. Does he agree that we should consider the practical implications of skillcentres? Lincolnshire's skillcentre is at Long Eaton, the result being that many people in Lincoln do not use it. It makes much more sense to use the money available to have training in the centres of engineering, where they are much needed.

Mr. Prescott: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. My objection is to closing skillcentres when they are desperately needed. Even worse, the Secretary of State is closing five profitable skillcentres. I should have thought that they would be especially attractive to Conservative Members. Some of them specialise in technology and youth training.

We hear much about productivity, a reduction of wages and a reduction of staffing levels. The National Institute's "Economic Review" compared productivity in Britain and Germany and concluded that the difference was not so much to do with manning levels or the type of machinery used as the type of skill and training of employees. Discussing the Government's policies, it concluded that, if anything, present Government policies towards training are likely to make Britain's deficiencies even worse. That is quite an indictment.

Labour's "Plans for Training" makes it clear that we shall have a two-year youth training scheme, finance it properly, increase fivefold the Manpower Services Commission work preparation and training programmes and improve community programmes. No doubt the Government are considering some such schemes. We do not object to the schemes, as they will help to reduce unemployment. Our objection and opposition is to conscripting youngsters and taking their benefits off them if they choose not to go into a scheme, as is apparently being considered by the Government.

The Prime Minister and Ministers have lectured the House constantly to the effect that there is no alternative to their policies, and unemployment has increased. The past three Budgets have apparently been designed to create jobs, but unemployment has continued to rise. If press statements and leaks are to be believed, the Chancellor intends to intervene again in this Budget to create jobs. I hope that he has more success this time. We believe that Governments can influence the framework of employment and reduce unemployment. Indeed, they have a responsibility to do so. The Government's support for interventionist policies seems to be growing. The Select Committee has been told that they are intervening on interest rates, exchange rates and even on oil prices. We welcome any conversion of the Government to policies to reduce unemployment that we have called for since 1979.

Discussions about unemployment have become especially pertinent because of the Chancellors's statement that he hopes to have £1·5 billion available for tax cuts. That has resulted directly from the pound's huge fall against the dollar, which has brought the Chancellor a reward, but which has been costly to the country in terms of investment, penal interest rates and uncertainty about inflation. Public debate about how best to use the £1·5 billion has led to a consensus that investment in infrastructure can create jobs. The debate is therefore about putting unemployment and its reduction at the heart of next week's Budget.

The Chancellor has an opportunity to do something effective, even within his monetarist terms. I am talking of real jobs, as did the Prime Minister when in opposition, rather than the 700,000 people who are in various schemes, designed mainly to reduce the unemployment figures. I should welcome an increase in and a redefinition of community schemes, and an improvement in the quality of training and allowances. The Opposition are not against expanding such schemes, which bring the unemployed together and fulfil needs.

If the Government present a package that merely extends YTS and the community programme, it will be clear that they are more anxious to fiddle the unemployment figures yet again than to reduce unemployment. If they genuinely want to reduce unemployment through the provision of full-time rather than part-time jobs, they should invest more in public sector infrastructure.

We reject the Government's argument that a reduction in wages will bring many jobs. We reject their abolition of wages councils for industries that pay only £70 or £50 a week. We reject the so-called Lord Young package, which reduces the costs of small businesses by repealing statutory employment protection benefits such as health and safety rights, maternity rights, unfair dismissal rights, equal opportunities and other employment rights. That is totally unacceptable and will be bitterly opposed by the Opposition.

The issue is how much we should put into public expenditure and in what areas it would have the best effect. The Opposition believe that a national recovery programme in both the public and private sectors would require a considerable amount of money and planning. We do not believe, and the evidence supports us, that the market system can produce the organisation required to achieve full employment, to which we are committed.

This debate is about a reversal of the ever-increasing level of unemployment. Never has a Chancellor been provided with so many schemes, opportunities and plans to reduce unemployment. The CBI and TUC have produced plans of varying amounts—from £3 billion a year to £6 billion a year—and even the Tory Reform Group has joined in the bidding. Even the national daily press has produced various plans. The Daily Mirror, the Daily Mail and the Daily Telegraph have all produced schemes which are different in composition and amounts, but are wedded to the concept that the Government can, and should, use this Budget to reduce the high unemployment now experienced in the United Kingdom.

One way of judging the Government's record on unemployment is by looking at local authority expenditure, particularly in housing. Local authorities have made a considerable contribution towards meeting training needs in their areas. They have created jobs by providing services. They have developed enterprise units, which have created many thousands of jobs, all of which have been achieved more cheaply than anything proposed by the Government. A report in The Guardian today said that the Audit Commission has made it clear that £1,000 million has been denied to local authorities which could have been used for housing. It was claimed that this had been at great cost to efficiency. That money has resulted from the sale of council houses, about which the Government were so demanding. Why has it not been used for housing and for getting our 500,000 unemployed construction workers back to work? That Audit Commission report is also an indictment of the Government. Many of those unemployed building workers could be put back to work and could meet the needs of our people. The Government stand indicted for failing to choose this priority.

I wish to conclude——

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Hear, hear.

Mr. Prescott: I notice that the hon. Lady is today dressed in red—[HON. MEMBERS: "Pink."] No matter, in spite of her remarks and concern, she has voted for more people being unemployed.

The Chancellor has an opportunity to consider a number of packages of private and public investment which, at a stroke, could send many of our people back to work. It will not be easy to send everyone back to work within three or four years. We should be absolutely clear about that. The sort of radical policies required to achieve that cannot possibly be obtained within the framework of the Chancellor's remit, but many could be sent back to work, thereby reversing the ever-increasing flow of unemployment.

If the Minister wishes to study a plan that has been publicly discussed he should look at the Daily Mirror package. Has the Secretary of State read it? Has he noted what it said about the provision of jobs? All of it has been costed and fed through computers. I shall not go into detail, but that plan suggests the provision of community schemes, help for special groups, provision of labour through job release and early retirement, and the construction of social facilities such as homes, roads and sewers for which so many are calling. That plan says that for £3·8 billion over 1 million people could be returned to work.

Has the Secretary of State asked the Chancellor whether it is possible to return 1 million people to work? The resources can be achieved within the Government's financial remit by adjusting the target for the PSBR and would allow us to provide for jobs rather than tax cuts. I pass that plan across the Table so that it can be fed into the Treasury computer. Will the Secretary of State say whether such a programme is possible?

At Question Time last week the Prime Minister claimed that the Government had created records — record output, a record standard of living and record job creation. That is almost a truism, because such things happen most years. The Prime Minister also claimed that there had been record investment, when in fact there has been record under-investment. The Prime Minister will go down in history as one who presided over record unemployment, record poverty, a record number of youngsters out of work, record long-term unemployment, record bankruptcies, a record deficit in manufacturing trade and record division between rich and poor, north and south—all of which the Labour Opposition will reverse when we return to power.

The Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Tom King): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

"supports the Government's determination to pursue economic and industrial policies which maintain a sound financial framework, low inflation and steady economic growth and create the conditions for efficient, competitive and productive industry; welcomes its commitment to develop training opportunities for young people and adults and to help the unemployed through measures like the Enterprise Allowance Scheme and Community Programme; notes that these policies have already led to the creation of over 300,000 more jobs last year and believes that sustaining these policies offers the best hope of real and lasting improvements in employment opportunities".

Many of us will have been deeply shocked by the revelation in The Times today of the sort of language that occurs in the other place. Many will have been deeply shocked at the reference made to one noble Lord by the person whom I understand is now described as the Church's rudest bishop who said:

"His mouth is for export and his head has no entrance".

That comment could have been applied to parts of the speech of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott). He stands before the House as the representative of a party which has been in government, during which time unemployment doubled, yet the hon. Gentleman spoke as though there was an easy and facile answer.

As I listened to him, I wondered whether he had voted for the motion at last year's Labour party conference—which in the end was defeated by the block vote system —which deplored mass unemployment and said that the answer was a 35-hour week, six weeks annual holiday for all workers, retirement at 60 for all—[Interruption.] I can understand why Opposition Members want to shout me down. This was the Labour party's answer to mass unemployment. That motion also called for a massive programme of public works, and believed that the "only solution is a socialist plan of production based on clause IV, Part 4 as the first priority of the next Labour government."

Mr. Prescott: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. King: No. I just wish to deal with this point. Is that what Labour Members really believe?

Mr. Prescott rose——

Mr. King: We know that it is not.

Mr. Prescott rose——

Mr. King: The hon. Gentleman can intervene when I finish this part of my speech.

I wondered whether that was what all Labour Members believed. [Interruption.] I can understand Labour Members wanting to shout me down and not wishing to hear these quotations. We are grateful to the New Statesman which has provided us with a document from Walworth road about what some other people in the Labour party believe. I understand why the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) is waiting with interest. The Labour party's document states that the party and that it must start from scratch. I cannot help thinking that the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East has not got round to that piece of advice. The document continues by saying that the promises of full employment are over-ambitious and unconvincing.

"has little credibility on policies for dealing with the economy . . . Labour has lost the economic argument."

The third part of the package suggested that the Labour party should approach companies for donations. I would not send the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East as the ambassador on that assignment. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said

"We must appear relevant and modern. Our cloth cap image must be shed."

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): I never said that.

Mr. King: No one would accuse the right hon. and learned Gentleman of a cloth cap image, and I certainly excuse him from that charge. The right hon. and learned Gentleman continued——

Mr. Smith: Answer the debate.

Mr. King: I shall answer the debate. The right hon. and learned Gentleman continued:

It creates the image of Labour as a well-meaning party"——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. If hon. Members wish to intervene, they know that they must rise to their feet and challenge the Minister.

Mr. King: The right hon. and learned Gentleman continued:

"It creates the image of Labour as a well-meaning party that prints money to solve each and every problem."

As I listened to the programme suggested by the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East, it became clear that that lesson had not yet sunk in.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East) rose——

Mr. King: I shall give way in a moment. The jobs and industry campaign is to be launched shortly, of which one of the planks is a minimum of a £25 a week allowance for 16 and 17-year-olds in full-time education, yet the Labour party does not wish to appear to be printing money. That is about printing £1 billion of money.

Mr. Prescott: I am alarmed that the Secretary of State is the Government expert on trade unions and advises the Government about what trade unions do and do not do. I assure him that we do not hold a block vote at the Labour party conference. Members of Parliament have no vote at that conference. I am not embarrassed by the resolution that the Secretary of State is reading. The Secretary of State is opposing what every other European Government have been supporting, that is, a recommendation for the reduction of the working week and, probably, of overtime. That is one way of contributing to finding new jobs. Instead of criticising the resolution, the Secretary of State should make it clear that he is standing in the way of every other European Government which seek to follow that road.

Mr. King I am sure that I am not the only hon. Member to be deeply shocked by the revelation that so thin and shallow is democracy in the Labour party that Labour Members are not allowed a vote at their own party conference. [Interruption.] If I was wrong and had too high an opinion of the Labour party, and if in fact, Labour Members have no vote, I apologise. I did not wish to be derogatory about the Labour party.

Mr. Leighton: Does the Secretary of State realise that it is offensive to the House for him to be so flippant and to spend his time on a knock-about attack on the Labour party conference? [Interruption.] If the Secretary of State can hear above the Whips' shouting, will he use his valuable time to explain the Government's policies and not waste the time of the House with this knock-about turn?

Mr. King: I listened to a long speech from the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East and it is my duty to start by exposing the hon. Gentleman's complete hypocrisy in this matter, not least because a large part of what he said is specifically contradicted by the Labour party's policy document in which his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East has some interest.

The hon. Gentleman stated in guarded terms the Labour party's policy on youth training. If the hon. Gentleman is seeking to be a member of an alternative Government, he should know that resources will be limited to the proposal for the youth training scheme in the motion that was carried at the Labour party conference. The Labour party's proposal for youth training

"calls on unions to launch massive recruitment campaigns of YTS trainees to fight for full trade union control, union rates of pay, health and safety protection,"

—which they already have—

"five weeks paid holiday and 35 hour week."

Does anyone seriously think that those changes are the highest priority for a youth training programme? It is vitally important that we build up the training content of it. [Interruption.] If hon. Gentlemen are telling me that the motion was not carried by a sufficiently large majority to make it binding on the party, the House should note that it was carried by a majority at the Labour party conference.

Dr. Hampson: Will my right hon. Friend inform Opposition Members and their spokesman who lauded the German example that in Germany, where they have youth training for 18-year-olds, it is recognised that the rate of pay should be dramatically lower than the average skilled worker's wage? On the other hand, our trade unions strive desperately to make the rates of pay as close as possible. That is why our employers are unwilling to hire young people.

Mr. King: I thank my hon. Friend for that comment.

I turn to the serious issues behind the motion. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East wasted the time of the House with rhetoric and rage when our unemployed deserve a more constructive approach to the problems that they face. People are not fooled by such presentation because they know that much more serious issues are at stake. The hon. Gentleman is cruel to deceive the people when he implies that if he and his colleagues were in government they could wave a wand. We must start with a sensible analysis of the problem. Over many years we have had the biggest shake-out in employment. People forget that only 10 years ago 228,000 people worked in our steel industry. Today there are only 71,000.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): That is the Government's fault.

Mr. King: The hon. Lady may like to recall that the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) said:

"We did not avoid the responsibility of acknowledging the unavoidable need for manpower reductions. . . . Those outside the industry who pretend that steel can survive without very major changes are indulging in the most callous falsehood in the hope of instant popularity."

We heard an echo of those latter words—

"indulging in a most callous falsehood in the hope of instant popularity"— in the speech of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East.

It is sobering to remember that, 30 years ago, 700,000 people worked in the coal industry, whereas now only about 190,000 work there. Thirty years ago, the railways employed 600,000 people, but the figure has now decreased to 180,000. Major changes have taken place against that background, and we have had to face the other serious problem of the increase in the work force during that period. It has increased by 3 million since 1955 and by 1·75 million since 1975. Against that background, an uncompetitive Britain has been least equipped to face the problems. Few hon. Members seemed to recognise the quotation given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister last Thursday:

"The only answer to the economic problems which have dogged Britain . . . is to improve the performance of our manufacturing industry."—[Official Report, 7 March 1985; Vol. 74, c. 1165.]

Those were the words of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer.

There is no substitute for a sound and stable framework of economic and industrial policy, and our first priority has been to control inflation and to restore competitiveness. Our second objective has been to remove the obstacles to employment both in training—that is one area on which there may be rather more agreement between both sides of the House—and in taking effective measures to help those hardest hit.

[Mr. King]

The first of those components was the need to create a sound economy and to reduce inflation. The House knows the progress that we have made in that respect. The success has been mirrored, not in the three years of growth as the hon. Gentleman said, but in four years of sustained growth. As he knows, that has been reflected in the significant improvement in profits in manufacturing industry. Hon. Members on both sides of the House will welcome the dramatic improvement in investment in manufacturing industry, which increased by 13 per cent. during the past year, on the back of an increase in profits of 20 per cent. Manufacturing exports increased sharply by 11 per cent. during the past year, and the evidence of improved performance with the remarkable export figures that were quoted last week is further confirmation of an improvement in the economy.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): The right hon. Gentleman speaks of an improvement in manufacturing investment. Will he confirm that since his Government came to office investment fell by more than £3,000 million —by 41 per cent.—until less than a year ago? What little recovery there has been is simply an attempt by industry to beat the deadlines on investment allowances and on regional development plans.

Mr. King: It is true that, at first, there was a substantial decrease and much uncompetitiveness in the teeth of recession. There was also poor productivity—the trade unions cannot excuse themselves from blame—and a failure effectively to use investment. The more recent figures, which show an improvement in investment, may be marginally affected by the arrangements announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but I believe that there has been a significant improvement flowing directly from the 20 per cent. increase in profits.

Part of our policy has been to try to improve competition, and one of the most successful components of it is—that dreadful word—privatisation. Does any hon. Member seriously suggest that we should turn Associated British Ports back into the British Transport Docks Board? Does anyone suggest that we should change the National Freight Company back to British Road Services? Does anyone suggest that British Telecom would be better off if it was back in the Post Office mixed up with the postal services?

If we are to have the serious and constructive discussion that the subject deserves, I hope that Opposition Members will admit, as they do privately, but prefer not to do from political platforms, that our privatisation programme has been widely welcomed. We have just had excellent news from China concerning Cable and Wireless, whose chairman said that new vigour and vitality has flowed through that organisation since it entered the private sector, which I hope will be accepted by all hon. Members.

We have not only had an improvement in the economy —[Laughter.] I am surprised that right hon. and hon. Members find employment, about which I thought they were so concerned, a matter for such continual ribaldry. I and my right hon. and hon. Friends believe that the subject is much more serious than that. The public will notice that the matter has been treated with levity by the Opposition, which is not the way in which the House should address this matter.

As we begin to have a stronger economy, we begin to see an improvement in unemployment which every hon. Member recognises is our most serious problem. The feature of unemployment until 1983 was not only an increase in the working population but a substantial loss of jobs. I have told the House before that we can demonstrate that we have turned the first corner. There are now more jobs—not just part-time jobs, as the hon. Gentleman tried to say, but full-time jobs. The number of self-employed is also increasing sharply. At last, instead of having fewer jobs, we have more jobs. Of course, we are not creating enough extra jobs to take up the increase in the working population, but the important thing is that we have turned that first corner.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): The Secretary of State mentioned levity. Can he not distinguish between levity and derision? How does he reconcile the statement in the Government's amendment, which welcomes a commitment to develop training opportunities for young people and adults, with the closure of skillcentres?

Mr. King: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for bringing me precisely to my next point, which deals with the removal of obstacles in the labour market and the opportunities for employment. Training is at the heart of that.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East referred reasonably to the National Institute "Economic Review", which highlights clearly, as did "Competence and Competition" and other reports in this area, the serious problems that we face in training and the need to develop, encourage and stimulate more training and better standards of qualification at all levels, including management, supervision and on the shop floor. The report shows that, although there has been investment in new technology, it has not been used fully because of a lack of skill and competence in its use. The changes that we have in skillcentres are precisely directed to that point.

We have decided not to go on training people in areas where fewer than half have a prospect of getting a job when there are shortages of skills in many other areas for the same reason. We have also increased capital expenditure on new technology and new equipment in the skillcentres. We are increasing the facilities to make the training more widely available in sectors that are some distance from the fairly limited existing range of skillcentres and we are ensuring that we are able to increase the amount of training that we provide. That is our determination and it is intended not so that the Government can wave a wand but so that we can give a lead in certain respects. We shall be active in encouraging what confidence and competition bring out—the need for employers to make a major contribution to investment in the future.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): Does not the right hon. Gentleman understand that he is inflicting injury on the areas from which he removes the skillcentres? Does he not understand that some areas are determined to fight for their skillcentres? If he is serious about giving skills, could we not have a much bigger programme that would enable those skillcentres to continue and others to be set up?

Mr. King: I know that the right hon. Gentleman takes some interest in this matter, so he will know that we intend to expand the training programmes so that in the vast majority of areas we shall be doubling the number of people who are able to get training in the coming year. He will also know of the request that I made——

Mr. Foot rose——

Mr. King: The right hon. Gentleman asked me this question, and I have been speaking for a long time, so I shall continue answering it. He will also know that I have specifically said to the chairman of the Manpower Services Commission that no closures should go ahead until he is satisfied with the alternative arrangements that are to be made. Some can be made quite easily. It will mean that resources will be released that can be used more effectively for training and will not be lost through losses and deficits from centres that are under-utilised.

The third leg of our policy is that during the recovery of the economy and the creation of more jobs, we have been anxious to be as effective as possible in the measures that help those who are hardest hit by the difficulties through which we are passing. I make no apologies for the developments that we have made on the enterprise allowance scheme, which has been as successful as any special programme and is being copied by other countries in the European Community as an effective method of helping the unemployed to start up their own businesses.

The success of the youth training scheme in helping youngsters to get effective training and a real start in their working life for the first time is something that I would have hoped that the whole House would support. I only hope that Labour Members will learn to improve their view of it.

I hope that the House will welcome the fact that the community programme, which I know is widely supported in the House, is to have added to it proposals for training to help the longer-term unemployed have a real chance of getting back into work. From the first signs, it looks as though we are making progress.

The background to the debate is somewhat different from the figures that the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East gave. Some 66 per cent. of our working population is at work, against an average of 60 per cent. for the European Community, and those figures are somewhat different from the figures that he gave. We shall have to check his figures. My figures show that the United Kingdom had 66 per cent. in work, France and Germany had 61 per cent., with about 55 per cent. in Holland.

We have a higher proportion of our working population in work and we have turned the first corner in creating more jobs. But we also recognise the role that the Government can play. The country as a whole also has a role to play — industry, trade unions, employees and those who have opportunities to train to help to improve their potential for employment. We are determined to help people create jobs and get jobs. In the meantime, we are also determined to help those without jobs. Those are the policies on which we have stood and which we shall pursue. I commend the amendment to the House.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): The Secretary of State spoke of turning the corner. We have had this kind of optimistic forecast for a number of years, but we seem no further forward. In spite of these "jam tomorrow" forecasts, the situation is, if anything, getting worse.

The Secretary of State referred to inflation. There would be no argument about the necessity for grappling with and reducing inflation, and I have gathered from Government claims that inflation has been conquered. Rising unemployment was put in the scales in the Government's fight against inflation. That objective has been achieved and inflation has been brought down to a reasonable level, but the unemployment figures continue to rise. If that were the sole purpose of the exercise, it has been much ado about nothing.

I shall refer to the Scottish context. In January, Scotland's unemployment figure was 16 per cent., the same as it was in the disastrous month of February 1983. So much for the ridiculous claims by the Government, and by the Secretary of State for Scotland in particular, that Scotland is leading the United Kingdom out of a recession. That has not been noted in Scotland and it is one of the most fraudulent claims that has ever been made. All the evidence — output, business optimism and unemployment figures — conspire against any assertion that Scotland is leading a recovery in the United Kingdom.

The figures from the Department of Employment show how serious the position has become, even in one year. In January 1984, in my constituency 19 people were chasing each vacancy. In January 1985 that had gone up to 36 —almost double. In Tayside, a year ago 38 people were chasing each job, but now more than 61 are chasing each job. That shows that February's unemployment figures do not improve the problem. Rather, they show that the position has become considerably worse. Even on an unadjusted basis, although it went down slightly, the hard core figure is unfortunately still relentlessly travelling upwards.

Over several years the Scottish industrial base has been dismantled. Industrial production is less than 90 per cent. of the 1975 level, and neither the oil-related employment nor the advent of the micro-electronics industry has been able to provide enough in the way of new jobs. If it were not for the fact that 18,000 skilled and qualified people leave Scotland each year, mass unemployment would be even worse.

We are often told in Scotland that we are not as badly off as some other regions of the United Kingdom. In unemployment terms that is the case at present, but we should never allow people to believe that Scotland's situation has improved over the past few years. The regions of England with which we are compared, such as the north, the north-west and the midlands, have merely got much worse. It is no consolation to us in Scotland to be told that we are better off than some poor region which is going through a traumatic period of industrial readjustment and is experiencing horrific levels of unemployment.

Another truth is that we have had various initiatives in Scotland which were supposed to improve our position. There is no doubt that some of them have. We have had regional policy initiatives over many years, although these are now being downgraded. Since 1975 we have had the Scottish Development Agency, which I claim was set up largely as a result of the pressure of having 11 Members of my party elected to the House of Commons.

It is not unusual for hon. Members representing constituencies in the north of England to complain about Scotland getting what they describe as favoured treatment. My reply to that complaint is that if we in Scotland have been getting a good deal out of the British system, there can be no argument for our staying in it. If we have had any sort of favoured treatment in the past, I dread to think what would have happened if we had never had any.

In any case, it is a myth that Scotland has had anything that it did not fully deserve. We contend that we deserve a lot more, and that is why self-government is essential for the improvement of the employment position in Scotland and, indeed, every other aspect of life there.

Scotland should never experience an unemployment figure even of 16 per cent. The paradox is that potentially we are a tremendously wealthy country with a favourable size of population compared with the balance of resources. Yet, as a region of the United Kingdom, we are one of the poorest parts of Europe. I maintain that self-government is the key to resolving that paradox and the way to ensure that Scotland enjoys the low unemployment level of 3 or 4 per cent. which exists in those independent countries of Austria, Norway and Sweden. I contend that that is the league in which Scotland should be included. It should not be part of the United Kingdom, where the Government seem to be indifferent to growing unemployment, with no policy being put forward to improve the situation. It has come to be regarded like the common cold: it has to be endured, but it cannot possibly be cured.

I warn the Government that in the present climate people will not stand indefinitely for a Government who are totally indifferent to the unemployment figures.

5.32 pm

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): I agree at least with the right hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart) that we have had these debates before and that inevitably some rather repetitive elements come into them. However, despite all the clatter that the Front Bench contributions seemed to raise, and despite the noise that came from the 25 Labour Members who listened to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) giving his rather bellicose introduction of the motion, over time the climate in these debates is changing and some new and more realistic understandings are creeping in. I have in mind two in particular.

The first is a wholly positive and constructive one. It is that there is a very great deal to be done which can be done without inflationary finance. We are not caught in that hopeless trap which many people thought existed 10 years ago, where any attempt to counteract the forces creating a new employment pattern would lead immediately to an upsurge in inflation. Certain things can be done and, during the time of this Government, I believe that we have begun to establish the possibilities within a sensible non-inflationary framework.

The second realisation is that we are dealing with part of a huge worldwide trend of changes in the pattern of employment and in the nature of work. There are those who have said several times, including today, that there are other countries which seem to have done better. They cite Japan, with its amazingly low unemployment level, and the United States of America, which has created millions of jobs. That is true, although I advise hon. Members that these matters are not quite as obvious as they seem. For a start, in Japan the unemployment figures tend not to include people who have been unemployed and are no longer seeking work after a few months. Recently, I had the opportunity to write an article which was published in Japan praising the Japanese for their low unemployment figure. I got back some very rude remarks from all over Japan to the effect that that was not so, that they had a very high unemployment rate, and that the true figure was disguised in certain ways. We ought not to fall too easily for the idea that some wonders are taking place there.

It is true that in the United States an enormous number of new jobs have been generated. A great many regulations and inflexible obstacles standing in the way of millions of people getting into work have been got rid of. But we must not forget that of the school leavers in the United States 73 per cent. go on to higher education, whereas here it is between 40 and 44 per cent. That explains why a great many people who would otherwise, I suspect, be looking for work in the United States do not feature in the unemployment figures.

So my first simple point is that all countries face entirely new conditions as the structure of industry changes in all the industrialised world.

Mr. Williams: The right hon. Gentleman overlooks the magnitude of the addition that Government policies have made to job losses in Britain. Is he aware that, since this Government came to office, of every 100 jobs that there were in manufacturing we have lost 23, whereas the Germans have lost 10, the French have lost 10, the Swedes have lost eight and the Japanese now have 103? The difference between those figures is the failure of this Government.

Mr. Howell: No one disputes that we have had a magnitude of change. Where the right hon. Gentleman is being a little shortsighted is in assuming that it all suddenly began in 1979. He knows that we have been trying to change our structure for a generation, under successive Governments, not, alas, with great success. Now, when reality intrudes, the structural change is very painful and difficult and creates ugly pockets of long-term unemployment which are a major social problem.

Since all countries face these new conditions, we, too, must realise that a totally new approach is required to the new employment conditions that are emerging throughout the industrialised and industrialising world.

I believe that we should start from a positive stance and get away from the gloomy idea that nothing can be done. We have to be realistic and accept that there is no possibility of a return to full employment in the conventional sense, which I suspect still lingers in the more romantic breasts of the Opposition, where we could see the preservation of an industrial society in which everyone had a job for 47 hours a week, 47 weeks of the year and 47 years of his working life. That world has gone. To try to pursue policies to bring it back will cause great disappointment and bitterness.

There is plenty to learn and plenty to do in modern society. There is no need to allow the outdated idea of the scrap heap to linger. That can be overcome, but only by setting ourselves new goals and by not continually talking about full employment as though we could get back to it in the old sense when we cannot.

We can go forward to a society which is fully occupied, in which people have the training and skills and the education opportunities to create employment for themselves and to fill their lives satisfactorily. We can do that and, in a sense, that should be the new goal for the 1980s, just as full employment was the goal for the 1950s and, under the Labour Government, the goal was fair shares for all in the late 1940s. Our goal should be a fully occupied society.

Mr. Marlow: Many people were very surprised when this massive and disastrous unemployment hit the Western world. Can my right hon. Friend say why we should not be surprised again in the future and go back to full employment? Why not?

Mr. Howell: Because the nature of employment is changing. If my hon. Friend reflects, he will see that the old pattern of very large manufacturing units employing thousands of people in heavy manual, semi-skilled work is disappearing, for obvious reasons. People are finding capital equipment and ingenious electronic equipment which in many cases can do the jobs better and with far less physical impact upon those who previously had to do them. All I am saying is that that pattern of full employment will not appear again. We have to work for and create social and tax policies for an entirely different pattern of employment.

If we do not recognise that and we continue battering away as though the old order could return, matters will get worse. It is puzzling and vexing to see the registered unemployment figure so high—and I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is very worried about it. Despite the growth of new jobs, including part-time jobs, the figure of unemployment, especially of people remaining in long-term unemployment, remains miserably high. Unless we are more vigorous in building on the approach that we are taking in this matter, the position will get worse.

In considering the plight of the inner city areas with high unemployment—and we do not need to think only of the north, and the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East should accept that Hackney and Tower Hamlets are good examples of such areas — it does no good to compare them with Ethiopia. That was an unfortunate bit of hyperbole coming from the pulpit. But nor, I believe, does it help the Conservative party, or public understanding of what the Government are trying to do, to attack episcopal hyperbole, because hyperbole is needed to bring home the urgency of the problem, particularly in inner city areas.

As I say, there is no need for the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East always to talk about the north in connection with other matters. One need go only 5 miles from here, to some of the inner city areas of east London, to find conditions which are totally unacceptable by the standards of any Government, and certainly by the goals which the Conservatives have set for the social market economy.

We must build on much of what the Government are doing and bring some new ingredients into what should be a new approach. Of what should that new approach consist? First, it should contain recognition of an aspect which Opposition Members have difficulty in recognising —that the pattern of employment is so changing that we now have not merely 2·25 million self-employed, with the numbers growing all the time, but that a whole, new style of life and pattern of activity of work and job creation is emerging. We have not fully recognised that change in our policies.

Further, about 23 per cent. of all people in work are working part-time. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East seemed to find that trend deplorable. Whatever his view of it, that trend will grow. More people will seek jobs on a flexi-time and part-time basis, with husband and wife working at different parts of the earning day to contribute to the family income.

That will be very much the pattern of the future, not merely because people find it more convenient, but because industry, using micro-electronic equipment and modernising with electronic devices, finds that its needs for jobs are less of the traditional type—the eight hour day fixed sort of employment throughout the week—and more of the type involving part-time work at different times of the day and night.

Secondly, we must extend the training and education facilities that we provide. The youth training scheme has been a success and we should build on that. I long for the development which some hon. Members on both sides of the House want, which is to carry on the YTS scheme through to provision for all up to 18 years of age. If we really had training or education available for every teenager, it would be right to recognise, with Lord Beveridge, that the dole for teenage school leavers was no longer an option.

That would be a sensible aim if, for every teenager, there was the opportunity of training or education. In that event, being unemployed and drawing unemployment pay would not be an option. If I felt that we had reached the stage when those facilities existed for every teenager in the land, I would willingly support the suggestions—I have no idea whether they will be turned into a policy—which were originally made, if not in the 1944 White Paper, by Lord Beveridge, that we should not necessarily have unemployment pay as an option for teenagers. That could happen if, in every case—and it would have to be in every case — they had the opportunity to do something else. That is an area in which we should move forward, and it sounded from what my right hon. Friend said that steps will be taken in that direction.

Thirdly, the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East was right to say that we must create a technically skilled labour force. We do not have that at present and much unemployment, particularly in inner city areas, is due to the fact that technical skills are not present. We must inject those skills not just into the school system but into the post-school system. We must create the understanding in schools and in further education that jobs come from enterprise.

We are now developing in schools young enterprise schemes which bring home the fact that jobs do not fall off trees or always come from the Government, or even from employers, but that more and more jobs come from new ideas, often generated by school leavers themselves.

Fourthly, we must develop a great deal more the idea of insulating benefits. That is the idea at the centre of the enterprise allowance scheme. Ten years ago some people would have been shocked at the thought that people drawing benefit from the state for being unemployed could also be employed. I suggest that hon. Members on both sides of the House are changing their views about that.

The enterprise scheme allows people to seek work, to establish themselves in jobs and earn while continuing to draw benefit. That is the sensible way forward and we shall see much more of that type of activity. When the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East says that part-time work is reprehensible, he overlooks the fact that opportunities of this type will open out far more in future and that we must adapt our social security policy, as we have begun to do, to allow for such changes.

Fifthly, we must face the issue of cutting taxes. Opposition Members have got themselves into a lather about the alleged choice between tax cuts and infrastructure spending. The choice is not that sharp. There is room for both. The cutting of taxes on lower incomes is essential for what are called "supply side reasons"—to encourage more people to go into and start up work, perhaps carrying on trades of a small but good income-earning nature—and when I talk of tax cuts I include the idea of cutting or restructuring the national insurance system in relation to contributions.

I welcome a number of effective studies that have been conducted by various people, including a number of hon. Members, among them a study done by my hon. Friends the Members for Lewisham, West (Mr. Marples) and for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman) and another study conducted by my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart), both of which recommended that type of tax cutting, which is the restructuring or lifting of the burden of the national income contribution, particularly in respect of the lower paid.

We have made major strides in getting rid of the surcharge, which a previous Labour Government, with great unwisdom, shoved on to employment and labour in the 1970s. Now we must get on and rethink the whole aspect of contributions.

Although all this will take time, because we are talking about resources, I would include in the tax cutting aim cutting that tax which was previously the child tax allowance, which became the child credit and which is now the child benefit. It would make sense, if there was room in due course, for that to be cut or, in other language, for child benefit to be increased.

We need to raise the VAT threshold because at its present level it is a great discouragement to new commerce and business to spring up, particularly in inner city areas.

Sixthly, we also need some infrastructure developments, although I do not share the view of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East that that would be an engine of employment. It clearly would not. One need consider only east coast electrification, which is costing £300 million to create 3,000 jobs, to see that it cannot be described as a great engine of employment.

However, small sums of expenditure, for example on home improvements and on refurbishing some of the fine inner city houses which have fallen into misery and decay, are worthwhile. Such expenditure should be encouraged, and it helps to stimulate the private sector and employment in that sector. We should not have any difficulties about that.

I should also like to see one or two spectacular projects go forward, including the Channel fixed link. That will best be done by private enterprise if it is pitched on a modest basis and not too much in the spirit of Jules Verne. If that is done, it should be possible to raise private finance for an attractive private service between private railway stations in London and Paris, with a private railroad right the way through from the United Kingdom to the continental mainland.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): I was suspecting that the Prime Minister had sacked the wrong member of the Cabinet, especially having listened to the contribution of the Secretary of State for Employment. However, was the right hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) not responsible for failing to get through the North sea gas-gathering pipeline? It would have been a magnificent job creation project and would have put Britain's energy policy ahead by many years.

Mr. Howell: It is a sad fact of government that it is not always possible to persuade one's colleagues of the virtue of certain projects. The one that the hon. Gentleman mentioned was and is dear to my heart. We would now be in a stronger position with our gas supplies and energy supplies generally if the project had gone ahead.

Finally, the end of the coal strike brings many opportunities for reducing energy and fuel costs. That will bring a direct social benefit for those who pay highly for their electricity and gas each week, as well as an enormous industrial benefit. We can now pave the way towards lower electricity prices. In the book of many of us, the central issue in the coal dispute has been to find a way of moving from high-cost electricity to entry into the international world of competition with competitive electricity prices. We now have the opportunity also to liberalise the natural gas market by linking our system with the continental grid and the Norwegian sector.

We have had to go through a hideous era of high energy prices—I was involved in it and found no pleasure in presiding over it when energy prices were roaring upwards—and there is now an opportunity to introduce a substantial lowering of natural gas prices. In many countries, and in Britain in due course, this process will force oil further out from the domestic heating market.

These few topics should be part of a broader picture which it is important to grasp and to take further forward. The central features of the picture are enterprise, education and training. Those are the three qualities which we should drive into the system by every possible means so that we can begin to ameliorate the appalling problems of inner city areas and high unemployment areas.

Can this be done? Is there enough room to enable it to be done? Does it involve a shopping list which no one can possibly pay? It is important to show the direction in which we are moving so that we can at least start on the chosen path. Can we make a substantial start? I believe that we can. A number of those who have argued over the years for sound money and prudent finance first and foremost are now rightly saying that there is fairly considerable room for making quite a good start along the path which I have described even as soon as next Tuesday 19 March.

Mr. Samuel Brittan is a friend of mine and a respected commentator, and only the other day he wrote in the Financial Times:

> "A £9·5 billion projected borrowing requirement based on credible spending estimates would be better received than £5 billion based on funny numbers."

That is a sound comment and one that I would commend to all hon. Members. The City editor of the Daily Telegraph wrote:

> "A hair-shirt budget to please fickle financial minds would in these circumstances be wholly inappropriate."

Professor Patrick Minford of Liverpool, the high priest of the supply siders, argues that we should go for a borrowing requirement of £8 billion. The truth is that with these sorts of figures, additional revenues from the higher dollar price of oil and any tax additions which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is able to raise from other sources — I suspect that there will be some — a considerable start can be made in implementing the type of programme that I have outlined without inflation and without pushing up interest rates.

There are those who ask how it is possible to talk in such terms during a sterling crisis. But it is a false perspective to imagine that we are in the midst of a sterling crisis that requires hair-shirt economics. There is, of course, the dollar crisis. The soaring price of the dollar is creating severe volatility and danger throughout the Western world and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is right to say that in due course it may have brutal results. There is no need for unilateral penance for this on the part of the United Kingdom.

The problem that we have in handling our economy, which our neighbours do not experience in handling theirs, is oil price instability, which is difficult to control. I think that we can make a slightly better contribution to resolving the problem than we have made so far. I understand that we shall be debating that issue on Thursday and I have no doubt that views will be expressed on that occasion.

In the meantime, we have a 14 per cent. interest rate, which obviously threatens recovery. We have that rate because we are told that it is necessary for money supply reasons and strict monetary policy. But monetary targets are now coming under control, so I think that there is room for lower interest rates in addition to the other items to which I have referred. An interest rate of 14 per cent. hurts employment in inner city areas such as Hackney and Tower Hamlets, and great industrial areas such as Birmingham, as much as high taxation and the other burdens of which we have spoken. We need to see lower interest rates and less tax burdens of all sorts. It should be realised that they are not alternatives to each other.

We need to see the expansion and extension of the idea of education and training far outside the period of formal education. We should build on the youth training scheme and other schemes over which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has presided so energetically and effectively. Above all, we need to bring home to the public that there is a goal that we can achieve. It is one that is within reach. It is not the same goal that we have sought to reach in the past. We must seek to move forward to a fully occupied society. I believe that we have the resources and confidence as a nation and Government to do that.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): In an overlong speech the right hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) made some constructive points, and that is more than can be said of the Secretary of State's contribution. The Secretary of State made no effort to rise to the occasion and to speak with the seriousness which we expect of someone in his position. It was obvious from his speech that he has no intention of changing the disastrous policies that he is pursuing. He has opted for the lemming approach of economics. We have had six years of that crazy stampede to destruction. Manufacturing industry has crumbled, bankruptcies have increased, interest rates are soaring and unemployment is rising to catastrophic levels. However, the Secretary of State has the brass neck to boast about the Government's achievements. I do not know how he does it.

The economic and industrial case against the Government has been well rehearsed, and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) on his scathing indictment of the Government. I would like to emphasise that the Government's policies are not only economically damaging, but deeply divisive. The old cliché about two nations has taken on a new and frightening dimension. There is a growing, enveloping, threatening, corrosive bitterness that is developing among the have-nots of our society. The great challenge for Britain is to secure economic change without social discord. Our economic decline, compared with that of other countries, underlines, despite what the right hon. Member for Guildford said, the need for economic improvement. To try to transform the economy by using the whip of fear and unemployment is to create sullen bitterness and eventually aggression. There will be aggression and it will come not just from the miners' strike.

The British people have shown that they cannot be intimidated during war. They certainly will not be bullied during peace. The Government are on a loser trying to bully and bulldoze the British people with their policies. There is no point in the Secretary of State boasting about statistics showing what the Government have accomplished, because those statistics are irrelevant to the millions of people on the wrong side of this great divide which has been created by the Government. Such speeches do not allay the fears, anxieties and bitterness.

I go along with the Secretary of State when he says that magic wands cannot be waved and miracles cannot be created and that there is no facile answer. My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East did not suggest that there was an easy answer. He suggested constructive alternative policies. Although there are no easy and simple solutions, the fact is that living standards and the lives of people can be improved and changed by Government policies. The Secretary of State knows that. Instead of the Government creating such policies, they are going in precisely the opposite direction. If all the Budget forecasts are correct, the Government will lurch even further away from progress if the Chancellor gives that £1·5 billion handout in tax relief to help the fortunate with jobs rather than create jobs for the unemployed.

The Government are making miscalculation after miscalculation and are further devastating the economy and dividing the nation. The Government miscalculate when they assume that tax cuts will create incentives and regenerate the competitive spirit. Most people who win the pools do not work harder—that is a fact of life. The captains of industry who next Tuesday will receive these free dividends from the Chancellor of the Exchequer will not work harder either. It will be a waste of money.

The Government miscalculate in their assumption that the free market can solve——

Mr. William Cash (Stafford) rose——

Mr. Ashley: I usually give way, but I shall not give way in a 10-minute speech. Privy Councillors should not abuse their position and make long speeches. Ten minutes is my maximum.

The Government's mistake is in assuming that the free market can solve our economic problems. The Government miscalculate in their confident assumption that public intervention is damaging. Conservative economists can construct the most elaborate theories on the operation of the market, but experience—not only in Britain but throughout the world — shows that free markets get out of hand if they are left to run riot. The market has a role, but it should not be a dominant one.

Government intervention — I would call it Government involvement — is vital in a modern economy. Beneficial intervention can take many forms — investment, training and exports are but few examples. Perhaps the most significant example in terms of unifying our divided nation is Government intervention in regional policy.

Before the Government, in their slavish adherence to the free market philosophy, began to dismantle regional policy, that policy was primarily responsible for helping to iron out some of the appalling inequalities between wealthy and poverty stricken regions. The policy reduced not only inequalities between regions but the divisions in our society. When the Minister of State, in a recent statement, spoke of "flexibility and cost effectiveness" he was using euphemisms for slashing the regional aid budget. That is a shallow and short-sighted policy, because the Government are merely accelerating the great divide.

The Government have failed, not only to help devastated areas, but to prevent areas which are now on the slide from becoming devastated areas. I hope that the Minister of State will tell us whether he was right in saying that there was a 35 per cent. limit on those living in designated areas, thus preventing some areas from being helped. Conflicting answers have recently been given to me, and I would appreciate clarification.

If the Government are to do more for the regions, they need a deeper understanding of and a more subtle approach to the problems. North Staffordshire is a case in point, because that region has been pounded by a series of devastating body blows. It will soon resemble a punch-drunk boxer. The Government should help the area, because it is disastrously reliant on a handful of industries, none of which is a growth industry in terms of employment. Mines, potteries and steel have shed nearly 40,000 jobs over the years. No regional economy can sustain such loss without a grave threat to its future—especially one such as north Staffordshire, which has a below average percentage of jobs in the service sector.

When north Staffordshire asked for aid, the Minister gave a negative answer. The Government should change their attitude not only to that region but to all the regions and recognise the virtue and value of Government intervention. Above all, the Government should tackle the scandal of mass unemployment. Mass unemployment on this level is not simply a disappointment; it is a major scandal. The Government need to give constructive help to individuals, regions and the economy. I hope that the Government will ditch their dogma, park their prejudices, stop the devastation and bring constructive help to the economy as a whole.

6.8 pm

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): I have listened to this debate, as to previous debates on unemployment, with great interest. Like my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell), I believe that we can return to full employment. There are no quick and easy solutions. The problems go back many more than the six years to which the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) referred.

I have studied the problem of unemployment as it has built up. I keep all the papers that I have read and those that I hope to read in a large cardboard box at home, and I keep finding that I need a larger box. It is obvious that there are no magic cures and no miracles. The more I study the matter, the more I come to the inescapable conclusion that there is only one answer and only one way in which we can be rid of unemployment and achieve our true goal —a higher real standard of living for all our people.

The Germans and the Japanese know the answer. They have had no choice. They have increased their share of world markets by sheer hard work while ours has declined. After the war, those countries had no alternative but to turn their nations into what we like to forget now—one big sweatshop. Everyone was busy toiling for their survival and, ultimately, a higher standard of living than this country has today.

If we find the swimming pools of competitive world markets too chilly for our comfort, the answer is for us to warm ourselves by the heat of our exertions and not to confuse the moist air of our welfare saunas with the true sweat of our brows. Our ancestors sweated to make this country the greatest workshop in the world.

The Americans are still fired by the Protestant work ethic. What has happened to our faith in this country? Our new immigrants pack their mosques. Must we look to our ethnic minorities to achieve the fruits of hard work, whether it be the newest millionaires or the latest recruits to the Cabinet, while we still hear the unions' parrot cries for more comfort and less work?

Why has supplementary benefit become a staple diet for so many in this country who have been priced out of work? Supplementary benefit should be what it says it is—a supplement to an income from a real job — not a substitute for earned income. We must encourage people to take whatever work they can find and then supplement the income of those in greatest need. It is total household income that counts — take-home pay and supplements. Family income supplement was brought in by a Conservative Government. It was opposed by the Labour party. Wages councils have failed. They have legislated for pre-tax earnings and done nothing to reduce unemployment. That has increased the burden of taxes on the low paid who are in work.

The Government may think that their job is to sit on their hands but first they must untie the burden of legislation. If help to the self-employed and small firms is another way of saying, "Free the people", I am all for it. All our firms are small by world standards. We shall restore this country to greatness and increase the standard of living of all our people only by the sweat of our brows.

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): I heard what the hon. Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) said. Like him, I am a professional engineer. I rather suspect that we must have worked under different circumstances if he believes that the solution to our problems is the "sweat of the brow" argument.

The Secretary of State made one of his less worthy contributions to our debates. I thought that he was beginning to represent the hard face of his party. I now realise that, relatively speaking, he is now on the wet side, given the speech that we have just heard. The Secretary of State's speech boiled down to a confession by the Government that they have no idea what to do next.

The House is discussing the tragedy of unemployment. It is all around us. In our visits to our constituencies and communities, we are only too well aware of what is happening. There are 3·25 million people who have succeeded in obtaining assistance from the Government because of their unemployment. By the old method of calculating unemployment, we probably have 3·75 million people unemployed; 1·3 million of them have been unemployed for longer than a year. I have visited people on YTS schemes and have been disappointed to hear of the frustration and disappointment felt by many young people on the schemes. I believe that they could be a useful part of the training structure. It worries one to find that drugs and vandalism are all part of life. I believe that they are related to unemployment.

I take issue with the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) because he kept talking about the north and the south as if the south were some employment paradise. My county has 24·3 per cent. of its male population unemployed. That is as bad as anywhere in this country. We have the distinction of having the biggest unemployment black spot.

Today we are talking about manufacturing. That is fortunate, because I believe that the biggest tragedy of the past 10 years—I am not being so narrow as to pretend that it started only with this Government—has been the loss of our manufacturing base. We now have a deficit of over £6·2 billion a year on manufactured goods. There is no alternative for this nation but to earn its living through manufacturing in its broadest sense. The ability to make and sell things is the basis of the British economy. We cannot have an economy based on the export of raw materials because we do not have them on any long-term basis. This is a densely populated country. We live on our ingenuity. Britain was built on its ingenuity. We are seeing the erosion of a great deal of that ingenuity and of the opportunity for people to use and explore it.

There is no future in the overmanning of our industries, discouraging investment, or restrictive work practices. They are not solutions to our problems. Great Britain, which I believe has a future—I am sure that the House believes that—should be using at least a portion of its oil money to rebuild its economic base. Instead, we see some £10 billion a year leaving Britain for investment overseas. Those funds are transferred by the Government's friends. There is no bolder comment by the economists and investors of our nation than the fact that they are willing to invest in anything anywhere but not here.

The Government have complicated matters by a long running policy of deliberately high interest rates. That kills all medium and long-term investment stone dead. The base rate is 14 per cent.—really 17 per cent., some 12 per cent. over inflation. It means that we are a quick-return economy. It partly accounts for the expansion of jobs in the service industries. They are welcome, but we shall not in the long term rebuild our economy on that base.

For a sustained period, the Government have used interest rates to keep the pound above what it would have been. Sadly, that has not stopped the pound falling; it has merely delayed it for a few weeks, months, or a year at the best. One wonders what has been gained. On the whole, that policy has kept imports cheaper and exports dearer than they would otherwise have been. That policy means a loss of jobs, a loss of value added, and the disappearance of the basis of our economy. It is difficult to envisage a policy that could have destroyed more jobs than the one that the Government have pursued over the past couple of years. A number of hon. Members have already agreed that many things need correction.

If we investigate the numbers of unemployed it is amazing to find—even in an area such as mine—how few skills there are, even with the horrifying unemployment levels. We need to increase our skills. There is a lack of investment in information technology.

The engineer in me tells me that in 15 to 20 years' time the economies that will be successful, buoyant and prosperous will be those that use the existing new technologies and apply them to many of what we regard as common or garden products. That is the basis of our economic future and it is where the Government should be applying their money. All the Government have done is cut skillcentres, cut technology in universities and cut development aid to some industries from £700 million to £400 million. That is a tragedy.

The alliance amendment outlines what it believes to be the basis of the Budget strategy. There is no lack of money. Unemployment must be causing losses of about £12 billion to the Chancellor. It is said that he has £1·5 billion available for tax cuts. We, like the right hon. Member for Guildford, believe that we could expand the PSBR without the economy collapsing around our ears, even if that ever was a reasonable risk. We believe that money could be used to cut national insurance contributions and to increase infrastructure investment.

In particular, we deplore the Government's refusal to allow local authorities to spend the money that they have accrued from council house sales. It is money that is actually in the bank; I am not talking about borrowed money. We should like to expand training and to build on the youth training scheme so that it includes all 16 and 17-year-olds. We should like to expand the community programme to the point where it includes 250,000 people.

Fundamental to the debate and to the judgment that we shall make on the Budget next week is the question whether the Government are at last recognising that the erosion and the loss of our industrial base is a tragedy not just for today, tomorrow or next year but for this generation and the next, and for the generation after that.

I believe that we have an anti-industry Government, sometimes accompanied by an anti-industrial philosophy within the nation. If we want an economic future for Britain, if we want better pensions for our parents, and a better Health Service, we have to get the industrial sector right. My accusation is that the Government have manifestly failed to do that. It is not easy for the Government to solve every problem facing them, but they could do better than they have.

Mr. Mike Woodcock (Ellesmere Port and Neston): I am privileged to represent the industrial town of Ellesmere Port, which has among its distinctions the fact that the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), who opened the debate, received his education there. It is a town that is full of good, honest, hardworking people, but it suffers from many of the problems of our industrial cities and towns. Above all, it is a town which is dazed by the present unemployment levels. In the past four years

[Mr. Mike Woodcock]

15,000 jobs have been lost in the area, and one person in four in the town is now in the dole queue. It is a tragic story.

In 1960 Ellesmere Port was a boom town. Investment was high, employment was high, major employers moved in, and a huge petrochemical complex was constructed, with not one but two major oil refineries. There was massive public sector housing, a new civic centre was built, and life seemed good for the people of Ellesmere Port.

Now young people find it almost impossible to get a job. Usually, Government training schemes are their only hope of employment. My surgeries are full of people who want to work, have the skill to work, and are of the age to work, but who find no work opportunities. They feel that their lives are being wasted. Together with unemployment, we have the associated problems of crime, vandalism and drugs, which are all on the increase. Undoubtedly, there is a direct link between those things and unemployment.

With 15,000 job losses in five years, with 5,500 people unemployed in the town today, and with one in four people on the dole, is it any wonder that the people of Ellesmere Port are losing hope? It is a problem on a scale which they cannot comprehend and certainly cannot solve.

Recently, we significantly added to the potential problem by the decision to introduce unleaded petrol, which poses a threat to 2,000 jobs in my constituency. I believe that that decision was wrong. I accept that the case for unleaded petrol has been argued and decided on another occasion, but that decision will destroy jobs in the lead industry, add significantly to industrial costs, and diminish the ability of the whole of British industry to compete in world markets.

In addition, last week the Shell Oil Company announced that a further 1,000 jobs are to go in Ellesmere Port. It is seeking a 30 per cent. reduction in staffing in the giant oil refinery in the town. We have already seen the closure of a small, uneconomic oil refinery in the town operated by Burmah, and we are now faced with massive job reduction in Britian's largest oil refinery. There is potentially a 20 per cent. increase in unemployment in the town.

I could respond in several ways. I could bleat about Government policy or the lack of it. I could criticise the company. I could implore the company to keep those workers on. I could demand massive state investment or state handouts to soften the blow. I could reiterate some of the arguments which have been heard today from the Opposition Benches. But I will do none of those things, because I do not believe that any of them provides the answer to unemployment.

For the answer, we need to look behind the problem. That refinery in my constituency was built when it was estimated that present consumption of oil would be twice what it is now. It was estimated that today the throughput of the refinery would be 20 million tonnes a year. The actual throughput is between 7 million and 8 million tonnes. Plans were laid for the refinery before the new industrial revolution that we are now going through, and before the smokestack economy of the United Kingdom began to deteriorate and diminish. At that time, there was a direct link between gross national product and energy requirements. Today, no such link exists.

Now there is a massive over-capacity in the oil industry, with the demand for oil products down by a massive 35 per cent. in the last 10 years. We now live in a different world, in which fundamental restructuring of economies is taking place all over Europe. The United Kingdom is no exception to that restructuring—and nor are the north-west, the oil industry and Ellesmere Port. Shell, like many other organisations, must respond. Its management has concluded that present work practices in the refinery are not competitive. There are too many levels of management, there is too much bureaucracy, and manning levels are simply not competitive.

A recent independent survey of refineries throughout Europe concluded that the Ellesmere Port refinery is one of the worst in Europe for manpower productivity. Therefore, it is right and proper that the company should put its house in order, become competitive and secure the future of the refinery. If that means job cuts, that, too, is right, but it is not the answer for 5,000 unemployed in the town or for the 1,000 who are likely to join them.

Before I suggest how we might create the necessary jobs, I should like to reflect for a moment on the relative positions of our two great energy industries, oil and coal, because they are both subject to Government policy, and it is the Government who largely determine the success and importance of each of those industries.

The oil industry contributes massively to the national purse through taxation; the coal industry does not. The oil industry receives no subsidy whatever; the coal industry receives massive subsidy from the taxpayer. The oil industry is profitable; the coal industry is unprofitable. The oil industry has no oppressive trade unions; the coal industry has. The oil industry has accepted economic reality; the coal industry is only now starting to accept economic reality.

If the same taxation and subsidy policies were applied to both industries, there would be no need for redundancies in my constituency. Oil would be so cheap and coal so expensive that there would be a massive increase in the demand for oil and a massive decrease in the demand for coal. How, then, can the Government justify redundant mineworkers receiving much bigger redundancy payments than redundant oil workers? Surely, given the favoured treatment of coal, the coal industry should be giving massive support to redundancy payments in the oil industry, rather than the reverse. The oil industry, through massive taxation, is helping to finance massive payments to the coal industry. Therefore, I ask the Government whether they will finance the same redundancy terms to oil workers in my constituency as are being offered to redundant workers in the coal industry.

However, leaving aside the unreasonable treatment of oil vis-a-vis coal, how can we create jobs in the new industries? How can we solve the problems of the 1,000 people who are to lose their jobs in my constituency? I do not believe that anyone knows the answer, but certain things will have to happen. Certain things will have to be done by the Government, by the management of British industry, by educators and trainers, and by trade unions.

I fully support the broad objectives of Government policy, but I want to see lower taxes on jobs, and less regulation and red tape in respect of those with the ability to create jobs. I want to see less employment protection, which today inhibits employment. I want to see cuts in business rates and more incentives, particularly taxation incentives, to smaller firms. Next week the Chancellor of the Exchequer has the opportunity to bring about those things, by bringing forward a Budget for jobs, which I sincerely hope he does.

Further, I want to see more concern about the decline of our industrial base. In the past four years our manufactured goods' trade with our EEC partners has increased each year by £2 billion, and they live in the same world as we do. It is not enough to talk about growth in the service sector. It is no use having a service sector if there is nothing left to service. Nor is it enough to rely on North sea oil to fill the gap. That should be a bonus that pays for the re-equipment that is necessary in the new industrial revolution, not a subsidy that allows continuing inefficiency and uncompetitiveness. I want to see the introduction of some temporary schemes that utilise the unemployed, to deal with our crumbling infrastructure, derelict land and vandalism. I want to see the expansion of community service programmes to provide socially worthwhile jobs for young people.

I also want to see management looking much more overseas, not only to export markets, but to management and work practices that are being adopted in more successful economies, notably in the United States of America and Japan. I want to see managers recognising that as Socialist ideology withers—which it is doing—managers have regained the right to manage and the duty to exercise strong leadership and to expand organisations to create new jobs. I want to see managers being opportunists again, as our forefathers were, by exploiting commercial opportunities worldwide and by rekindling the flame of entrepreneurship and innovation. I want to see wider opportunities for share ownership and profit sharing.

I want to see a better attitude on the part of educationists by realising that education must be relevant to industrial needs and job creation. They should realise that they have to respond to the same realities as those whom they serve. I want to see better management training in industry. It is probably true to say that the average plumber receives more training than the average manager in this country. I speak from 20 years' experience in industrial training. Far too much of our management training is carried forward by groupie, soft behavioural scientists with Left-wing views. Those who train managers are key opinion-formers who need commercial understanding and commercial values themselves. Finally, I want to see a more reasonable attitude from trade unions and the adoption of a more flexible approach to the essential restructuring that is taking place.

If the Government, management, trainers and trade unions do those things, we shall begin to create the new jobs that we so desperately need.

Mr. Jack Dormand (Easington): I shall make a brief speech on a rather narrow but important part of the unemployment problem. However, I shall preface my theme by referring to the Secretary of State's speech. I am sorry to have to say that I found it superficial, meretricious and, indeed, patronising. It did the House no good, on the most important subject of the day—that of unemployment—to have the 15-minute knockabout speech that we had from the Secretary of State, when all my right hon. and hon. Friends were waiting to hear what the Government would do about unemployment. It was a most disappointing speech. I am genuinely sorry that that happened.

I should also like to refer to the speech of the right hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell). He referred to my part of the country, the northern region, on three occasions. If I understood him correctly, he said that we need not look to the north these days because there are comparable situations in other parts of the country. I hope that that is reasonably correct——

Mr. David Howell indicated assent.

Mr. Dormand: I see that the right hon. Gentleman nods in agreement.

It is a condemnation of the Government's policies when we have such a situation throughout the country. I mentioned that for this reason, coming from the North as I do and having made many speeches on its problems. The unemployment rate of the northern region remains the highest in the country outside Northern Ireland. Since the Government came to power in 1979 the rate has increased literally every month.

I should like to deal with present and future unemployment in the coalfields. I remind the House, if it needs reminding, that the year-long miners' strike, which has just ended, was about jobs and the effect of pit closures on mining communities. It was not about wages and working conditions. The fact that the miners and their families were prepared to endure so much hardship for so long demonstrates their concern about jobs.

I heard the chairman of the National Coal Board on Radio 4 yesterday, when he made it abundantly clear that he could hardly wait to close uneconomic pits. When closures take place—I suspect that it will not be too long before they do—the Government must accept great responsibility for the provision of alternative employment. It is significant that the first statement about Government action to provide alternative employment in the coalfields did not come until the strike was in its ninth month. That in itself demonstrates the Government's lack of commitment to the mining areas. Thought, planning and preparation should have been undertaken when the Government came to power in 1979, having regard to their well-known attitude towards the coal industry.

When the first statement was made, what did it say? It said that the magnificent sum of £5 million was to be made available to help with the provision of new jobs. I well remember the guilty look on the face of the Secretary of State when he made that statement. He knew that it was nothing more than a token gesture. The fact that he doubled the amount to £10 million shortly afterwards was proof of the inadequacy of the provision. He has gone further since then and said in answer to a question from me that if more than £10 million was required, he would look at the position again.

The fact of the matter is that if the Government really believe in providing new jobs for redundant miners, a sum of at least £50 million will be needed in the first place if the mining areas are even to begin to have the opportunity to have a new life. After all, we are talking about a dispute that has cost the nation £3·5 billion—indeed, some estimates have doubled that amount. The sum that I am suggesting is trivial compared with what the Government have spent in their efforts to break the strike. It is facts such as those that make us wonder whether the Government are really concerned about helping the mining communities when pits begin to close. We shall need much more proof than has been shown so far.

[Mr. Dormand]

Another aspect of Government policy should be re-examined. I understand that the funds provided are to be administered by a private consortium. I presume, therefore, that the governing factor for any investment project will be whether it will make a profit, and so there will be an ultra-cautious approach to the investment. I make it clear that I am not against making a profit. However, in the circumstances that will arise in the coalfields—I repeat that it seems to me that they will arise shortly—we shall need a bold, imaginative and high-risk attitude towards those problems. Why is it a private consortium? It ought to be a public body, with people on it who know the coal mining areas, who know their people and their attitudes. I ask the Government to think again about that, otherwise we shall have a narrow, restrictive and unimaginative policy that will have little or no effect on job opportunities in the coalfields.

I conclude with a special plea for the north-east. There are three successful job finding agencies there—the new town corporations of Washington, Aycliffe and, in my area, Peterlee. The corporations are concerned not just with the new towns, as many people appear to think, but with a much larger sub-region. In the past eight years, the Peterlee development corporation has provided no fewer than 6,000 new jobs. That success story is based on dedication and expertise. Yet, incredible though it may seem, the Government propose to abolish all three development corporations in nine months' time, presumably just when the first pit closures begin to take effect.

I realise that this is a matter for the Department of the Environment and having raised the matter many times in the past three years I appreciate that that Department is looking at the matter again. Nevertheless, I strongly urge Ministers at the Department of Employment to add their weight — I see the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State nodding assent—to the case for extending the life of those corporations not for ever but at least for four or five years. The way in which the miners' strike has ended gives new urgency to that need. I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster), who represents Aycliffe new town, is present and indicating his support. It would be the height of lunacy to wind up the corporations at a time when the threat of further unemployment in the north-east looms so large. I hope that Ministers in all the Departments concerned will add their weight to the opposition against this madcap proposal. If they can face with equanimity the prospect of 50 per cent. male unemployment in an area such as the north-east it will be further proof of their callous and uncaring attitude to the crucial problem of unemployment.

Mr. Piers Merchant (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central): The debate will remain utterly sterile if it develops, as it began, into an argument about where to attribute blame rather than how and where to take action. I am interested in the latter because I come from a constituency in the north and from a city in which unemployment is 20 per cent. or more. In some areas which I represent unemployment is more than 50 per cent. and I care deeply about those in my constituency and elsewhere who are suffering as a result of unemployment.

I should dearly love to be able to prescribe an immediate cure that would sweep away unemployment tomorrow, but that would be cheap and misleading, because, as the House well knows, there is no such prescription. Yet the Opposition like to pretend that they have just such a prescription. Today their prescription is more and more public spending and that is now being advanced with abandon by Labour Members. Of course, it sounds good and is superficially attractive. I admit that I, too, have at times been attracted by the simplistic argument that we should pour in Government money to cure unemployment. That is why in my maiden speech in July 1983 I called on the Government to produce public investment plans for the north-east to create more jobs —and I do not entirely recant. I welcome the go-ahead for the east coast rail electrification project, I wait in hope for Government investment in new power station building and I support further road modernisation projects.

There is scope for public spending where there is genuine need, but not simply for the sake of public spending. What has taught me to be more cautious than I was 18 months ago has been the near hysterical demand for more and more public cash on the basis that it will solve unemployment, when it is clear that that is not so, coupled with the clear proof that the present policies of spending restraint are working. The control of inflation, the steady annual growth in production and investment in new and profitable growth industries show that that is the way to high employment. Very high public spending has entirely the reverse effect because of the impact on inflation, taxation and interest rates.

I cite an example which deals with the claim made by the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) that rate rises do not contribute directly to high unemployment. He was presumably also trying to show that high taxation does not affect unemployment. That is rubbish, and provably so. In Newcastle, recent rate rises have been one of the most significant causes of unemployment and a severe dampener on the creation of the new jobs so badly required — a matter not even touched on by the hon. Gentleman.

I shall be more specific. On Wednesday, Newcastle is to fix a rate rise of 23 per cent. For the city alone, excluding the county precept, the rates will rise to 292·2p in the pound. Jobs have already been lost. One of the city's biggest stores — Bainbridge's, a branch of the John Lewis partnership—has said that 136 job losses in the past few years have been directly attributable to high rates. The rate that it pays in Newcastle city centre is now 20 per cent. higher than the rate applying to its store in Oxford street, which is arguably the best shopping site in the world. The present annual rate for that firm in Newcastle is £674,000. It is no wonder that jobs are affected. That shows that the argument that rate rises have no effect on employment is absolute rubbish. I could cite many more examples of commercial ventures in Newcastle to prove that rate rises squeeze out employment.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): Does my hon. Friend agree that the disgraceful scenes in which there were cheers from the Labour party when Edinburgh fixed a rate increase of 79 per cent. are symptomatic of the Opposition's whole attitude to rates?

Mr. Merchant: It also shows a commitment to public spending for its own sake, without any real appreciation of the effect on employment.

Mr. Harry Cowans (Tyne Bridge): The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the largest enterprise zone is situated in Newcastle. If his argument is conclusive, he should be able to point to a boom in that area, because no rates are paid. In fact, there has been very little increase in the number of jobs created in the enterprise zone, although no rates are payable. Can the hon. Gentleman explain why that is so?

Mr. Merchant: The hon. Gentleman perhaps overlooked the Dreadnought project in his contituency, the mentors of which have cited the enterprise zone as a crucial factor in the establishment of a large factory with great relevance for future jobs and production in the city centre.

The high rate levels in Newcastle are a direct attack on employment and will have a direct and catastrophic effect upon jobs and thus on the livelihood and welfare of many hundreds of people. Nothing so clearly illustrates the double talk of Labour supporters on unemployment than their continual whining in opposition, when they fail abjectly to take any helpful or meaningful action when they are in a position to do so—as they are in the areas in which their party controls local government. It also exposes their claims in favour of high public spending as a job creator.

I want unemployment in this country, especially in the depressed areas, dramatically reduced — but on a permanent basis, not mere window dressing. Essentially, this requires the stimulation of enterprise, industry and investment, which in turn depends not on higher taxes, inflation and interest rates, but on the reduction of all three. Government action in those areas has already helped. Financial stability and low inflation have already attracted overseas investment to the northern region. We already have Nissan and Grove Cranes and others will undoubtedly follow.

Nevertheless, further steps are required to ensure the essential conditions in which an enterprise culture can flourish. More tax cuts are needed, with firm action to reduce interest rates without affecting low inflation levels. Inevitably, that requires firm control of public spending, and especially an end to the waste of public cash in subsidies to loss-making industries, which merely distort the economy and do not prevent long-term unemployment.

There would be thousands more jobs in the north-east today had money not been diverted in past years into trying to breathe life into dead industries—including part of the coal industry, to which the hon. Member for Easington (Mr. Dormand) referred. Money spent on subsidising the coal industry could more effectively have been invested in growing and profitable industries, which would have generated the jobs that are now lacking.

More steps are needed to promote enterprise, by reducing unnecessary controls in planning, tax and the labour market. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Woodcock), who summed up those points very neatly.

More must be done by the region to promote itself, and particularly to promote investment. Let us not, however, be diverted by the red herring of the Northern Development Agency. There are enough agencies already. In fact, there are too many. We need more co-ordination, but I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will give credit to the work already done by the North of England Development Council in attracting work and promoting the region. I hope that the council will continue to attract for that purpose the high level of Government support and cash help that it has enjoyed in the past.

Mr. Derek Foster (Bishop Auckland): Can the hon. Gentleman explain, when he is singing the praises of the North of England Development Council, how he can continue to support a Government who propose to reduce the council's budget by 30 per cent. although the region has the highest unemployment rate in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Merchant: I am happy to wait for the Government's announcement on that issue. I am confident that they will weigh up the situation in the north and take account of the need for promotion agencies to work in a proper and co-ordinated manner.

Electorally appealing though it might be, I do not propose to bore the House and court popularity by supporting a policy of high public spending. Such policies might create short-term jobs, but they would do nothing in the long term. I want lasting jobs and the necessary radical restructuring of the region's economic base. I want strong and inspired business leadership. I therefore support my Government's determination to tackle the fundamental problems, rather than just talk about them.

Mr. Tom Pendry (Stalybridge and Hyde): I do not propose to give way to any hon. Member. The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Merchant) gave way three times, and I think that he thereby did a disservice to the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not quite fair to the hon. Gentleman. I allowed him a little extra scope because he gave way. It is the practice in our debates that we give way if the need arises.

Mr. Pendry: I thought that I was courting your favour, Mr. Speaker, but never mind.

The official unemployment figure for my constituency is 17 per cent. or more, which means that about 6,000 men and women were without a job last month. The figure is not as high as in the constituencies of some other hon. Members who have spoken, but for my part of the world it is very high. Without doubt, too, the figure would be much higher if the Government made a proper count. We constantly hear that the Government consider hidden unemployment to be insignificant. By devoting their energies to peripheral pursuits such as chasing so-called social security scroungers rather than pursuing positive economic policies, the Government act as though unemployment of any kind is insignificant.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) believes that more than 4 million people are unemployed in this country. He may well be right. However, even the independent unemployment unit estimates that no fewer than 3·7 million people are unemployed, and that figure is significantly higher than the figure put forward by the Government.

A survey carried out in Tameside reaffirms the validity of those figures and shows clearly the under-counting involved in the official figures. Tameside council's figures show that since 1979 15,000 jobs have been lost in the borough, while unemployment has risen by 10,000. What has happened to the remaining 5,000 people? The answer is that Tameside has traditionally been an area where a large number of women work. In the past, a very large proportion of women in the borough have been either in paid work or looking for work. The basic rate of pay in Tameside is well below the national average, as has been pointed out many times in this place. Women have therefore been obliged to work in order to make ends meet.

Almost one in five of all people in all the working age bands in Tameside are now inactive. Over three quarters of the inactive people are female. Is it not ironic that a Government headed by a woman Prime Minister are driving women back to the home, not only in Tameside but in the country at large? The Government may consider that hidden unemployment is insignificant. It is not insignificant to the ordinary working people in my constituency. It may be considered insignificant in Winchester or in Eastleigh, which have unemployment rates of 5 per cent. or so. It may be insignificant to the working women of Tunbridge Wells or Guildford, where unemployment rates are less than 7 per cent. However, it is not insignificant in Hattersley, in my constituency, where unemployment is running at about 25 per cent.

My constituency is not the only one to suffer. As hon. Members from the south have made clear, the problems are not confined to areas north of Watford. However, the situation is especially difficult in the north, the north-east, the north-west, Scotland and south Wales. The institute for employment research at Warwick university has shown that for every 10 per cent. rise in the official unemployment rate there is a 7 per cent. fall in the number of women in the labour market. The more one examines the results of local surveys on employment trends the more clearly one realises the need for the Government to change their economic policy. The recent Tameside survey shows that roughly half those claiming unemployment benefit have been unemployed for more than a year. Among those aged 45 and over the percentage is 69 per cent. That is a crucial age band. There is a great deal of wastage among older skilled workers. However, for those aged 25 to 35, the figure is worse still. Over 70 per cent. of those claiming benefit in that age group have been unemployed for more than 12 months. How have the Government responded to the local situation? They have closed the skillcentre. That is the only response that they have made.

It is clear that the Government have misled the country over the true extent of the loss of jobs, and that they have dismally failed to respond adequately to the problems. Instead of closing down skillcentres, they should be pumping money into training. If they are not prepared to listen to the TUC, the CBI and the National Economic Development Council, perhaps they will be prepared to listen to the House of Lords Select Committee that considered the issue of unemployment, and that argued that the Government should expand the public services through selective expansion schemes. As the Government are worried about wage inflation, they might note that Professor Layard and Stephen Nichol of the London School of Economics have argued convincingly that long-term unemployment will have little or no effect on wage inflation. By refusing to act, the Government stand condemned.

It is unfortunate that Tory Members from the north-west have left the Chamber — thankfully there are not too many of them. It is not a case of Big Brother, but they are being monitored by Tameside council. By their voting habits, those hon. Members are widening the gap between north and south. In what the leader of the council, Roy Oldham, calls the "under one flag policy", constituents will be told clearly of the speeches and voting habits of Members of Parliament from the north-west. Those Tory Members would be well advised to note that they are being monitored.

Mrs. Currie: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it in order for the hon. Gentleman, who has refused to give way, to threaten hon. Members on the basis of what they have said in the House?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman must take responsibility for what he is saying. I have listened carefully and do not think that he is out of order.

Mr. Pendry: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Members of Parliament are being monitored because they are thought to be making matters worse for the areas that they represent. I am surprised if that is a denial of democracy. It is a democratic act by locally elected representatives. Tory Members from the north-west ignore that monitoring at their peril.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): I represent an area with high unemployment and am not afraid of my actions here being monitored. We have between 16 and 18 per cent. unemployment in a large part of my constituency, but there are many constructive things to be said.

I should like to draw the Government's attention to matters about which they already have some knowledge, as it will do them no harm to be reminded of them. No less than 50 per cent. of Britain's work force do not have the equivalent of even one certificate of secondary education. A higher proportion of our 16-year-olds go straight into work or, lamentably, on to the dole, and fewer of our adults are on training or self-improvement courses than in any of our major competitor countries.

If we are short of people in training, we are not short of paper qualifications. For years, the crafts, trades and professions have demanded increasingly narrow qualifications and have created diplomas, certificates and degrees to match them. Far too many are statements of time spent rather than of standards reached and still cater for a compartmentalised labour market, which has already passed away. What is worse is that employers do not understand what they mean and young people do not understand the merits of what they confer, especially in the medium-term.

When the Manpower Services Commission met the Select Committee, it agreed that the system does not meet the needs of the Government, employers or trainees. Moreover, it does not even mesh with the youth training scheme certificate. We need action on that now.

The Government should examine carefully what is going on in education. Faced with huge problems, some of which I have described, it is understandable that the Government preferred to use an instrument that is under their direct control rather than try to manoeuvre a decentralised and structurally inert education system. Huge strides have been made, but the time has come to ask whether there is too large an imbalance in resource allocation between the MSC and the education system.

It is enormously demoralising for teachers, who might be worried about the maintenance of their school or the capacity of its books and stationery allowance to meet the cost of equipment such as computers, to see growth only in an agency which concentrates on those whom the education system has let down. When the MSC gave evidence to the Select Committee, I asked about this. It told me that it had a hard black line of accountability to the Secretary of State for Employment, and a dotted line of accountability to the Department of Education and Science. The dotted line should be brought much closer to the hard line. There should be much more consultation and joint planning by the education system and the MSC.

We should be more imaginative about bringing resources into the education system. The Select Committee recently visited a major recruitment agency which does some of its own training. It has discovered that there is an insatiable demand for skilled people to work word processors and other machinery, so it is about to expand its training capacity. That expansion will be in a purpose-built centre equipped with machinery for use principally in the evenings and at weekends. All over the country there are schools with spare capacity, because of falling rolls, which could provide the accommodation. When asked why it did not use that accommodation, the agency replied that accommodation was an insignificant part of its costs. The House should imagine the advantages of the hardware, which is so much in demand, being at a school and there being an arrangement by which selected pupils could use the equipment when it was not being used by the professional agency. The agency would often get first choice of pupils leaving that school and the staff of the school could work with the agency. The agency said that its greatest problem was getting skilled teachers—the education system has plenty of them. Such imaginative sharing should be encouraged.

There is a too little sung contribution to employment in my area. If, on television, there appeared in flashing lights the news that 1,800 new jobs had been created, people would think that an improvement, but the 1,800 jobs created by the Medway enterprise agency in the past two and a half years do not emerge in lights because they are created in small numbers. More than 500 small firms have been established through the medium of this tiny organisation, and only 5 per cent. have gone out of business. That shows that, with skill, careful counselling and monitoring, it is possible to bring small firms into existence, which then employ people.

The banks, however, are still far too niggardly because, they say, they have not the time, resources or skill to assess whether a small business with no track record will succeed. Here is one enterprise agency with a proven record of judging the likely success of people wanting to go into business. Rather than investing in Mexico, Argentina or anywhere else for the sake of gains which rapidly disappear, our banks should pay far more attention to the success of these enterprise agencies and use them to monitor potential small businesses.

A change of attitude is also required. Only the other day a card came through my door from a firm which wanted my money. It said, "We were sorry you were out. We would like you to ring up and make an appointment. We can only call between 9 and 5. We cannot say whether we can come at any specific time, only whether it will be morning or afternoon." That was the South of England Electricity Board. Given that 66 per cent. of women in the labour market are able to have some form of employment, it is obvious that many people will not be at home during working hours. The electricity board's response has not been to find people to work in the evenings or at weekends, when most people are in — I suspect that that contravenes trade union practice — but to pour investment into new ways of reading meters by remote control. Consequently, meter readers as a breed will disappear.

That encapsulates the kind of attitudes which have stripped us of jobs. If the electricity board had had the flexibility to employ people to call on households when workers were at home, rather than expecting them to give up half a day to meet the board's caprices, we might have established some advantage.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): It is a pleasure to follow the thoughtful and constructive speech of the hon. Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe).

We should use this debate to give the facts and tell the truth about our current level of unemployment and to end misrepresentation. Last year, in its corporate plan, the MSC forecast that unemployment would fall. In the draft corporate plan now before us it says that in the previous 12 months that did not happen, that unemployment rose by 150,000 and that it is still increasing. In other words, the situation is getting worse, just as it has for every year that this Government have been in office.

The Government came to office promising a new approach and economic expansion and success leading to full employment. They took over when unemployment was 1·3 million and had been falling for two years. They launched their monetarist experiment, and the jobless total immediately rocketed. It has not stopped increasing since. In unfiddled terms it is well over 4 million, with all the suffering and mass misery that that has meant.

Last week the Secretary of State had the gall and impertinence to criticise the record of my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot). It was claimed that the Secretary of State was creating more jobs. Let us take the number of employees in employment as the test. When the Labour Government left office, there were 317,000 more jobs than when they came into office. Now there are 2 million fewer jobs than when this Government came into office. As a result, this Government are charged with presiding over the destruction of 2 million jobs. We are now losing jobs more rapidly than we were in the 1920s and 1930s. The truth staring us in the face is that the Conservative party is the party of mass unemployment, and that on any test its monetarist experiment has been an appalling disaster which has brought hardship, pain and misery to millions of homes and families. It has been the biggest catastrophe to hit this country in peace time.

It would be far more fitting if the Treasury showed some contrition and a recognition of its failure. It should at least show that it cares, but all we get is bluster, as evidenced by the disgraceful speech of the Secretary of State. He merely sought to exonerate himself and to place the blame on everyone else. He seemed to be saying, "It is nothing to do with us; we are only the Government", but that is not what they say at election time.

The amendment says that some jobs have been created in the last 12 months. The figures show that that is the case. How, then, is it possible for jobs to be created, but for unemployment to go up? The answer to this mystery is that the official unemployment figures grossly underestimate the total. Many hundreds of thousands of people are seeking work, but because they cannot claim benefit they are not on the register and are not counted. Many hundreds of thousands of women fall within this category.

Rather than a growth of full-time jobs in the last 18 months, there has been a growth of casualised, part-time, insecure, low-paid employment, with no employment protection, written contracts or holiday or sickness pay. In other words, there is a sub-group of second-class workers. Two processes have occurred simultaneously — the growth of a sub-group of casualised, second-class workers, doubly exploited with no employment protection, alongside the continued remorseless destruction of full-time jobs, with a consequent growth in unemployment.

The pressure is on from the loony Right-wing pressure groups to rescind all legislative employment protection so that even more people can be pushed into this second-class group of low paid workers, as a result of which the poorest of our people will be paid even less.

The Government have now dreamt up a new alibi. They now tell us that the cause of unemployment is that wages are too high. They say that the solution is that wages must come down. After six years of tax cuts for the rich and financial incentives for the better off, we are told that the problem of unemployment and poverty is soluble only by creating even more poverty.

If that were the way to achieve progress, we would be succeeding now, because we are the lowest wage economy in the OECD. Although our more successful competitors pay much higher wages, and although real labour costs here have declined, we are told that wages must come down. The implication is that unemployment is the fault of the unemployed and that the way forward is that the poor must become poorer.

We were once told that unemployment is caused by inflation. Now that inflation has come down and unemployment has gone up, we are offered this other excuse and remedy—that wages must be reduced, that the pay and conditions of the poorest must be depressed and that people must go from the dole to the sweat shop and be priced into jobs. That is the new philosophy, but who can believe it? This loony idea is economically illiterate.

The Government's Green Paper on the relationship between employment and wages is a bizarre document. The Treasury model was tampered with and phoney equations were fed in to achieve the result. I am pleased that the Minister smiles, because it really is a sick joke. According to the simulation, there are four ways in which jobs appear. First, firms should employ labour, not machines. It is claimed that one third of the increase in jobs comes from employing more men rather than machines. It is recommended that we should slow down the rate of productivity increase; and investment and innovation are to be deterred. That brings us back to the Chancellor's idea of low-tech, no-tech, low-pay jobs. That would take us down the cul de sac of industrial decline. It stands common sense on its head.

Secondly, it is suggested that with lower wages people would save less and spend more, but the evidence for that is feeble. Thirdly, it is suggested that the Government would lower taxes and interest rates, but in view of what they have done in the last few months there is not much evidence of that. Fourthly, it is claimed that the higher profits which firms achieve through lower wages would be immediately invested, but I am not sure whether that means here or abroad.

Those conclusions were possible only by simulations on a rigged economic model. The untampered model at Warwick shows only one tenth of those figures. I stopped reading at page 37, because it shows that more than two thirds of the new jobs in the first year of the simulation came from an increase in Government employment. Which hon. Members believe that? We all know that the Government are cutting the Civil Service and public employees. We have all read the recent public expenditure White Paper which plans both a cut in real wages and continuing cuts in manpower. The Green Paper, therefore, lacks all credibility. Even if its contents were true, it would only scratch the surface of the unemployment problem.

If the level of pay is the key critical variable in determining employment, we would expect exployment to be highest in those regions where pay is lowest. Pay is lower in the northern region than in the south-east, but unemployment is higher, and vice versa. The same applies to industries. Electrical engineering is doing better than mechanical engineering, yet pay is higher in the former than the latter.

There has been an experiment in reducing wages—youth wages. On 16 January, in an answer, I was told that between April 1979 and April 1984 the earnings of males over 21 rose by 79 per cent., of those between 18 and 20 by only 63 per cent., of those under 18 by only 57 per cent., and that for females it was far worse. Earnings for young workers have declined markedly in both absolute terms and relative to those of adults. According to the new theory, we would have expected increased youth employment, but, instead, unemployment among young people has tripled and is disproportionately higher than for adults. That has been underlined by the young workers scheme. That scheme depresses youth wages and is the most expensive of the special employment measures. It has not increased youth employment. The argument is a phoney alibi and excuse. The Government must increase output, and thereby youth employment.

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe): I find it extraordinary that the Labour leadership accepts no responsibility for the present levels of unemployment—that attitude was encapsulated in the speech of the hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton)—and offers no reasonable alternative to Government policies.

I remind all hon. Members that for 12 months we had a coal strike, which throughout was supported by the Labour party and the Leader of the Opposition. The strike, which was supported and fostered by the Leader of the Opposition, has had a significant effect on unemployment levels. The industries involved in supplying the coal industry with goods and services have seen the National Coal Board's capital investment programme of about £1 billion for the past 12 months disappear. How many jobs depended on that capital investment programme? The repairs and renewal programme of the NCB must also be taken into account.

The British Steel Corporation has been obliged to pay £3·5 million a week to move ore, coal and coke into the steelworks. The strike has meant that it has had to cut its capital investment programme. In my constituency that has had a significant effect on the industry involved in servicing and maintaining that capital programme in the steelworks. The Leader of the Opposition failed to condemn the attempt of Mr. Scargill to close down Llanwern, Ravenscraig and Scunthorpe steelworks. How many jobs would have been lost in those industries had Mr. Scargill and the Opposition had their way?

Does the House remember the two national dock strikes? Who stomped up and down the country doing his best to persuade the dockers to strike? It was none other than the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott). What effect did that have on employment opportunities? How would it have affected unemployment if the dockers had come out on strike? How many jobs would have been lost? How many jobs have been lost by the refusal of the railwaymen to move ore, coal and coke? British Rail has lost millions of pounds, markets and customers, and jobs will be lost as a result.

The Labour party's record on unemployment is one of shame and cowardice, and the leadership of the Opposition has done more to increase unemployment during the past year than anyone else, except perhaps Mr. Arthur Scargill.

Despite that fact, the economy as a whole grew by 2 per cent. during the past 12 months, and would have grown by 3 per cent. had it not been for the strike. The gross domestic product is at its highest level and is set to grow by a further 3·5 per cent. in the next 12 months. Manufacturing output has increased by 3·5 per cent. in the past year, and is now 8·5 per cent. above the 1981 trough. Construction output is estimated to have risen by 4·5 per cent. in the first three quarters of 1984. Private industrial orders received by the construction industry in the three months to November 1984 were 61 per cent. higher than in the corresponding period for 1983. Investment spending on private dwellings reached a record annual rate, and for the first three quarters of 1984 was running 20 per cent. above the 1978 rate in real terms. By the second quarter of 1985 the economic recovery will have lasted for four years. That is longer than any recovery since 1945. I note that Opposition Members can only sneer at that record.

Investment brings jobs, and private sector investment is the most productive and efficient. Manufacturing investment rose by 15 per cent. in the first three quarters of 1984. As a direct result of the Government's economic policies on spending, borrowing and money supply we have achieved those remarkable statistics.

The Opposition have pointed to the value of the pound against the dollar, but the effect of that on our trading position has been dramatic. During the past three months exports rose by 7·5 per cent., and they are 11·5 per cent. higher than a year ago. Imports have risen by less than 10·5 per cent. Those figures further confirm the general increase of economic activity in the United Kingdom. Exports to the United States rose by 40 per cent. last year —a performance which is in line with that of our main competitors. Inward investment is taking place and is likely to continue to take place on a record scale.

I strongly urge Ministers at the earliest opportunity to obtain a new round of GATT talks to bolster the United States' President in his determination to avoid the imposition of trade barriers. We are now seeing the benefit of the Government's economic and domestic policies, which have seen the United Kingdom's output per head in manufacturing and our productivity growth for the whole economy increase at a faster rate than that of any of our European competitors.

The growth of our economy is reflected in increased employment. In the year ending September 1984, the numbers in work rose by 342,000. Merely to stand still, we have to create new jobs. We have to create about 500,000 new jobs a year. The Government must ensure that enterprise and initiative is allowed to flourish, and that it is worthwhile to employ people and to work. That incentive must be fostered. I hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will heed the many calls to reform employers' and employees' contributions, and to raise tax thresholds to ease the unemployment trap.

In addition, the Government must appreciate the effect of wages councils on employment. If the Government are looking to the catering industry as part of the service sector to provide new jobs, they had better abolish the catering wages council. The catering industry is not prepared to employ workers on rates which make the business entirely uneconomic. People, especially the young, are being priced out of work by wages councils, and the time has come to abolish them.

Mr. Prescott: What have they done for Scunthorpe?

Mr. Hickmet: I am asked by one of the most unpleasant Members in the House—the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East—to say what Government policies have done for Scunthorpe. They have given Scunthorpe three enterprise zones. Since designation, 100 jobs have been created in the enterprise zones and a further 500 are in the pipeline. Developments include Hygena, Kaye Plastics, Humberside Fabricators, Twinburn Engineering and Mike Derby. In another enterprise zone, Government grants of £2·2 million have assisted in the creation of a further 252 jobs. I note that the constituency that the hon. Gentleman represents failed to get development area status, whereas mine did. He should look after the interests of his constituents a little better rather than shouting insults across the Floor of the House. Actions speak louder than words; I got it and he failed.

I reject the Opposition motion because it is bogus, it fails to acknowledge the tremendous strides that the British economy has made and it proposes remedies which have been tried, which have failed disastrously and which will fail again.

Mr. Michael Hancock (Portsmouth, South): This afternoon, hon. Member after hon. Member on the Opposition Benches has exposed the Government's record for what it is worth, and I imagine that that is not much in the eyes of the majority of British people. The record is built on a false promise made in 1979 by the Prime Minister, who said that she would get this country back to work. It was a hollow promise indeed, because it is remarkable that, of the 69 months that have elapsed since she made the promise, in only three months has the jobless total failed to rise.

From the comments of the Secretary of State this afternoon, it would appear that he is proud of that record. There was no embarrassment and little concern about that broken promise, but there is real anxiety about it in the country. During the past few months it has been interesting to see Conservative Members become increasingly fidgety about the problems of unemployment. They realise that if something is not done they could easily join the 3·5 million people on the dole queue should the British people repay the Government for that broken promise about employment.

Since 1979 the Government have increased unemployment by 2 million, and they have increased the deficit on our visible trade to £11·5 billion. They have the highest interest rates since we left the gold standard in 1931. The failure of those policies, coupled with the strength of the dollar, led to the recent sterling crisis and the runs on the pound. International markets have no confidence in the management of our economy, and few hon. Members have confidence in the Government's ability to push the economy to a point where it can offer a real opportunity to end the plight.

We have heard quotes from various newspapers today, including the Daily Mirror and the Daily Telegraph, which put forward plans for employment. Conservative Members have told the House what they wish to happen, and we await the speech of the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) when he exposes to public comment his ideas about the Budget that Britain will need to get unemployment down to a reasonable level. I commend to the Government the Budget proposals put forward by the alliance. They warrant wide respect, and they could work. Our plan is a real plan for jobs. It would create jobs, keep inflation down and keep the pound stable. We are always asked how many jobs it would create. That is a difficult question to answer, but what we have said consistently is that if wage settlements were kept at 2 per cent. below the presently forecast levels of 7 to 8 per cent., by 1988 unemployment would be below 2 million.

Our Budget would expand the economy by spending the £1·5 billion which the Chancellor of the Exchequer intends to use for tax cuts to cut unemployment. That could be done by a 1 per cent. cut in employers' national insurance contributions, or by spending £1 billion on capital projects such as housing repair and construction. We should remember that one in eight of unemployed people used to work in the building industry. We could spend money on road and rail repairs and on public investment in the fabric of Britain, which has deteriorated dramatically since the Government came to power. Public investment is now a third of what it was in 1979 and one quarter of the total in 1974.

The alliance wants the community programme to be expanded. More than one and a quarter million people —almost one in four of the jobless total—have been unemployed for more than a year. Despite its defects, the community programme is the most effective way of putting the long-term unemployed back to useful work, especially on environmental and construction projects which need urgent work. I see many such prospects in my city every day. The sewerage system in Portsmouth, which was created in Victorian times, is expected to deal with the problems of the 20th century, but it is completely inadequate. That is a classic example of where public sector investment could easily achieve not only long-term expenditure savings but almost immediate employment. Therefore, we recommend an increase in the community programme next year from 130,000 to 250,000 people, as a first step towards our objective of an improved scheme offering 500,000 places, with an enhanced training element.

In addition, we propose a new programme for the long-term unemployed aged under 25, more than half of whom have not experienced proper jobs. That would involve an initial commitment to 75,000 places, doubling to 150,000 places over two years. The gross cost of those measures would be £685 million—a small price to pay for no mean feat.

The cumulative effect of the Government's policies on training has been damaging, and time and again this afternoon we heard from Members who have personal experience of the problems. The Government have run down the industrial training boards, threatened to close one third of skillcentres, reduced university places in science and technology faculties, and made shortsighted cuts in research and science projects. We would reverse those cuts as an urgent priority, extend the youth training scheme to two years and make it available to all 16 and 17-year-olds who wished to take part. That would be a major step towards the objective of enabling 16 to 19-year-olds to have access to education and training. It is impossible to predict with certainty the extra demand on the YTS, but we estimate that another 250,000 places will be required. The gross cost will be £600 million, which is once again a good investment for so many people.

How many Conservative Members have experienced the changes that have occurred in industry? Before I entered the rarefied atmosphere of this place, where people seem to be reluctant to understand the problems of the real world, I experienced those changes in the factory where I worked. I saw people in their 40s and 50s displaced by machinery. Only eight or nine months ago, when I was in that environment, I saw the strains and pressures on people who were turned out of their jobs and who knew that their prospects of being retrained were being slowly but surely eroded, and that their opportunities to obtain meaningful employment in their lifetimes were fast receding. It is sad that Conservative Members are reluctant to accept the problems of the unemployed or those who are about to be made unemployed. Perhaps that is because they sit in this rarefied atmosphere and do not fully understand the consequences of their actions. I commend the Budget proposals of the alliance, as they are small steps that need to be taken to achieve the goal that we should all like to achieve—the country back at work.

I am surprised that the Secretary of State was not red faced with embarrassment over the promises that his Government and colleagues have broken over the past six years. I saw nothing in his speech of that embarrassment. Other hon. Members are in a far better position than I am to criticise that speech and compare it with others that he has made. If I were unemployed today, I would find it a sad reflection on the Government that the person who is given responsibility to help me this afternoon gave little hope of salvation. His lack of consideration and concern is the most damning of all the things in the Government's attitude to the unemployed.

The proposals that I have briefly outlined make up a plan for jobs which shows real concern for the problems that we are facing. It is not a plan that we shall hear from the Chancellor next Tuesday. His Budget will reward the rich and well off, while pursuing the policy of putting even more hopelessness in the way——

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Norman Lamont) rose——

Mr. Hancock: No, I shall not give way. The hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity to make his own contribution at the end of the debate, and we can only hope that it will be a more helpful contribution than that of the Secretary of State.

Our plan is a plan for jobs and hope. I hope that, as a result of the concern expressed by Opposition Members, the Government will take notice of the problems of the unemployed and that the Budget next week will reflect the need for the Government to take positive action to help the unemployed.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): I always feel a little sad at these debates because, although there are many hon. Members with great ability, tact and skill on the Opposition Benches who have many worthwhile ideas to put forward, they have not done so. Instead we have had a bad-tempered attack of economic indigestion from the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott). I understand that at one stage he was transport spokesman for the Labour party. That is easy to understand as his speech had all the characteristics of a runaway empty express train rattling through a tunnel—empty because it had no content and through a tunnel because he could not see where he was going.

Apart from a few flat earthers on the Opposition Benches, most of us are more orthodox and realise that we live in an increasingly difficult and competitive world. That competition is not just the old competition but the growing competition from the far east, the low wage economies, Brazil and other parts of the world. Nobody owes us a living. We are not self-sufficient in raw materials or food and it is essential that we trade to provide the goods that we do not have within our borders. If we are not efficient, we cannot trade. The more efficient we are, the less it costs us to import these vital supplies.

What I am about to say may interest the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East because I shall criticise my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. She was wrong to say that there is no alternative. There is an alternative means of dealing with the problems of unemployment—I concede that to the Labour party. It is the policy adopted in Eastern Europe—the siege economy where, if one needs something, one does not trade for it but barters for it. There is no freedom because labour is directed. There is no wealth because the only available incentive is that of becoming a party member. In some of the mini-Socialist republics in this country we have seen how that would work here. There is no unemployment because overmanning develops into double-manning. It does not help a great deal because what hon. Members opposite do not point out when they put these ideas forward is that double-manning halves the living standards of those it affects.

We have had experiments in the United Kingdom in this way and we have the fun statelets such as that under Red Ken—I think that he has been renamed Scab Ken after what happened last night—which more than doubled the expenditure of the Greater London council over the past three years. He is now talking about no cuts in jobs and services. Perhaps he would like to look back on the effect that that extra £400 million taken off the domestic and commercial ratepayers might have had on jobs and services.

There is only one way to deal with the problems of unemployment. We have to realise that the Government do not create jobs. We have to realise that it is the Government's job to allow others to create new jobs and to sustain existing jobs. It is up to the Government to stop getting in the way. They can do that in two ways. One is by reducing bureaucracy. It is fair to point out that many of our laws and much of our legislation come from Brussels. There is a tendency for the empire-building bureaucrats in Brussels to introduce more legislation. If we allow the political initiative to fall into the hands of the bureaucrats we shall get bureaucracy. I should like the Government to say plainly that we do not want things such as the Vredeling directive and the fifth directive. Anything coming from Brussels should be subjected to two stringent tests. Firstly, will it further the interests of free trade? If it will, we should take it. Secondly, will it increase the burden of bureaucracy? If it will, we should kill it.

The Government should do something about VAT on small businesses. The amount of administration and work that goes into keeping the VAT accounts for somebody who has only just started and has many other burdens with which to deal is unfair. I should like to see the exemption ceiling on VAT raised to £50,000.

There are other burdens about which the Government can do something. For example, there is the financial burden on industry. We are coming to realise that one of the state's problems is that just about every state activity is an engine of increased expenditure. For example, each year, for the same number of patients, the Health Service gets more expensive. Each year, we have more old people and therefore more patients. Each year we have more pensions to pay. The provision of the same quantity of defence equipment becomes more expensive each year in real terms. This is why this and any other Government have to be so careful over public expenditure.

One sector where we can be more careful than we have been is in local government. There has been a progression, a change in the nature of local government. Some 100 years ago, the Victorian aldermen provided facilities, such as parks, and dignified buildings in our urban areas. Now a growing number of services is being provided by local government, growing in complexity and resulting in growing empires. The old feeling of those working in local government that they provided a public service has gone. Now local government has to resolve the competing interests of, on the one hand, the people for whom the service is being provided, and, on the other, the public sector unions that are employed. It is an unequal battle.

We have moved on. Now, in some areas of the country, getting into local government is looked upon not as an opportunity to provide services for the citizens but as an opportunity to set a political platform, and sadly this is unrestrained by the discipline of the ballot box. The new slogan is "no representation without subsidisation". We should now move to a position in which local government is more and more restricted to the control and regulation of services and not to the provision of the services themselves. The provision of local services should be moved from local government to the private sector—the building, maintenance and control of houses could all be done by the private sector. Let us move all the services that we can out of local government and towards the private sector. We have done a massive amount of work in privatising the nationalised industries and allowing those who work in them more involvement in their industries. Let us move on further.

Let us remember what happened during the mining dispute. Both the railways and private hauliers were supposed to be moving coal. The railwaymen felt that, whatever they did, the taxpayer would cough up the money, so they went on strike and did not move the coal. However, the private hauliers needed the work so that they could keep in business. They did the work effectively and efficiently, and they carried it through. There is a moral in that. It is that in the real world of the real economy, the private sector provides the goods.

Of course, we need training, and we need better training than we have had so far. My right hon. Friend said that the Government intended to spend even more on training. But, again, why not, as we are doing, move that towards the private sector, which is more reflective of the need and is more flexible? I fully support my right hon. Friend's proposed move in that direction.

Another form of training which I should like to see is a move towards a national community service — [Interruption.] — in the youth training scheme — [Interruption.] I shall explain it, if I can, despite all the ill-tempered caterwauling coming from the Opposition Benches. I wonder whether within the youth training scheme we could develop, as an option, a voluntary form of national community service representing a training for life. Of course, we want to train for specific skills. But if we could have a growing option of three months of Outward Bound-type training followed by community work in the environment and inner city areas, working to help others in the community and getting people together from different parts of the country, different walks of life and different aspirations as, in a way, we had with National Service, as a voluntary part of the youth training scheme, that would be a great advance. It would be a different option, of course. But let us see how it goes. Let us see how it grows. Let us provide people with a broader view of life.

The Government are there to hold the fort, but let us leave it to the people. Let us get the people motivated. Let us give them a stake in society. Let us privatise, denationalise and give people the opportunity to become involved in co-operatives. Let us do all that we can to help.

Mr. Sean Hughes (Knowsley, South): I accept that the pattern of employment is changing. I also accept that unemployment is not an act of God. It is not in that category of disasters against which it is impossible to insure. Quite simply, it is one of the consequences of how we order our economic affairs.

At the weekend I read the Prime Minister's comments on what she saw as attacks on the conventions of democracy. One of those conventions, developed this century and especially in the post-war period, is that the Government have a responsibility towards the unemployed.

The word "unemployment" came into general use only at the turn of the century. I came across a copy of the "Encyclopaedia Britannica" for 1911 which still described it as "a modern term."

The responsibility of the state for unemployment concentrated the minds of politicians in that immediately pre-world war 1 era. It is interesting to note that the unemployment figures which prompted such concern among Edwardian politicians rose to a peak of 7·8 per cent. in 1908. Such a figure today would prompt talk of an economic boom in boroughs such as mine, where the latest unemployment figure is 25·6 per cent.

Just as national averages are meaningless because of the huge regional disparities, so regional averages vary widely from one area to another, within areas themselves and between age groups. The latest figures published are that there are 1,286,183 people under the age of 25 unemployed, and that number constitutes 38·5 per cent. of the total number of unemployed. The number of people under the age of 20 unemployed is 571,664, and that constitutes more than 17 per cent. To take just one local figure, there are 1,197 people under the age of 18 registered as unemployed in my borough's careers office, and of that number 928 have never worked. There were 475 job applications at the careers office, and there were 45 places.

Those statistics do not describe the boredom and the purposelessness to be seen in young people hanging round streets and shopping centres in constituencies such as mine. It reminds me of J. B. Priestley's description of his visit to Blackburn in 1933, in his book "English Journey". He commented on how the young unemployed were trying to kill time by playing table tennis. He wrote:

"Probably by the time the North of England is an industrial ruin, we shall beat the world at table tennis".

The only difference now is that we do not have the table tennis.

The position is made much worse when the Government react to this problem with punitive attempts to take supplementary benefit from 16 and 17-year-olds who are looking for jobs. The Government's flirtation with compulsory training suggests that there are still Government supporters who have not yet accepted that a man or woman out of work is not necessarily a blameworthy idler. That is especially true of the long-term unemployed. In January of this year, 1,316,000 had been unemployed for more than 12 months. More than 761,000 had been unemployed for more than two years. More than 454,000 had been unemployed for more than three years.

We have had several debates on unemployment, and the most frustrating feature is that the Government seem to be completely unmoved. The frustration which I feel as an employed, paid politician pales into insignificance when compared with the frustration boiling up in the unemployed in constituencies such as mine.

I accept that the Government will not announce their sudden conversion to the Opposition's point of view, compelling and authoritative as was the argument of my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott). So I shall lower my sights a little. On many occasions my right hon. and hon. Friends have asked the Government to say when they expect to see unemployment coming down. I simply ask the Minister to give us an idea of the time scale involved. My constituents have a right to know when the sacrifice which they have been asked to make will start to bear fruit. Even in war time Governments make some concession to suggest when victory is expected, and this Government have lasted longer than the second world war. It is debatable which has caused more damage.

Government supporters tell us constantly that the Opposition do not have a monopoly of concern. Secretaries of State and other Ministers constantly say how the present levels of unemployment are not acceptable. But we need to be convinced by more than words. We expect some action.

How many times do we have to say that the Government's policies are creating hopelessness? There is a growing body of people who believe that if an area solves its own problems, all will be put right, but the case for Government intervention is overwhelming. A borough such as my own is not capable of solving its own problems. The wealth is not there. There is a growing feeling that long-term unemployment is a fact of life and that 3 million is the norm and not the hjgh. That is not even disputed any more in areas such as Knowsley. There is no confidence, either, that technology will create more jobs. Areas such as my own are fast becoming without hope.

Unemployment and job vacancies do not form some neat equation working on the reverse of the principle of last in, first out. The harsh reality is that the longer a person is unemployed, the less likelihood there is of his getting a job. The longer a person is unemployed, the more he is viewed as unemployable and, worse still, the more he is tempted to consider himself as unemployable. That is why the unemployed have the right to know when it is all coming to an end. Will the Minister now give the time scale? If not, we can only presume that the Government have no idea when unemployment will start to come down. If that is the case, they will deserve the odium of history for embarking on a disastrous experiment, oblivious of the dangers that it holds for ordinary people.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Unemployment is both a human and economic tragedy, no more so than in areas such as Merseyside, where I grew up, and I acknowledge everything that the hon. Member for Knowsley, South (Mr. Hughes) said.

However, it should be recognised that unemployment is concentrated. My constituency has an unemployment rate of 7 per cent., which is half the national average. We feel that there are some lessons to be learnt from that fact. I say with respect to the hon. Member for Easington (Mr. Dormand) that, although it is a coal mining area, we have managed to prove that there is life after coal; most of the pits closed about 20 years ago.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Hickmet) on his acquiring Government help for his area. However, the history of many parts of the country shows that that kind of help is tinged with poison. My constituents believe that we are extremely lucky to have avoided regional aid and Government assistance, with all the distortions that they bring.

We in Derbyshire, South have a good work force and a good management, producing the commodities that people want, at the price they want to pay, the goods being delivered on the date that they are wanted, with our goods going for export throughout the world. It is to those facts that we attribute our low rate of unemployment.

Some of the problems of unemployment are beyond the will of any Government to resolve. We have heard almost nothing in this debate about demography. About 1 million more people will be added to the British work force by the end of this decade, and it will be 1990 before the number of people leaving the work force is equal to the number of people entering it. That is not a problem that any Government should ignore.

The Labour motion contains some inherent problems. Opposition Members call for more investment, particularly in manufacturing. They seem to forget that more investment in manufacturing has steadily led to fewer rather than more jobs. It does lead to higher productivity, higher output and higher sales. Exports are doing wonders for the balance of payments, and we now have what has long been sought as the holy grail—export-led growth.

Last year in manufacturing, investment went shooting up by about 7 per cent. during the summer quarters compared with the previous two quarters, and the estimates are for investment of about 12 per cent. for 1984 as a whole. At the same time employment in manufacturing in Great Britain is still going down. In September 1983, it stood at 5,547,000 and a year later it was 5,514,900. Investment in manufacturing means more capital-intensive activity replacing labour-intensive activity.

The main growth in employment is in the service industries. We now have two and a half times more people in those as we have in manufacturing, and the office revolution has not yet begun to hit us. We shall have to watch that.

Thus, calling for more Government investment in manufacturing, as the motion does, is, first, unnecessary because the private sector is doing it perfectly well without Government interference and is making far better choices than my colleagues in Whitehall could begin to make and, secondly, private industry will do even more if the Government help to reduce its costs, such as national insurance contributions, rates, taxes and all the rest.

In any event, I believe that more Government investment in manufacturing would not only not help unemployment—and would not help in the short run at all—but might even be damaging. For every £5,000 taken from a company to create employment elsewhere a job is lost in that company, with no guarantee of a replacement after it has gone through—I say this with respect—the sticky fingers of the civil servants and has found its way into some Government scheme. In the long run, new investment will lead to new technology and to new jobs—but only if the Labour party paymasters, the trade unions, start actively welcoming and encouraging technical change in Britain.

Labour Members do not understand the great social changes that are underlying all the figures that they have been quoting. Employment has been rising steadily. Historically, we have a high percentage—about 66 per cent. now—of the population of working age at work. New jobs are being created. Between September 1983 and September 1984, there were 153,000 net new jobs, but 152,000 of those went to women working part-time. Between March 1983 and March 1984, we had 266,000 new jobs, of which 213,000 went to women working part-time. In other words, the ladies are getting much more better as we go along at nabbing the jobs that are on offer.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) described women as second-class workers. In fact, most employers consider that we are first-class workers, and we are certainly the employees of first choice, and there are a number of reasons for that. One is the willingness and flexibility of the female work force, partly because it is not unionised. It is not, therefore, subject to the pressures of those who want to change the world in the way that the leader of the National Union of Mineworkers would like to do, seeking to use his industry's work force to do it.

The main reason is cost. Women are cheap and plentiful and there is no evidence that the supply is drying up. Suppose an employer takes on two women working the average part-time hours of 21·9 hours a week at just below the figure at which they would start to pay national insurance and tax. The women will get, say, £33·99 a week each take-home pay. The employer will get 43·8 hours a week for £68 less tuppence.

If, instead, the employer takes on a man full-time, whose average hours—based on last year's figures—would be 43·5 hours a week for the same money, the man will take home only £53·50 a week after deductions of £6·12 national insurance contributions and £8·83 for tax, and the employer will fork out £73·11, including national insurance contributions. That is 7·5 per cent. more than the cost of employing the two ladies. In addition, the full-time worker has all the protection of the employment legislation and will probably receive holidays and so on.

Part-time women workers are now doing roughly half the average working week of the men and are picking up one third of the male full-time earnings. Half the work for a third of the money is a bargain, so it is no wonder that they have got jobs. The message is clear for any employer: lay your hands on as many women as possible and employ them. For any women with a family, the message is also clear: it makes far more sense for a woman to work, say, 20 hours a week and collect £30 to £35 cash in hand, than for her husband to put in hours of overtime and pay the 39 per cent. marginal rate of tax and national insurance, particularly as the married woman probably does not qualify for the dole.

The result is that employment goes up, but unemployment does not come down. The problem for Labour Members is that these differences will not go away. Women will not give in. The will not go back to the kitchen sink, and all the articles in Marxism Today about how important the women have been to the striking miners show how determined women can be when they really put their minds to something. It is clear that they will not be dictated to by Labour Members, whose nostrums will have only one effect, which is to accelerate this pattern of working. They will end up replacing more male jobs with cheap female workers.

Labour Members would increase the costs of employing people, whereas we must decrease them. They would increase public expenditure and taxation, whereas we must decrease them. They would increase the number of rights of workers and obligations of employers, whereas we must decrease them. They want equality, and that means encouraging women to leave the home and look for a pay packet. On behalf of the women I say, "We have done it, chaps, and look where it has got you."

No amount of the blustering in which Labour Members indulged will disguise the lack of credibility of the Labour motion's central philosophy on jobs. They cannot deliver without an incomes policy. My namesake—though he is no relative—Professor David Currie, who is one of their advisers, has said so; they cannot begin to deliver such a policy, and they never could. They cannot think of any way of generating employment without lifting billions of pounds by way of extra tax from man and master alike. All that would do would be to accelerate the destruction of British industry, not just in terms of jobs but in terms of output and trade. Their policies could only make things worse, and that is why I reject the motion.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): The dole queues have grown longer and the crocodile tears have become larger since the debates on unemployment in 1979. We hear a load of waffle from Conservative Members who have probably never seen a pair of overalls, let alone worn a pair. This comes rather hard to those of us who have had some experience of the dole queue.

The Secretary of State for Employment has told us that unemployment requires a constructive approach. The Government's policy has trebled the number of unemployed since 1979. Is that constructive? I support my colleagues who have rightly drawn attention to the appalling level of unemployment and I condemn the policies that have produced the economic and social disaster that currently blights the United Kingdom. Since becoming a Member of this place, I have attempted always to draw attention to unemployment in my constituency. I have done so in debates and in written and oral questions. I have used every parliamentary device available to me to highlight the grave situation that prevails in Jarrow under the Government's policies. I take up the issue again to show the further industrial deterioration that has taken place in the northern region generally, and in Jarrow especially, over recent years.

When I was newly elected to this place I heard the Prime Minister talk about artificial jobs. She told us that she wanted real jobs. If it were not for the artificial jobs that the Government have created, unemployment would be nearer 5 million than the present 4 million. The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry tells workers that their salvation lies in getting on their bikes and finding jobs. Does he realise that those who can take that advice, assuming that they can find jobs to go to, are the young and active? If they leave their communities to find those jobs, an additional burden is placed on the old and infirm. The young and active will not take with them old people's homes, community centres, libraries and other local authority services. The result is an increasing burden on local authorities, especially with the Government's policies of rate capping and cutting generally local government expenditure.

High unemployment and attendant poverty are an underlying problem in Jarrow, south Tyneside and the northern region. Jarrow, like the rest of the northern region, has depended always on basic industries for employment. These industries include shipbuilding, coal, steel and heavy engineering. Since 1979 we have witnessed closure after closure. Boldon colliery, the last pit in my constituency, was closed in 1981. Only this month, British Shipbuilders has decided to put in mothballs the last shipyard in my constituency. British Steel has announced that by the end of the year the last steel plant in my constituency is to close. It claims that this is due to the EEC quota. I suggest that the Government make every endeavour to increase the quota for the United Kingdom to try to save the plant and 254 jobs. As I have said, the plant is due to come to an end by the end of the year.

Closures have a spin-off effect within the Community. Service and supply industries will be hit and this will cause further unemployment. Shops, pubs and clubs are all hit by recession. Indeed, the south Tyneside district council decided to set up a welfare rights take-up campaign, because the area's economic and unemployment problems have produced low family incomes, a high mortality rate, a high dependence on benefits, a population decrease because of migration and a wide range of social problems. It was found that one in two of the householders of south Tyneside relied on housing benefit. In a 12-week campaign the welfare rights officers dealt with up to 100 cases a day. There were 5,571 inquiries and 3,200 claims. The result of the campaign was that about £500,000 was made available to those who did not realise that they were entitled to benefit.

The latest figures of the Department of Employment tell us that unemployment in the northern region is 237,000. Almost half of those people are resident within the Tyne and Wear area. About 100,000 of those who are unemployed within that area are long-term unemployed, which means that they have been out of work for over 52 weeks. Unlike some hon. Members, I do not talk about percentages when dealing with unemployment. It should be realised that in unemployment debates we are discussing wage earners, one-parent families and many others who are all human beings. We are talking about those who are out of work and not about percentages. The unemployed wish to support their families and it annoys me when I hear the unemployed, including those with whom I used to stand in the dole queue, referred to as percentages. An unemployed person does not gain much satisfaction from being tapped on the shoulder and told that unemployment has reduced by 1 per cent. That person is 100 per cent. unemployed and he wants a job. He wants to support his family and that is what it is all about. We are discussing human beings who want the dignity of work that comes from the right to work.

The House might be interested in the number of jobs that were reported in the press as having been lost during the month before Christmas in the Tyneside area. There were 2,100 with British Shipbuilders; 400 with NEI, Gateshead; 360 with Cape Insulation, Washington; 334 at the Royal Ordnance factory, Birtley; and 246 at British Steel at Jarrow, which is to be phased out at the end of the year. This means that 3,440 were thrown on the human scrap heap during the month before Christmas.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) talked about 29 of our 81 skillcentres having been closed. In Tyne and Wear, the Killingworth skillcentre is to be closed with the loss of 56 jobs and 250 training places. It is in an area that requires training places for those who have been thrown on the human scrap heap. Only one training facility remains in the county and that is at Felling. The nearest skillcentre north of the Tyne is at Edinburgh. There are even doubts about the unemployment rehabilitation centre for the disabled, which shares accommodation and costs with the Killingworth skillcentre.

As I have said, unemployment in the northern region is 237,000. The region has relied on basic industries and the Government's policy is turning the area into an industrial desert. The only remedy that the Government offer to those in the desert is to turn themselves into industrial nomads. They invite them to leave the places where they were born and bred and where their families have lived for years.

At the same time, the Government have reduced regional aid from £700 million to £400 million. Despite what the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) said, the Tyne and Wear area relies on regional aid. The area has relied on employment in basic industries and that has been cut. In my constituency 25 per cent. of the male work force relies on heavy industry for employment as against 7 per cent. in the rest of the country. That is why the region is top of the unemployment league.

Mrs. Currie rose——

Mr. Dixon: I cannot allow the hon. Lady to intervene as I know that others wish to speak before the occupants of the two Front Benches reply to the debate. Only 10 minutes are available to me and I wish to advance additional arguments. I apologise for not giving way to the hon. Lady.

Regional development grant has been reduced for the top tier from 22 per cent. to 15 per cent. To top it all, the NEDC, one of the job creation agencies in the northern region, has been told that the Government will cut its grant in aid in the current financial year by 25 per cent., or £280,000. This is to happen in an area which has the highest unemployment in the United Kingdom. The only job creation agency in the region is to be subject to cuts, and I hope that the Minister will have second thoughts.

The region wants the policy that has been outlined by my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East. It is a disgrace that so many construction workers are unemployed when so many others require housing. Surely it would be easy to enable construction workers to return to work. I missed part of the debate because I attended a meeting to discuss the Transport Bill that is currently in Committee. The proposals in that measure will increase unemployment in the northern region. Many transport workers will find themselves unemployed. At the same time the Government say that not enough people are using public transport. The Select Committee on Transport considered an analysis which showed that for every person declared unemployed, 150 public service trips a year are lost. If one multiplies the 4 million who are unemployed by the 150 public service trips the answer is 600 million trips. It is no good the Secretary of State for Transport saying that insufficient people are using the transport system.

We require positive policies and help for our regions, giving hope to the unemployed. We do not want the nonsense of saying, "Get on your bikes and go somewhere else" or of cutting back on local authorities which are providing for the old and infirm. I hope that the Government will come across with something positive. I hope that at this late stage the Government will take notice of the new Tory group called CARE which has just been set up. If ever there was a prostitution of a word, that is it. I believe that 150 Tory Members of Parliament comprise that group on unemployment. I hope that they will note what Opposition Members have said. I hope that, at last, Government Members will show some social conscience.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): What does the Opposition motion really say? It alleges that we have the highest unemployment level this century. It affirms that we should expand the economy, reduce unemployment and develop youth and adult training. It calls for an ending of the decline of manufacturing industry and economic recovery based on investment in British industry, the improvement of infrastructure and a strengthening of science and technology. We reply that we support a sound financial framework with a determined policy of low inflation and steady economic growth with an efficient, competitive and productive industry and with training opportunities for young people and adults alike of the type already in place, and we shall prove their worth.

I share the concern of all hon. Members from all political parties at the unacceptably high unemployment. But saying that is not enough—we must do all that is possible realistically to bring it down. On listening to the Opposition I often get the impression that they forget that, to reduce unemployment, people must be employed. It would be a cruel deception to encourage people to be employed in industries that have no real future, such as uneconomic pits or uneconomic steel works. There are no easy or short-term answers.

The problem has been developing for 40 years, and was accelerated by the sudden increase in oil prices in 1973. I believe that this much is understood and accepted by both sides of the House.

What can be done to improve the economy and thereby produce real jobs? Our economy certainly will not be improved by the continued year by year increases in rates, such as those my constituents suffer under the Staffordshire county council. I offer my constituents an answer—vote those representatives out of office in the county council election in May.

We need an enterprise economy. The Opposition motion says nothing on that subject. An enterprising economy will come only from the efforts of the working people — shop floor, management and self-employed. We shall achieve an enterprise economy only if we produce goods that are better than those from abroad. One of the most pathetic arguments that I have heard is that we must not reduce taxes because the added income will go on imports. The truth is that, unless we produce goods that are better than those imports, we cannot hope to compete in world markets.

How best will we be able to produce the conditions in which we can compete in these markets successfully? First, we must be as efficient as our competitors—for example, it is hopeless for us to be in the position recently indicated by a survey of the National Institute Economic Review. The survey showed that German firms producing the same products on the same machinery managed labour productivity on average 63 per cent. higher. Moreover, 50 per cent. of those in supervisory positions on the shop floor had proper training compared with only 25 per cent. in this country.

Secondly, we must have a tax and banking system that will genuinely provide incentives to work and to risk capital. We look forward to the Budget on 19 March in the hope that this really will be a Budget for enterprise, jobs and investment. We hope that it really will encourage people who are now out of work to find that it is worth their while to be in work while providing management in new and efficient enterprises with the opportunity to expand and to take on new labour.

I have already put forward proposals in the Small Business Bill now before Parliament for the removal of red tape and unnecessary overregulation. Measures along those lines can help our economy to flourish. This must be done, and it can be done, in a balanced way. The scare stories of the Opposition are pure nonsense. We must look for all the means that are available to us to provide an enterprise economy with effective training for those in schools and for school leavers so that they have a reasonable opportunity to find and to keep long-term employment. Neither they nor anyone else will be able to obtain employment or to keep it unless they are managed and trained to produce goods that beat those produced elsewhere in the world. They need also the incentives of good pay with low taxation.

I have said before and I shall say again that it is worth the Labour party's taking on board the fact that its Socialist allies in France and Spain have tried the worn-out policies that the Labour party advocates and have abandoned them. If Labour Members really want their voters to be prosperous and employed in long-term jobs, they should seriously ask themselves why the economies of Japan and the United States knock the rest of the world into a cocked hat. It is enterprise, not ideology, that creates jobs. The Government are pursuing realistic policies that can and will provide enterprise. There is no other way of solving the problems of the unemployed. I urge the House to reject the Opposition motion.

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): Sadly, this has been yet another typical debate on unemployment. One Conservative Member after another has said, "There are problems. We sympathise with the plight of the unemployed. Yes, we have been in office for six years, but unemployment is nothing to do with us. Indeed, if we had not been in office, presumably the position would have been exactly the same. We cannot even claim the credit for making it any worse or better." The next stage in their argument is to say that they always promised us that there would be no easy solution to the problems of unemployment. "There is no miracle" has become the phrase widely used by Ministers.

Those of us who remember the 1979 election remember that the Conservative party was elected on the back of a poster which said, "Labour isn't working". The Leader of the Opposition at that time—the present Prime Minister — went around the country saying, "We have the answer to unemployment. We have a bottle here which we are selling to the electorate called monetarism. Take this dose regularly and all the problems will fade away and unemployment will disappear. The fact that unemployment exists in our society has something to do with wicked Socialism and social democracy."

The first solution put forward by the Government was, "Once we get inflation down, unemployment will disappear." It was in the first place a matter of getting rid of inflation. The Government now tell us that inflation is down to 5 per cent., and we accept the Government's figures. Unfortunately, to get inflation down to 5 per cent., the Government have added 3 million people to the dole queue.

After a time the Government shifted the argument. It was no longer "an argument about inflation and unemployment. The Government's next argument was that it was necessary to create an enterprise society, as the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) said. The Government said, "We have to cut taxes for the rich so that they will invest in British industry and so that we will create more jobs".

We have spent £3 billion a year cutting the taxes of the rich—a burden that the lower paid have had to bear. During that time unemployment has again increased. The Government have shifted their ground again. The first two monetarist solutions went. The hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) shakes his head. I am glad that he agrees with me.

We now come to the third solution which is that there are rigidities in the labour market. The 3·5 million unemployed people are unemployed because of those rigidities. Someone made redundant presumably goes home and says, "I am unemployed because I am a rigidity. I am stopping the labour market from working in the way that the Government want." The rigidity argument is only an argument when the Government are stripped of the rest of their monetarist rhetoric. The rigidity argument is solely an argument for cutting real and money wages.

Let us consider that argument, because successive Conservative speakers have put it forward as an answer to unemployment. If that hypothesis were to work there should be some historical evidence to support it. In the 1920s and 1930s employer after employer cut money wages. Did demand in the economy increase? No, it decreased but unemployment increased. Yet the Government with all the brilliance of monetarism and with substantial intellectual weight behind them still say, "Let us go back to the 1920s and 1930s, cut wages and reduce unemployment." The reality is that the 1920s and 1930s added to the number of unemployed people.

The Government then say, "That may not have worked historically, but it will work now." For some reason, it will work in 1985. They study the arguments and decide that low pay will create jobs. I have taken some interest in that issue. I asked the Parliamentary Secretary at Question Time last week whether he could explain why, with an above average number of long-term unemployed in west Yorkshire, the county had wages that were below the national average. If he has a theory, he should be able to explain that. He said:

"It is true that certain people and certain institutions price individual workers out of the market. However, what is happening in west Yorkshire is related to regional factors".—[Official Report, 5 March 1985; Vol. 74, c. 768.]

I thought that we could probably find out the extent to which those regional factors obtained. It is interesting to note that a study of the level of unemployment and the level of average earnings shows that the south-east is the only region that has above average earnings, and it has below average unemployment. Many regions which have below average earnings have above average unemployment. What do the Government say to the historical evidence and the present facts which show that there is no relationship between low pay and job availability? All the United Kingdom evidence points to the contrary. The Government's theory that depressing wages resolves the unemployment problem is not borne out by any evidence.

Each of those miracles has been paraded in front of us this afternoon—some of them already overtaken by events and the last one will soon come up against reality—and the Government have no answer to and do not care about the problem of unemployment or the unemployed.

The Secretary of State's speech illustrated government by abdication. He said that the Government had no responsiblility for the plight of the unemployed. That is a dangerous position, in economic and social terms, for any Government to take. A Government who are prepared to waste money on unemployment and see the division and waste that exists in inner cities and constituencies such as mine show the nature of this Government of abdication and despair.

I was intrigued to read in The Observer yesterday an interview with the Chancellor. He was asked:

"If you stopped being a politician suddenly for some reason or another, what job would you like to have?"

The Chancellor replied:

"None, if I could possibly afford it."

If the Chancellor's policies continue, many of my constituents will not obtain a job. They will have the Chancellor's choice, not because they can afford it but because there is no job for them. If there is no change of Government policy, more and more people will become unemployed and wasted.

8.35 pm

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): I wish to mention three specific points. First, I want to deal with the way that we fail to appreciate our graduate engineers—the people upon whom our future depends—secondly, Norwich and Norfolk, and, finally, the future of employment.

I have been astonished by what I have heard so far from the Opposition Benches. The Opposition motion, which I have read carefully, provides no positive thinking or guidelines for the future. It is a mere repetition of the platitudes that we have all read and heard so often before. It is astonishing that Opposition Members forget the period when they were in government. I have been around long enough to remember the period between 1964 and 1970. It was a disastrous period in this country's history, if ever there was one.

Even if I were unable to remember that period, I can remember the period between 1974 and 1979, when unemployment doubled and we ran into such a crisis that we finished up having to go to the IMF, with the winter of discontent and a general election that we resoundingly won.

Opposition Members have forgotten all that. They keep repeating the same old dreary platitudes that I remember hearing long before I became a parliamentary candidate or campaigned in any general election. They illustrate my point, which is that they fail to address themselves to the problem. While they are good on the negative, the Opposition's motion provides no positive guidelines.

However worried I may be about the difficulties in Norwich, there is no way in which anyone can support the Opposition motion. With their present performance, there is no chance that in the foreseeable future, if ever, they will have the opportunity to govern this country again. We need only consider the world situation. Other Governments are following this Government's example. Let us take one example. President Mitterrand came into power full of Socialist ideals. He is now following the principles that we adopt.

[Mr. Patrick Thompson]

We have discussed training this evening. It is of course good for a Member of Parliament to visit youth training schemes in his constituency—all of us have done that—to see that, despite what has been said by the Opposition, they show positive achievement. In Norfolk, the take-up of jobs as a result of the scheme is now as high as 80 per cent. Everyone on both sides of the House must welcome that.

It is important to change our attitudes towards the technically trained people upon whom we depend. I refer to our engineers. A few weeks ago we all saw in the press that Jaguar Cars could not obtain the graduate engineers that it wanted. I feel strongly that our graduate engineers deserve higher status and reward. I am sure that all hon. Members agree that we must give more support to our creative talent. It is as much a change of attitude as a matter of Government policy, and a change of attitude is necessary.

Whenever I see advertisements for young accountants, young lawyers and young production engineers, it is clear to me that we are not giving enough status and reward to our young production and design engineers on whom industry depends. We know, and every consumer knows, that far too often the design of products made on the continent of Europe is superior to that of our own products. I have not the time to give examples but we are all aware of them. The design of Japanese products is often a step ahead of the design of our products. These are truisms. We are all aware of them whenever we buy a new car, or whatever product it may be.

The honest way to provide new jobs is through the creation of wealth. That means designing the best products so that we can compete effectively in the world markets. We must improve our performance in that respect. Therefore, we must give more encouragement to our engineers to enable them to help in the creation of wealth and of new jobs. That is the kind of positive proposal that we should be discussing this evening, rather than the Opposition's endless gramophone record, "We did this" and "You did that".

This morning I was at the chamber of commerce in Norwich, where I was told that the employment prospects in Norwich and Norfolk are good. It is one of the areas where things are not as difficult as elsewhere. But there is one important point that I want to make on behalf of my constituents and business and industry in Norwich: we are held back by poor communications.

I am not one of those who believe that development of the infrastructure is some kind of magic wand that can be waved in order to put everything right. Any proposal for new roads should stand on its own merit. But I am saying unashamedly that we need improved communications in Norwich. We need a dual A11 all the way to Norwich. We do not need white elephants such as the Humber bridge. We need the kind of communications that will be of value to the area.

Mr. George Walden (Buckingham): To support my hon. Friend's argument, may I remind the House that the taxi fare from Norwich to London is £75?

Mr. Thompson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for supporting my argument about the importance of improving communications between London and Norwich. I support those who are campaigning for better road links between London and Norwich, whether they travel by car, taxi or any other method.

Only this morning I received a letter from the managing director of a very go-ahead machine tool business in Norwich in which he expressed his frustration at the poor road links between London and Norwich. I cannot make the point too strongly. It is important in regard to jobs in Norwich.

With regard to employment, we need to look further forward than we have so far in the debate. People in my constituency, of whatever political persuasion, agree with me that we are going through a revolution in regard to employment, training and leisure. The sooner we address ourselves to that fact, the better it will be for all of us. The Government are taking the right measures, as my hon. Friends have already said. The Opposition are bogged down in the past. During the many weeks of the miners' strike we had the same old story, the old class warfare, which goes back to days long before I was born. It is time that it stopped and that we had a positive motion from the Opposition. Therefore, I shall certainly be voting against the motion tonight.

8.45 pm

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): I am not at all surprised at the contributions that we have had from the Conservative Benches today. It is all right for the Whip, the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), to laugh. I want him to listen. Conservative Members talk about the creation of wealth. I have worked since I was 14. I have made my contribution to the creation of wealth, but I have not had a fair return for that contribution. A few people have benefited from my work and that of millions of other workers in Britain.

There are one or two millionaires on the Conservative Benches. [Interruption.] There are no millionaires on the Labour Benches; they are all on the other side of the House. They have raked in their profits from big business and from the efforts of the workers of this nation. I happen to have been one of them. [Interruption.] Conservative Members are suggesting that I have my violin out, but I am talking about the creation of wealth—a subject that is mentioned regularly from the Conservative Benches and from the Dispatch Box.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) was correct when he mentioned the Prime Minister and what she said in the pre-election period in 1979. He reminded the House of the hoardings and the Conservative propaganda about Britain not working because we had a Labour Government. I have heard the Prime Minister say regularly at the Dispatch Box, and outside at various meetings that I have attended, "There is no alternative". That is all that we have heard from the Conservative Benches today. There has been no suggestion whatever of the need for any change, except from the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), who suggested that the Prime Minister was wrong in saying that there was no alternative. There is an alternative, and it is set out in the motion in the name of the Labour party, which deals with employment and industry generally.

There have been one or two suggestions from the Conservative Benches about privatisation. In the past, privatisation has failed the nation. [Interruption.] I do not know what the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, the hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Mr. Trippier), is laughing about. He will have his turn later. Privatisation failed the nation. That is why industry had to be nationalised. One of the successes has been the mining industry — apart from the past 12 months, with all the problems. The nationalised mining industry has been a real asset to industry and to the nation's economy as a whole. I worked in it for 35 years before I came to this House, so I know what I am talking about.

When Conservative Members say that the workers of this nation are not prepared to accept change, that is a lie. [Interruption.] It really is a lie. I experienced the massive change that took place following the nationalisation of the mining industry. It was modernised because all the rich folks had been raking off all the cream before nationalisation, and all the good seams and all the good coal, leaving the rubbish for us to fight a war on. Following nationalisation, we in the mining industry accepted that a change had to take place.

Conservative Members laugh, but they do not know what work is. They have never worked in industry. That is their problem. Half of them were born with silver spoons in their mouths. [HON. MEMBERS: "Rubbish."] The point is that I have experienced real work. Many Conservative Members have two jobs. There is no work associated with that. They spend their time in the Chamber. They stay all night, keeping us here—we workers—then they nip off down to the Old Bailey for another rake-off. There are plenty of them doing that. Let us have it out in the open and on the table, so that we understand exactly what is going on.

It is being suggested that public expenditure should be cut back even further. The Secretary of State for the Environment is telling local authorities that they can spend only a certain amount of money in a year. Like some Conservative Members, I find that in my constituency people come to the surgery wanting improvement grants, but they cannot get them because this Government have cut them back. If the Government allowed the local authorities to spend the money, jobs would be created in the construction industry and property would be built. Conservative Members say that they are in favour of creating jobs, but it does not happen. It does not work out.

The Government had a policy of selling off council houses. Millions of pounds are stuck in the banks doing nothing, when we could be spending the money on the people whom we are supposed to represent in the House to provide them with good and decent housing. Yet young couples in my constituency who have their names on the housing list cannot get a house simply because the Government regularly cut back every year on public expenditure. It means that local authorities cannot do the things that they want to do.

There is another problem, and again it is related to the Government. One comes back to the Government all the time. I refer to textiles. I remember the other day the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) blowing his top over the multi-fibre arrangement and the Government not doing their job on the MFA. People are losing jobs in his constituency, in the textile industry. They have been losing them ever since the Government came to power in 1979, and are still losing them, as are constituents of mine in the textile industry, particularly in hosiery and knitwear.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central was correct when he referred to income tax. I well remember that first Budget in 1979 when those millions were handed back to the rich, but the workers got very little. What did the Prime Minister say at the Dispatch Box? She said that the Government were going to invest the money in industry. This is what my hon. Friend told us, and by golly he was correct. What did the Government do? They flitted it to the other side of the world, looking for the highest interest rates—not in Britain, but somewhere else. The Government said, "Blow the economy in Britain. I am looking after my big fat roll in my pocket and trying to make it larger." That did not happen just in 1979, because it has been carried on each year since then. There is no doubt that if the Chancellor has another go in the Budget next week, because he says that he wants £1,500 million to hand back, the rich will benefit again and the workers will suffer.

Some of the suggestions from the Conservative Benches about the creation of jobs make me laugh. Conservative Members have been making such proposals right from day one, and the only thing that has happened is that unemployment has gone up and up. Yet we in the Opposition make a suggestion in our motion, and I am sure that it is good. I am sure that it would deal with unemployment and create the necessary jobs. The Government know that their monetarist policy is not working. It is not creating the jobs that we are looking for, so we are at a standstill. The only way that we shall get out of the rut that we are in is either to have a change of that lot over there in the Government, or for the people to ask for a general election and let a party go in that will deal with the economy properly and look after the people properly — the people whom we are supposed to represent.

Mr. Lewis Stevens (Nuneaton): I have listened to a great deal of this debate on unemployment, particularly the training aspects. There has been much of the old rhetoric from Opposition Members, with recourse to the old ideas. They say that they greatly regret that the industrial training boards are being cut, as if they were something that provided what this country needed. Yet they have been in existence since 1964.

In this country we are short of people trained in the skills that we want. When he opened the debate, the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) made it clear that we were short of skills, yet the Opposition object strongly to the changes and training measures that we have introduced. It was right for the Government to get hold of the training schemes at the base—the YTS and so on—and introduce something to prepare us better for the future. Many of those old training schemes did not succeed. The Opposition believed that the old apprenticeship schemes were sacrosanct. Some were very good and some were very bad. They will not meet the needs of the future when training is needed. Training needs to be updated, and I am sure that the measures that the Government have taken are in the right direction.

My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson) spoke about the underestimation of the value of graduate training. It is strange that we are still short of graduates in engineering, design and related technologies. It is the one area where the demand is greater than the supply from our universities. What have we done? We have still not transferred resources, if necessary from some of the other subjects at universities, to training in that area.

I agree with the Opposition on one aspect—and it is not often that I agree with the Opposition. The productive industries—the wealth-creating industries—are still the most critical to get moving in the right direction. The areas in which we have failed in the past are well known, such as the ability to innovate up to a point, but not to develop and produce.

There is still a great need to raise production in this country so that we can take more advantage of our own production in both home and export markets. If it is possible to provide special relief for some of our basic manufacturing industries through the forthcoming Budget that will be all to the good. We still rely to a large extent on creating jobs initially in manufacturing industry from which the spin-off in other areas will then come. I hope that the Budget will provide some help in that respect.

Yet again the Opposition have advocated pouring money into the infrastructure as though that alone will create jobs. Experience with the money given in regional aid shows that the cost per job is very high and there is no certainty that the jobs will be permanent. So many companies, some in my own area, into which Government money was poured in the 1970s merely stayed afloat just a little longer, until Government public money as well as private money went down the drain. That is no way to spend Government money.

Real resources are needed to help people to use their own initiative. The enterprise allowance, for instance, has been a success. Success lies in co-operation by everyone in industry, unions and management, in the technologies that will develop this country, not in throwing money about in an indiscriminate fashion over which there is little control — a policy which failed under the Labour Government but which the Opposition still advocate.

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): If the Conservative Back Benchers who have spoken in the most recent part of the debate are the Government's friends, the Government certainly do not need any enemies.

The hon. Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Stevens) said that the problem was in manufacturing industry. Yet Government policy has been to ignore and even to decimate manufacturing industry. The hon. Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson), who is no longer present, seemed to misunderstand the Government's policy altogether. He wanted public spending on roads and infrastructure, but Government policy is to cut such spending. He also wanted public spending on training for engineers, but the education and training budget has been cut. He wanted high wages for engineers, but for the past two years the Government's whole strategy has been to cut wages.

What we heard from the Government today has been no more than the lame excuses of a failed Government who have wasted a decade of oil-based opportunity pursuing mistaken policies based on a bankrupt ideological solution that could not and will not work. The Government may be wholly resolute, but they are also wholly wrong. Six years ago we were told that monetarism meant that the problems of poverty and unemployment could be solved only by the creation of more wealth for the very wealthy. After six years in which the rich have grown richer without one additional job being created we are now told that poverty and unemployment can be cured only by creating further poverty. Yet even among those who stand to benefit from the Government's low pay policy—members of the CBI —a survey last October showed that 90 per cent of such members do not believe that a reduction in the amount of pay and benefit will increase the number of jobs in this country.

At the heart of this debate and central to any consideration of the state of our economy is the collapse of manufacturing industry in this country. So severe has been the decline that 1¾ million jobs have been lost since 1979 and manufacturing investment is 26 per cent. lower than in 1979. The decline is so catastrophic that even now that the pound is cheaper than it has ever been on the international market manufactured imports are outpacing manufactured exports by billions of pounds. The decline is now so great that not just our traditional industries but almost all the new industries and the technologies of tomorrow—petrochemicals, computers, telecommunications, data processing and information technology — have trade deficits of £1 billion or more.

In the 1984 calendar year alone, the fall of the pound brought the Chancellor an additional £3·5 billion in oil revenue. Yet the Government's solution to our economic problems is to cut the education, employment, training and trading budgets by half in the next four years. As a result, the historic low investment in manufacturing will continue and investment per worker will continue to be less than half that of Japan, the United States, Canada and our other competitors. The Government's plan is no longer for a high investment, high employment, high wage economy but for a low investment, low employment, low wage economy.

The Government's Ministers are the last men in Europe in the monetarist bunker. They are true to their prejudices to the last. We have Ministers who criticise the unemployed as lazy, feckless and incompetent, yet whose whole employment policy is based on the principle of doing absolutely nothing. We have a Prime Minister who has the audacity to return from America to lecture us about social security having met, in the President, one of the few pensioners in America who need not worry about social security. The Prime Minister holds a dinner to tell her Ministers that the solution to unemployment is for the unemployed to set up small businesses. They should invest their supplementary benefit on the Stock Exchange. Armed with their Girocheques, they should compete with the multinationals. Yet the Prime Minister's record in destroying businesses small and large is second to none in this century.

Five or six years ago we were told that unemployment had to rise to ensure economic recovery. At the time of the general election we were told that unemployment was rising in order to ensure a recovery. Now we are told that unemployment is continuing to rise because there is a recovery.

If there is a recovery, why has there been a 46 per cent. rise in the past year in the number of those unemployed for over three years? Our unemployment rate is already twice that of America and Germany, five times that of Sweden and Japan and one-third as high again as that of France and Canada. If there is a recovery, why is it that the NEDC says that it is hard to find any solid ground for expecting much improvement before the end of the decade? Why does the London Business School — normally a supporter of the Government—say that, even with the tax cuts proposed by the Chancellor, unemployment will continue to rise? Why is it that not one of the economic forecasts listed in The Financial Times today states that unemployment will fall over the next year? Why does the MSC say—as the Secretary of State for Employment should know well—that the number of the long-term unemployed will not fall in the lifetime of the present Government and that the numbers of jobs available for young people will decline over the next three or four years?

If there is a recovery, why is it that, in my constituency, unemployment is at a record high of 4,500 and has risen by 500 over the past year? Those people are casualties of the Government's economic war of attrition. Everyone knows that unemployment will continue to rise because of the crisis in the coalfields. In my constituency, there is even a threat to the royal dockyard.

The Government have created an industrial wasteland, called it a recovery and hailed it as a triumph of monetarism. Their highest aspiration now is not to rival West Germany but to keep pace with the South Koreans —not to keep up with Japan but somehow to keep pace with Taiwan. They have ravaged the prospects of a whole generation of working people. They have destroyed the hopes of entire communities. Because of North sea oil, never did a country enter a decade with so many opportunities. Never have a Government so squandered their opportunities, wasted their inheritance and betrayed the trust of the nation.

9.3 pm

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): This important debate has been characterised by a number of features. My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), who opened the debate, drew attention to the record levels of unemployment and linked them with the lack of training and the lack of industrial development in this country. The Secretary of State for Employment —the only hon. Member to have given the case for the Government today—did not rise to the occasion. I do not think that I have ever listened to a shoddier performance in the House. He treated the House in a patronising and almost contemptuous way. Towards the end of his speech, I began to realise that he had little alternative because he did not know how to meet the attack made by my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East.

Another feature of the debate has been the almost complete absence of the alliance. I see that my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) has taken over the alliance Bench. There is some just retribution in that. I hope that he will stay there.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): Withdraw.

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend looks so much better having taken over the alliance Bench. Two alliance Members have come in, made a speech and left again, and, of course, they are not here now.

As has always been the case when we have debated employment and industry during the past few years, we have record levels of unemployment. Unemployment is now higher than it was during the great depression of the 1920s and 1930s. It is even higher than it was in Germany in 1930. That is not a matter of amusement. We know what happened to Germany. The Secretary of State for Employment is drawing my attention to the fact that the alliance has returned. I suppose that we are grateful for that. Having had a look at the member of the alliance who has returned, I shall change my opinion.

Mr. Penhaligon: Better than some.

Mr. Smith: I agree. I hope that the hon. Gentleman understands that attending these debates is quite an experience. He will learn a great deal. I also hope that he will learn something from my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian who looked after the alliance Bench in his absence.

There are two sad and disturbing features of the high levels of unemployment. One is the number of long-term unemployed—more than 1 million—and the other, even more tragic, is the 1·25 million aged under 25 who are unemployed. On behalf of the whole nation, not just those whom we represent, the Opposition protest loudly at that waste of resources. The anger that people are feeling ever more deeply about the level of unemployment is growing weekly. Their anger will be visited on the Government who have presided over the growth of unemployment of the past six years.

When we discussed these matters in the previous Parliament, it was common for Conservative Members to say, "The Opposition must not accuse us of not caring about unemployment. We are sorry about it. It is a regrettable but temporary necessity. We care as much as you and it is unfair to accuse us of a lack of concern." That was some years ago. It was some hundreds of thousands of unemployed ago. It was before the Conservatives got a mandate to run the country again in 1983. As each month has passed and as the total of unemployed has risen relentlessly, the excuse has worn thin. I noticed that not one Tory has made that excuse or asked for that dispensation today.

The Government and those who support them do not care about unemployment. If they did, they would have done something about it long before now. At the best, they are indifferent to the social misery caused by mass unemployment, and, at the worst, they are content with the disciplinary effect that high unemployment has on the labour market. As our motion implies, we regard a reduction in our appalling level of unemployment as one of the central objectives which any civilised Government should have. The Government can, and should, reduce unemployment.

What will happen to our nation if that does not become the central objective of Government policy? There will be an emerging underclass in this country. Millions of people will be deprived of a decent standard of living. It will increase for those in work, but it will be continually denied to those out of work. Millions of children, unfortunately born either to the wrong family or in the wrong part of the country, will not be given the opportunity of a worthwhile career. Even for those in employment, the worry is growing daily that their children will not get employment or the education and training which their parents received.

Serious, debilitating and frustrating poverty is also increasing. My hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, South (Mr. Hughes) spoke of the frustration felt by his constituents in relation to unemployment. The army of unemployed and the growing number of poor people are denied elementary justice. Even if the Government cannot speedily reduce unemployment, why do they persistently refuse to class the long-term unemployed as suitable for long-term supplementary benefit? That would be elementary justice while we get busy with the job of bringing unemployment down.

The Government could afford to do so. In the last Budget, instead of removing the investment surcharge on people who must have had capital of more than £70,000 to gain from the change, they could have financed the giving of long-term supplementary benefit to the long-term unemployed. That was the social, political and moral choice made in the last Budget.

Why is the reduction in unemployment not a central objective of Government? Why will not the Government accept any of the proposals put forward by the CBI, the TUC and NEDC for a modest capital construction programme?

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): And the Tory Reform Group.

Mr. Smith: My right hon. Friend reminds me that the Tory Reform Group is constantly referring to that. It said only the other day that rather than eat the seed corn, the Government were setting it on fire, so profligate were they in their handling of our national resources. Why will not the Government adopt any of these projects? The truth is that the reduction of high unemployment is given a low priority. The Government think that the people will accept this and that, in political parlance, they will get away with it.

There is a curious masochism about the British people. They sometimes think that they must suffer for their own good and that there is a sacrifice which must be made if benefit is to come in the long term. For a while they were prepared to put up with fairly high unemployment, in the belief that it was all for the best and that as a result our economy would improve with better jobs in the long term. But the awful truth is that their sacrifice was for nothing, and when they realise how much that suffering was totally unnecessary their anger will be visited on the Government.

Mr. Marlow: The right hon. Gentleman will know that during the last Labour Government unemployment increased very significantly and perhaps even doubled. What policies did the Labour party then have for dealing with unemployment, and what different policies does it now have?

Mr. Smith: When the Labour Government left office, unemployment stood at 1·3 million. Long-term unemployment alone stands at that level. At that time I remember the Conservative party saying that the Government were responsible for doubling unemployment. I do not understand why the Government are no longer responsible. If the Labour Government are blamed for causing unemployment to double, why on earth are the Conservative Government not to blame for raising it to its highest level in our recorded history?

The hon. Gentleman has forgotten a further important matter. The Labour Government received a few hundred million pounds of North sea oil revenues. This Government have had £30,000 million of North sea oil revenues. That is the greatest windfall our country has ever had. Has that money been spent on tackling unemployment, reinvesting in our industries, or building our infrastructure? No, every penny piece of it has paid for additional unemployment caused by the Conservative Government since 1979. That is the answer to the hon. Gentleman's question.

Today some of us were amazed to be told that we were now in our fourth year of economic recovery. One after another, Conservative Members told us how much production had increased, how well we had done, how the Government were succeeding, how we could look forward to further successes because a Budget for jobs was on its way and that next Tuesday more goodies would come and the country would take another step forward.

I remind Conservative Members of what one of their own kind said last week—they do not believe what we in opposition say. The hon. Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell), who has been a critic of the Government for some time, but who is nevertheless a Conservative Member, spoke to the Oxford university Tory reform group. He assessed the Government's policies in the fourth year of our so-called economic recovery. He said:

> "Having produced disaster — mass unemployment, the lowest levels of investment of any industrialised country except Portugal, industrial output below that of six years ago, the first deficit in manufactured trade in British history, almost uniquely high real interest rates and the lowest-ever standing exchange rates, with UK inflation still higher than in the US, Japan and West Germany—they proclaim success."

That is the conclusion on the record of the Government by one of their own party after four years of recovery. The hon. Gentleman was so highly regarded by the Prime Minister that he was given a knighthood in the birthday honours list this year. I do not know whether she regrets that, but I doubt whether there will be any more such experiments in next year's birthday honours list.

So long as the Tory Government remain in office, unemployment will continue to rise because they have no plans to reduce it. As our people contemplate our predicament, another worrying thought will strike them. What is the future for British industry in the 1990s? If policies continue unchanged, British industry will become technologically obsolescent and will be staffed by an unskilled work force. If that coincides with the running down of North sea oil revenue and Britain running into a massive trade deficit, economic disaster faces us throughout the 1990s. That is a serious question and everyone must face it.

The Labour party intends to start a national debate about this, which will be argued both in the House and up and down the country. We shall draw attention to the need to create wealth. I am tired of being told by Conservative Members of the need to create wealth when for six years they have done nothing but waste our resources. They only talk about creating wealth, and their Government do nothing to assist that process.

I shall depict quickly three areas where the Government have a legitimate role to play in creating wealth, and where that is of great importance; first, in investment, secondly in research and development, and thirdly in education and training.

There is insufficient investment in the real economy of Britain. We are told month after month, sometimes in the House and sometimes outside it, that the City is a good mechanism for providing investment for British industry, and that the trouble with Britain is not a lack of money but a lack of viable projects. The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry is nodding. I hope that he read the Financial Times of last Saturday, which reported a speech by a member of the Cabinet with the headline "Minister attacks City". The speech was made by the Secretary of State for Wales, who may not be the most distinguished member of the Cabinet, but who is one of its more perceptive members. My hon. Friends' estimation of his perception will increase as I tell them what he said to the Cardiff Business Club only last week. He said that there was a "physical chasm" between the City and Britain's industrial areas, and continued:

"Among many household names in the financial world, there is at best a failure to comprehend the problem, and at worst a startling arrogance that leads them to conclude that all is well, that nothing calls for reform and that anyone with a good project can always find backing for it. Within this tiny island, we have a gulf of perception and even barriers of hostility, so that otherwise sane and sensible men can be heard derisively dismissing any venture in Wales, or for that matter in the North of England, on the general assumption that Wales is a bad place; that there are no capable businessmen there, and that in any case there is nothing to be seen but decaying coalminers"— that cannot be right—

"rundown steelworks and slag heaps."

The correspondent went on to say:

"Mr. Edwards, who was a director of Sturge Holdings, the Lloyds' underwriting agents, and Brandts, the merchant bank, before entering politics, said he accepted that people with good business projects and new ideas could go to see these, 'great, if complacent, men in the luxurious palaces that they construct and rent in the narrow confines of the Square Mile.'"

He said that in Japan and the United States the financial men went out and found the projects for themselves. People did not have to come and meet them.

The Secretary of State ended with this stirring conclusion:

"Even the most complacent, and the most contemptuous and the most ill-informed of the old guard in the City cannot remain blind forever to the startling changes now taking place."

Will the Minister of State tell us whether that is right or wrong? Does he support what the Secretary of State said or does he reject it? I regard it as startling corroboration of what we have been saying month after month and year after year.

We need a new approach to investment and to research and development. The amount of money that we are spending on devising new products and processes that will be the staple of our future industries is minuscule compared with our competitors on the Continent, in Japan and in the United States. As my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East said, the amount that we spend on education and training is also derisory. We need an entirely new approach to education and training, and the Labour party and the TUC have already published their plan for training, which guarantees at least two years' training to everyone in the country. Indeed, I go further and say that the Opposition believe that proper education and training in a fast-changing technological age is the right of every citizen. This is what the Labour party proclaims; it is what we will argue with the people and it is what we will carry through when we become the Government.

If we got investment right, did more for research and development and if we had a proper plan for education and training, we could begin to create wealth and new resources and get people back to work on a long-term basis. But the trouble is that the Tory party has become the anti-industry party. It is the party of fast food services and of financial services. It may be the party of tourism. As the Chancellor reminded us, the jobs of the future will be not so much low-tech as no-tech.

The Conservative party admires short-term projects that give short-term returns. Indeed, all the financial institutions are geared to returns coming in after three or five years. The high-tech industries of the future need a much longer basis of finance than that, and that is what Labour, through its national investment bank and through committing the Government to financing the industry, will ensure in the future.

There was a period in the last Parliament when the Conservative Government appeared to be against what they called the smokestack industries, the old traditional industries. They kept assuring us, under a previous Secretary of State and Minister of State in the Department of Trade, that they were in favour of the sunrise industries. The right hon. Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker), who has now been sent to Siberia to deal with local government reform, used to be the Minister for Information Technology and he was devoted to advocating the cause of the sunrise industries. What has happened since then to microelectronics and information technology? There has been a sudden change.

On 12 November 1984, sneakily, in a parliamentary written answer that the Government thought that nobody would notice, they announced a total moratorium on all support for innovation schemes for microelectronics. One day, one could have a programme sanctioned by the Government and the next, one was dismissed by the stroke of a bureaucratic pen. The Government stopped these projects stone dead and announced that the matter would be reviewed. We know that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry boasts about his Government dismantling aid to industry, withdrawing from the industrial scene and keeping out of the way of busy industrialists who are creating so much wealth. The Secretary of State is unlikely to bring back the support for innovation projects in anything like the way that it was before.

I am glad that the Secretary of State has come into the Chamber to hear the small part of my speech that I have reserved for him. The electronics components industry tells us that £100 million of investment is hung up because of the moratorium that the Secretary of State imposed, and that the effect of the withdrawal of capital allowances in the Budget last year has had a particularly damaging effect on the industry. Professor Ashworth, chairman of the information technology committee of the National Economic Development Office, said that what was wrong with the sunrise industries is that they are being eclipsed before they have even risen. He said that here we are, in the next industrial revolution, failing to the point when we cannot maintain key technologies.

That is a serious position for an important industry. I remind the Government that in 1979, when the Labour Government left office, there was a £600 million trade surplus in electronics. Now, there is a £2 billion trade deficit and Cambridge Econometrics has predicted that by 1993 we shall have reached a £9 billion trade deficit in the key industries of the future.

Let the Government not tell us that Government intervention is not working when Japan and West Germany have Government intervention and when even the United States, through the Department of Defence, has Government intervention to support and modernise this industry. The notion that the future of our economy and the whole of our industry should be imperilled because of the Government's ideological prejudice is something that people will find increasingly offensive.

The truth about the Government's economic and industrial policies, as the public are realising, is that they have come to the end of the road. The public know——

Mr. Tom King: What would Labour have instead?

Mr. Smith: I have told the House. We would have investment, research and development, education and training. We have come to the end of the road. We know that no economic success will come from the policies.

The people have realised something else. The Government have no capacity for breeding a united nation —they are dividing the country month by month. The north is divided from the south in terms of economic prosperity. The poor are divided from the prosperous, those at work from those out of work, those in education from those out of education, those in training from those out of training, and that continues as the days go by.

The Government have nothing to be proud about, let alone boast about. In the next two or three years — sooner rather than later—this argument will come to the centre of the political stage. It will be the responsibility of the Labour party and only the Labour party to argue the alternative case. When we have argued it successfully, we shall gain a majority to make in the 1990s a truly wealth-creating society.

9.35 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Norman Lamont): This debate has been extremely well trailed in the press. Only a few weeks ago The Guardian informed us that the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) would unveil, by pulling back the cord to great applause, the Labour party's new campaign on industry and jobs. After an interview with the right hon. and learned Gentleman, The Guardian commented:

"The campaign itself is a well thought out, wide ranging and highly ambitious attempt to convince a sceptical voting public that Labour now has a credible economic, industrial and employment strategy."

As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment reminded us today, all that was based upon a 57-page document leaked to the New Statesman which outlined the work of a committee set up under the Labour party and which said:

"Labour has lost the economic argument. People do not believe that our policies will work. The Keynesian argument has been tried before and failed . . . We should not promise too much too soon. In particular the term 'full employment' may now appear nebulous and over-ambitious. Instead, perhaps,"——

Mr. Leighton rose——

Mr. Lamont:

"Instead, perhaps,"——

Mr. Leighton rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not see the Minister of State giving way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Lamont:

"Instead, perhaps, we should talk in terms of new jobs and building industry for the future."

That is the basis of the campaign and it was the basis of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's speech.

We would be the first to welcome greater realism if that was really coming from the Labour party. We did not see very much of it today. We did not hear it from the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), who talked about spending £2·8 billion to create 1 million jobs.

The hon. Gentleman asked me to run the calculation through the Treasury computer to see whether it was credible. The Opposition seem to be obsessed with computers. They seem to believe that the simplest proposition—the idea that the earth revolves round the sun—can be proved only if it has been through the Treasury computer. They will not believe anything until it has been tested in that way.

At least the Leader of the Opposition has paid some attention to the findings of his committee. Early last year he withdrew the Labour party's absurd pledge that it could lower unemployment magically to below 1 million.

I agree with the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East that the only way to resolve the problem of unemployment is to concentrate on building industry for the future, but he told us very little about the Opposition's plans. He told us a little about research and development, and he complained about Government stringency there. However, the facts are that in 1979 the Department of Trade and Industry, with the programme that it inherited from the last Labour Government, was spending about £171 million, or 6 per cent. of the Department's budget, on supporting science and technology. That is now some £448 million, or 18 per cent. of the Department's budget. The Government have been cutting back on supporting the loss-making industries and putting more of the money into supporting the industries of the future. We have doubled what we have been spending in supporting research and development. We have doubled it in real terms.

When the Opposition talk about the industries of the future, they always think in terms of large businesses and great injections of Government money into them. Over the past four years, from 1980 to 1983, the number of new businesses has exceeded the number of liquidations by about 500 a week. That has been true of every year of this Government. In 1984 the number of new registrations reached an all-time high. The small business of today will be the large business of tomorrow, and no Government have ever done as much as we have to encourage start-ups and new businesses.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): rose——

Mr. Lamont: No, I will not give way.

The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East talked about training, as did my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) and others. No Government have spent more money than we have on training. It is known that my right hon. Friend and other Ministers are considering the future of Government training—[Interruption.] When we want to spend more on training the Opposition call it fiddling the unemployment figures. When they want to do it, they call it investment in training.

Mr. Randall rose——

Mr. Lamont: According to the interview that the right hon. and learned Gentleman gave to The Guardian, he said that it would be necessary for a future Labour Government to spot winners. That may cause a certain amount of alarm, because the record of previous Labour Governments has not been all that good at spotting winners. I appreciate that one cannot win them all, but they do not seem to win any of them.

Mr. Randall rose——

Mr. Lamont: No, I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman.

When we ask where the money is to come from, to spot the winners, the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East replies that it will come from the revenues of North sea oil. That is a favourite theme of his——

Mr. Randall: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Lamont: The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East constantly congratulates himself on the part that was played by the last Labour Government in developing the North sea, but he ignores the part that was played by private enterprise. His comments about using the revenues of North sea oil for restructuring and aiding industry were silly. He likes to say that the revenues of North sea oil have been used to pay unemployment benefit —[Interruption.]—but he knows that one cannot say that a particular part of revenue goes to pay a particular part of expenditure.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Lamont: The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East says that we should not spend the equivalent of North sea oil revenues on unemployment benefit. What does he mean by that?

Mr. Randall rose——

Mr. Lamont: Is he saying that we should not pay unemployment benefit?

Mr. Randall: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) keeps rising, but he can see that the Minister will not give way. He should not persist.

Hon. Members: Give way.

Mr. Lamont: I shall give way if Opposition Members will listen to my argument. The trouble is that they are not interested in arguments.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman says that we should not have the present level of unemployment. It may surprise him to know that as we are in government we must start from where we are. Does he really argue that he can double count North sea oil revenues and say that he will continue to pay the equivalent of North sea oil revenues in unemployment benefit and at the same time use them to encourage British industry? That does not add up. It is double counting and it is absolute nonsense.

Mr. John Smith: The Minister says that we must start from where we are. I remind him that he started with 1·3 million unemployed, whereas the figure is now well over 3 million, and is probably truly 4 million. We left office when there were only a few hundred million pounds of North sea oil revenues. The Conservatives have had £30 billion in revenues. It must be correct to say that the Government have spent more on the extra unemployment since 1979 than we received by way of North sea oil revenues. If that is true, what is wrong with saying that we have wasted our North sea oil revenues on unemployment benefit?

Mr. Lamont: The right hon. and learned Gentleman has not answered my question. He has not explained how he can use North sea oil moneys twice over. That is what he has to say, and that is what his calculations must tell us. It seems that the Labour party has a new answer to the problem. The shadow Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), has the bizarre plan of reintroducing a form of exchange controls. According to his plan, institutions such as pension funds and charities will lose tax exemption if they invest abroad. The right hon. Gentleman has told us that the revenue will have to be ploughed into a national investment bank.

There has been some speculation about whether my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer intends to tax pension funds. The Labour party is saying already that it intends to tax pension funds when it forms an Administration. That is the effect of the plans that it is advancing.

British industry does not have a problem that is created by a shortage of finance. That was borne out by the Wilson committee, which investigated the issue at greath length. It concluded that, whatever the problem facing British industry, it was not one that was attributable to a lack of finance. Whatever else my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is in favour of, I can assure the Opposition that it is not a national investment bank of the sort that they propose.

Measures such as the business expansion scheme encourage start-ups. About £75 million was invested last year in about 400 small companies through the scheme. Most mysterious of all in the Opposition's plans to generate jobs is their attitude to public expenditure. They have resisted each and every attempt to clarify their public expenditure plans. During the 1983 election they advocated about £35 billion to £40 billion of public expenditure. No one could believe that taxing and borrowing to that extent could do other than destroy more jobs than it would create.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley) rose——

Mr. Lamont: The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook was frank when he told us that the programme was not credible. At the same time, the Labour party has not repudiated the claim that it made during the 1983 election. In The Guardian during November 1984 the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook wrote:

"The idea that having lost the last election we can write a brand new economic policy ought to be abandoned at once."

That is what he wrote about the policy that he had described earlier as being an

"utterly credible policy."

Where does the Labour party stand? Is it seeking public expenditure of £35 to £40 billion? Does it support the £6 billion package that has been advocated by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, or does it support the mere £2·3 billion proposal of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook? The shadow Chancellor certainly recognises the dilemma. He wrote recently about his party's programme as follows:

[Mr. Lamont]

"Much of the Labour party's established economic programme is right".

I am sure that his party will be reassured by that and delighted to know that the right hon. Gentleman thinks that a large part of its economic programme is right. He added:

"It is in part damagingly opaque and its credibility has been diminished by over-precise estimates at the speed at which jobs can be created."

That must be the first time, even for a Punch columnist, that precision and opaqueness have been equated. However, I accept his argument that we cannot be precise about the rate at which new jobs are to be created. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman is not saying that if the Labour party is not to be precise on that score it will seek to raise unrealistic hopes about the level of jobs that can be created.

Mr. Barron rose——

Mr. Lamont: We all know that jobs do not come from Government spending. They are derived from firms' profits and by the Government setting the right conditions for the economy.

Mr. Barron rose——

Mr. Lamont: That was well recognised by the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey), who said:

"The only answer to the economic problems"—

[Interruption.] Perhaps the Opposition would listen to what the former Labour Chancellor of the Exchequer said.

Mr. Sheerman: It is the hon. Gentleman's fault.

Mr. Barron rose——

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I say to Opposition Members on the Front Bench that it is very unseemly to shout across the Chamber at a Minister who is seeking to make his speech. The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) did not interrupt his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith).

Mr. Lamont: The Government have repeatedly made clear our policy and attitude to public spending. The moment that anyone begins to look at Labour's policies and alternatives to our plans Labour Members say——

Mr. Barron rose——

Mr. Randall rose——

Mr. Walter Harrison (Wakefield): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have listened to the Minister and seen several of my hon. Friend's trying to intervene in the debate to discuss this matter. I have sat here quietly month after month. Surely the Minister should give way when my hon. Friends wish to enter the debate.

Mr. Speaker: No fewer than 22 right hon. and hon. Members managed to participate in the debate. I pay tribute to them for having spoken briefly. It is unseemly to shout across the Chamber or to seek to interrupt a Minister in the middle of his speech.

Mr. Barron rose——

Mr. Rogers rose——

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lamont: It is surprising that the Opposition simply cannot bear to hear any analysis and any attempt to criticise their policies. The right hon. Member——

Mr. Wareing: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is this a genuine point of order?

Mr. Wareing: I should like your guidance, Mr. Speaker. I know that you want to control the debate so that it is a quiet debate. Do you agree that the fact that a Minister refuses to give way encourages hon. Members to shout? There would be less shouting if the Minister gave way once or twice.

Mr. Speaker: I could not help hearing that the shouting started immediately the Minister rose.

Mr. Lamont: It is a pity that the Opposition simply cannot bear to hear anything about the policies. They cannot bear to hear the statement of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East. He said:

"The only answer to the economic problems which have dogged Britain since the war is to improve the performance of our manufacturing industry. That means higher productivity, better design, more vigorous salesmanship, more reliable delivery and servicing. That means good management, good relations and co-operation."

[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I hope that the Opposition are saying, "hear, hear" to the fact that since 1980 productivity in manufacturing industry has risen 20 per cent. I hope that when they praise the virtues of design, delivery, salesmanship and servicing, they will recognise that it is obvious from the export figures that were published the other day that this country is massively improving its performance.

Mr. Randall rose——

Mr. Lamont: In the last quarter of last year our manufactured exports were 15 per cent. higher than a year earlier and 13 per cent. higher than in the previous quarter.

Public spending is not the answer to unemployment. If it were, no country would have a problem with unemployment, because it is so easy to push up public spending.

Mr. Rogers rose——

Mr. Lamont: This country would then have had falling unemployment——

Mr. Barron rose——

Mr. Lamont: Public spending takes some 10 per cent. more of GDP than it did 20 years ago. If public spending is the answer, unemployment certainly should not have doubled under the last Labour Government, because they managed to push up the PSBR to 10 per cent. of GDP. The Opposition cannot escape this point. If the answer to unemployment is as easy and as simple as they say, it says little for their powers of persuasion at the last general election.

The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East said the other day:

"We must persuade people that wealth creation is the key to creating jobs in the caring industries like hospitals. Socialists must interest themselves more in the creation of wealth and not just redistribution of wealth."

He said that somewhat sotto voce. One never knows which reselection committee might be listening.

Mr. Cowans On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am not prone to raising points of order. I do not object to the Minister not giving way. That is his prerogative. I object to the perpetual turning of his back on Mr. Speaker. If he has a case to make, let him make it and not look behind.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The wisest thing to do would be to let the Minister complete his speech. Our tradition is one of robust speech, but that does not extend to shouting.

Mr. Lamont: It is meant to be a robust debate, but it also shows the Labour party's intolerance. It cannot bear to hear another view. We know that many Opposition Members have little respect for parliamentary democracy, but they should be prepared to listen to valid criticisms of their policy.

If the right hon. and learned Gentleman meant that the Labour party should always put wealth creation first, why has he always followed the Labour line of support for every strike since 1979? That includes the steel strike, the National Health Service strike, the water strike, the teachers' strike and the miners' strike. Let us consider the railways. The lonely loyalty of the railways has cost them about £240 million, and most of what freight traffic is left. It is estimated that strikes have cost the railways some 7,000 jobs a year. Now, after the damage has been done to the railways by strikes, the unions are asking for wage increases of over 30 per cent. Will we hear any criticism from Opposition right hon. and hon. Members of that wage claim? No, we will not.

Until recently the Opposition's chant was, "What economic recovery?" With GDP now at an all-time peak —some 4·5 per cent. above its previous peak in 1979— they have been forced to change their tack. We are not used to favourable comparisons between the United Kingdom and its European competitors, but when the United Kindom's performance compares well, we should not belittle our achievements. The United Kingdom led Europe out of recession last year, when we had the highest output growth in the EEC. Despite the miners' strike, United Kingdom growth is expected to be close to the EEC average for last year. Forecasters are once again expecting the United Kingdom to head the EEC growth table in 1985.

The Government having achieved a high rate of economic growth, the Opposition's criticism has changed. They say that manufacturing, in some sense, has not benefited from the recovery. If anything, manufacturing recovery has been faster than that of the economy as a whole. Since the first quarter of 1981, manufacturing has grown faster than the economy as a whole.

We have also had the excellent performance of our current account. We have had a current account surplus in each of the past five years. That had not happened since 1947.

It is clear that industry is responding to the Government's policy. Jobs will be created only if industry continues to respond. It is therefore vital that we continue with the policies that are beginning to get our economy moving and will keep it moving. I beg right hon. and hon. Members to support the amendment.

MR. SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House supports the Government's determination to pursue economic and industrial policies which maintain a sound financial framework, low inflation and steady economic growth and create the conditions for efficient, competitive and productive industry; welcomes its commitment to develop training opportunities for young people and adults and to help the unemployed through measures like the Enterprise Allowance Scheme and Community Programme; notes that these policies have already led to the creation of over 300,000 more jobs last year and believes that sustaining these policies offers the best hope of real and lasting improvements in employment opportunities.

ESTIMATES

Resolved,

That this House agrees with the Report [7th March] of the Liaison Committee.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Gallium Arsenide

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): It is highly appropriate that we are conducting this debate on what many hon. Members might regard as an extraordinarily esoteric subject—the strategy for gallium arsenide—immediately after a debate on unemployment and a future industrial strategy for Britain. However, as I hope to show, the two are closely connected. It is a pleasure to introduce an Adjournment debate on this important subject, and I am grateful to the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for representing the Government, and who will no doubt respond.

I have said that a strategy for gallium arsenide is of vital importance. I suspect that many of my colleagues have not even heard of it. Those who are aware of what is happening in our new technologies believe that it is on this issue, and issues like it, that the Government's seriousness about developing a strategy for new technology for the future may be judged. It is now becoming evident that the potential offered by the gallium arsenide chip, compared with the silicon chip, is one of the keys to electronics in the future.

It is very likely that, at any rate in large measure, gallium arsenide chips will become replacements for the silicon chip, particularly in the new generation of computers that are now being developed as a key element of the new technology both here and, perhaps more successfully and appropriately, in America and Japan.

Gallium arsenide has some significant advantages over the silicon chip, which most people believe it will replace. The qualities of gallium arsenide allow the electrons to travel perhaps five times faster than in silicon. It is believed that gallium arsenide devices may well provide computing speeds perhaps 10 times as fast as the current silicon chip. Secondly, gallium arsenide chips can be made to emit light. In other words, they can use the new fibre optic techniques or new capacities for the new science of opto-electronics, so as to provide certain facilities within computers for the new technologies.

Thirdly, and perhaps just as important, it has been proved that gallium arsenide is in some measure more resistant to radiation—to the electro magnetic pulse—which comes from atomic explosion. This is of particular importance to the use of gallium arsenide in the new range of military computers, and in that sense gallium arsenide is more robust and appropriate for the battlefield.

These qualities, and another to which I shall refer, make many people believe that the gallium arsenide developments that are now taking place are essential and vital for the new super computers of the future. Another development is also significant and deserves mention. It allows the development of multi-layer devices, the so-called quantum well structure, which allows the chip—doubtless we shall have to find a new word for it—to have one unique advantage. Its electrical properties can be changed to tailor it to the device in which it sits without having to make some other physical change. Only gallium arsenide and gallium aluminium arsenide provide that quality of the quantum well structure, which many people believe will be significant in future.

At present about 95 per cent. of all chips in devices are silicon chips. Many people believe that there is a huge potential to make massive inroads into that market for the development of a new kind of chip at the heart of our new technology. A recently published report commissioned by the advanced materials and devices committee states that it is likely that there will be a world market for gallium arsenide chips and devices in 1992 worth perhaps as much as £5,000 million.

A significant factor in this series of new inventions, as in previous ones—one does not have to think back far to remember many of them—is that Britain has been and to some extent remains in front in gallium arsenide research and technology. We remain up with the front ranks of nations—indeed, most people would judge that we have been ahead of the world—in this crucial new development. However, as has often been the case, we are being overtaken by development in the United States and Japan, for reasons which I shall mention shortly.

Many people fear that, as with the silicon chip production, we shall be left behind and that despite our pre-eminent position to develop the new technology, we shall become dependent for this vital ingredient, its activities and facilities on other people, unless something is done.

Paradoxically, the Government's Alvey programme, which all hon. Members with knowledge of these matters greatly welcome and recognise to be extremely important in plans to produce new technology, is undermining our capacity to develop this vital technology effectively for the future. Why is that? The Alvey programme is dedicated to developing silicon chip-based technology and it is taking up all the available funding with which gallium arsenide could be developed. The Alvey programme may be doing something for silicon chip technology, but is reducing funding and support for the development of gallium arsenide.

I am told that the Science and Engineering Research Council has been so significantly underfunded to fulfil its role in Alvey that on many occasions it has had to withdraw money from gallium arsenide research at universities to put it into Alvey. I am informed by a good authority that in many cases single American universities —there are not many of them, but enough—are now putting more resources into the development of research into gallium arsenide than all the United Kingdom universities together. The same is happening in industry. Rumour has it that Lord Weinstock of General Electric Company withdrew immediately up to £100 million from his research budget the moment that the Alvey programme came on stream, and told his researchers to get into the Alvey programme and get £100 million from that. I do not claim that the entire £100 million would have been spent on gallium arsenide, but some of it would have been. It is now being funnelled into a programme dedicated to silicon technology. The same has happened in other industries.

Some research is being carried out. Plessey, to its credit, has a programme valued at about £15 million examining the capacities of this material. But that is short-term research, and even Plessey's engineers say that, if we are to maintain our position and to develop it in the future, there must be much more long-term research into developing this new material.

In short, we risk losing our position in this vital technology at immense cost in terms of what we could be doing in world markets, immense commercial costs, and immense cost to our industry, because we may not have an indigenous gallium arsenide production capacity.

That is not all that we risk losing. We might lose the investment that the Government have already made in this technology. The advanced devices and materials committee estimates that the Government have already committed £100 million to research on the material. Most of that has been invested by the Ministry of Defence in research into its specific capacities in the military environment. But many believe—I am one of them—that we now need a strategy to develop our lead in this crucial technology and to produce domestically gallium arsenide devices. That will be essential in any meaningful new technology strategy for Britain. We need an Alvey programme to develop gallium arsenide.

Many believe, and I am inclined to agree with them, that it might have been more logical for the Government not to have tried to catch up on silicon chip technology through the Alvey programme. Many in the industry believe that that attempt, though brave and admirable, may be doomed to failure. It might have been better in the first place to have leap-frogged and developed gallium arsenide production through a programme similar to Alvey. But Alvey is now running, and it would be wrong to undermine it in any way. We need a similar programme to support gallium arsenide research and to bring it to commercial and industrial fruition. It can be done, and to some extent, it is being done. I understand that several firms already produce some gallium arsenide items for use within the military environment. I also understand that Philips in Britain—I realise that it is not a British company—has a prototype laser using the quantum well structure, which is considered by many to have immense market potential.

We need a co-ordinated strategy similar to the Alvey programme that is dedicated to this semiconducter, not to a silicon-based semiconducter. The advanced devices and materials committee called for such a co-ordinated strategy. Its report, entitled, "A UK Strategy for Gallium Arsenide", states that the committee's aim was to build on the expertise and current Government commitment to create a comprehensive fabrication facility for gallium arsenide. It calls for a national programme costing £300 million over 10 years—that is not an enormous sum if one thinks of it in terms of the development of industrial strategy—not all of which would be provided by the Government. Indeed, it recommends a 50-50 split between Government and industry, which is the sort of partnership that the Government have favoured in the past and which the alliance supports.

The report also called, significantly, for the better use of all resources in this area. The report identified a considerable barrier to the development of this vital new technology—the lack of skilled manpower. As we know, the National Economic Development Council has highlighted that problem in relation to the entire new technology area.

Thirdly, the report called for a collaborative programme with universities, industries and research organisations working together towards a common end. The funding that the report proposed is sensible and a starting point. It suggested that we might spend some £30 million, to be 100 per cent. Government funded, on research in universities. University research has fallen off dramatically and drastically, so much-needed research should be done in them. A second element of the programme was a 50-50 split funding for industry in industrial research. Lastly, there should be a 33 per cent. support programme for equipment in this sector.

The committee went further. It identified a technical programme with five key points which it saw as the foundation elements for such a programme. The first was material and devices, the second process technologies and facilities, the third circuit design, the fourth testing and packaging and the fifth demonstrator projects. Like Alvey, it proposed a directorate consisting of the Department of Trade and Industry, the Ministry of Defence, the Science and Engineering Research Council, with the full involvement of industry. This co-ordinated programme would not be wildly expensive and is modest in its scope, but even so would be substantially smaller than the equivalent programme dedicated to gallium arsenide in the United States and Japan, and probably in France as well.

That is the outline of the problem. I shall now quote from this useful document. Paragraph 12 says:

> Unless there is timely action to implement this GaAs programme and the associated supporting activities, the prospects of the UK competing successfully for a share of the predicted £5000 million world market (1992) for GaAs circuits will be slim. More seriously the added value system and capital equipment industry will be severely restricted in its ability to compete for business at the forefront of technology. The UK is starting from a moderately strong position, albeit one which has started to decline, if we can halt this decline and capitalise on the extensive experience available in the UK it will be possible to capture a significant fraction of the available market. We therefore urge that this strategy be adopted and supported."

There is a move between the Department of Trade and Industry to discuss the implications of the report and decide whether to accept its ultimate conclusions. The view in the industry is that the prospects of the Government instituting such a vital programme are, to quote the words used by a scientist recently, "very remote". We must hope that that is not so.

At the start of the debate, I said that for many the Government's plans for developing and building on Britain's present position in this vital sector to take advantage of our expertise, our position and our future needs for this material will be a touchstone for many by which we can judge the Government's seriousness in developing a genuine strategy for the new technologies in Britain in the future. The choice for the Government is to invest in the future and to build on that expertise, or simply once again to throw away their own investment and a good deal of our future. I hope that the Minister will make clear which of those he wants to achieve.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. John Butcher): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) for raising this topic. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Swindon (Mr. Coombs) who is holding a watching brief for a number of high-tech and information technology companies in his constituency.

There are key enabling technologies, on which we can come to a clear view at this stage of assessment. For others, we cannot be entirely sure that they will be the only key enabling technology or, in this case, enabling material. I am sure that the hon. Member for Yeovil will agree that the United Kingdom cannot afford to use a scattergun approach to seeding or pump-priming development work in enabling technology and the information technology sector.

Tonight, we shall inevitably end up discussing how far the United Kingdom wants to use the laser beam, the guided and pointed method, which is often described as the method being pursued by the Japanese. However, we have a number of positive comments to make about gallium arsenide on a number of issues on which we take a line similar to that taken by the hon. Gentleman. However, he will not expect me tonight to adopt lock, stock and barrel all assertions he made in his comments.

Given that we have to focus on what we believe to be the main chances for the United Kingdom, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that, within Alvey, taking four key enabling disciplines was the right method of approach and, regarding the material about which we are talking, to look, for example, at man-machine interfaces; to look at artificial intelligence, where the United Kingdom is doing a great deal and which is worrying our major international competitors; to look at software tools; and to look at large-scale integration, even though the competition is immensely fierce. I hope that he will agree that that was about the right construction for us to put on our research effort.

Similarly, in the DTI and other Departments, when it comes to such excruciating choices on resource allocation, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that we are right to focus on skill shortages as one of the major constraints on development of the new technologies within the United Kingdom. Already, therefore, we can see that there are a number of great pressures building up on budgets. It is these budgets that enable us to go forward in those areas that in 1985 we believe will provide a main chance for the United Kingdom.

I thank the hon. Gentleman for bringing the attention of the House tonight to this important topic. Gallium arsenide may once have been an esoteric subject for debate on the Floor of the House but, as he pointed out, no longer. It is now a practicable, though not yet fully developed, technology.

Gallium arsenide devices have advantages over those made from silicon in that they operate at a higher speed and can be made to generate light electronically. However, gallium arsenide is not an easy material to process and, as a consequence, is currently a comparatively immature technology if contrasted with well-developed silicon technology.

Despite the developments which will inevitably take place in both technologies, it is considered likely that it will always be cheaper to make very complex devices in silicon rather than in gallium arsenide, and therefore silicon is expected to remain the mainstream semiconductor technology. Nevertheless, gallium arsenide technology will be significant, and some estimates put the world gallium arsenide market, as the hon. Gentleman pointed out, at almost $5 billion in 1992.

Because of its advantages, gallium arsenide electronic and opto-electronic devices will undoubtedly play a key role in many electronic systems, providing high-speed information gathering, processing and communication facilities which will allow use of the full capabilities of the fifth generation computing systems. It is, therefore, of considerable importance that such devices are available to our information technology and electronics industry.

The development of gallium arsenide technology so far is one in which the United Kingdom can take justifiable pride, though we must be absolutely sure, as the hon. Gentleman pointed out, that this is not another of those enabling technologies which, once it gets to the enabling stage, somehow seems to drift away from our sight when it is being developed for specific markets. Over the last 20 years the efforts of our first-rate scientists and engineers in Government and industrial laboratories have brought the technology into its current position of forming the basis for a burgeoning commercial industry.

However, our international competitors, often in the United States, with the help of scientists of British origin, have also recognised the importance of this technology and are investing considerable resources to exploit the potential of both gallium arsenide integrated circuits and opto-electronic devices. If the United Kingdom is to remain competitive, we, too, must make significant investments.

It is the Government's belief that the bulk of the investments required must, albeit with some support from Government, be made by those who have both the necessary technical and commercial expertise to succeed, that is the electronics companies themselves. Commercial success in this area demands a detailed knowledge by those involved of future developments of electronics and communications systems and therefore our major electronics companies, particularly those with prior experience of gallium arsenide R and D, are ideally placed to take the lead in the United Kingdom's commercial thrust in this area. Indeed in opto-electronics we have already seen the willingness of our companies to make the necessary investments, with these efforts being accelerated by catalytic support under the DTI's £58 million fibre optics and opto-electronics scheme.

The Government's strategy is to recognise that, as in other microelectronic and opto-electronic topics in which there is intense international competition, there is a catalytic role for Government in stimulating and assisting industry's innovative efforts. In this context, I must mention the Ministry of Defence's considerable efforts in establishing the current United Kingdom position. Estimates indicate that over the past 20 years the MoD has invested considerable sums in support of in-house and extra-mural gallium arsenide R and D, and this is continuing with a 1984-85 allocation of £7 million.

Mr. Ashdown: Will the Minister be prepared to consider how much of the research and development funding which industry has provided for gallium arsenide may have been thrown away to make use of the Alvey programme and silicon chip technology? I am told that this has happened on a number of occasions and I have mentioned a couple of specific instances. I ask the Minister to consider the extent to which the Alvey programme has withdrawn funding from industry for gallium arsenide.

Mr. Butcher: I understand the hon. Gentleman's argument. It is one of the matters that we shall consider. There have been a number of submissions on this issue. I trust that he will allow me to press on in the four minutes that are available to me. I wish to turn to other areas of expenditure where additional resources are coming in. In the Department of Trade and Industry, as opposed to the Ministry of Defence, to catalyse the commercialisation of the MoD's and industry's efforts we have already provided support for projects associated with gallium arsenide and other compound semiconductors under the first microelectronics industry support programme, under the fibre optics and opto-electronics scheme and under the joint opto-electronics research scheme. These commitments total some £8·65 million. For example we have supported a private British company to build an extensive clean room facility for gallium arsenide integrated research. Another company has received support for the production of semiconductor lasers and detectors, and a consortium of companies and universities is being assisted to research the properties of super lattice type structures.

Also negotiations are currently under way on three applications for support under the second microelectronics industry support programme, which has as one of its aims the promotion of gallium arsenide technology, and more applications may be considered under this programme once the review of DTI support for innovation has been completed. An announcement on the outcome of the review will be made shortly. I know that there are Members on both sides of the House who are interested in the outcome of that discussion. Support is not available under the Alvey programme since this is based on silicon technologies, and diversion of funds into other technologies could prejudice the chance of success in silicon VLSI.

The Science and Engineering Research Council, which is the third arm through which gallium arsenide support is deployed, has also been active in promoting basic research in gallium arsenide and associated materials. The council, as well as funding relevant research through the conventional channels, is a joint sponsor of the joint opto-electronics scheme which I have just mentioned, and, through its low dimensional initiative is providing support for R and D in superlattices. These are very advanced devices made from very thin layers of gallium arsenide and similar compounds, the electrical and optical properties of which can be tailored as required. We are talking here of true semiconductor engineering which could have far-reaching consequences. The current SERC grant commitment on gallium arsenide is estimated to be £3·2 million.

Co-ordination of the efforts of MoD, DTI and SERC is achieved through interdepartmental representation on the management committees for the various programmes, and the DTI's advisory advanced devices and materials committee to which, if there is time, I shall return.

Much of the Government support that I have described is aimed at stimulating the innovative efforts of individual companies and at encouraging collaboration between Government research establishments, universities and industry to maximise the effectiveness of our national resources. There have been notable successes in collaboration, particularly in the fields of ion implantation in gallium arsenide and the development of advanced growth techniques such as molecular beam epitaxy and metal organic chemical vapour deposition. We will continue to encourage similar joint ventures in other topics such as plasma etching. No doubt they talk of nothing else in Yeovil and Coventry. We are not convinced, however, that the nature of the United Kingdom resources in gallium arsenide, based as they are in the main in a limited number of major companies, requires the formation of a formal directorate of the Alvey type to encourage the necessary collaboration.

I must conclude on that not very helpful note in the knowledge that there is a commonality of objective between us. No doubt, as this debate develops, the appropriate levers will be forged and will come to hand.

Oral Answers to Questions

SOCIAL SERVICES

Severe Weather Payments

1. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate how much has been spent up to the latest available date in the current financial year on exceptionally severe weather payments.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): The information requested is not available centrally, and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. When the period during which payments can be made is over, local offices will be asked to make a return so that the total number of payments made this winter and the cost can be worked out.

Mr. Strang: Now that the cold weather is, we hope, behind us again, does the Minister admit that the criteria for triggering the payments have been utterly discredited? Does he agree that, in future, any such payments should be based on temperature conditions that are the same throughout the country? Is not the idea that the Scots and others should be denied help with their heating bills because they are either hardier or thriftier nonsense?

Mr. Whitney: I do not agree that the system has been discredited. Certainly, the operation of the system, which is undoubtedly complex, is being examined. The hon. Gentleman, like a number of his hon. Friends, continues to confuse the operation of this system — which is designed to give budget help in exceptional circumstances — with the quite different question of a cold climate allowance. As Governments of both complexions have understood it, it is generally considered that the arguments in favour of one national benefit scale are stronger.

Mr. Donald Stewart: Is the Minister aware that although the payments recently made south of the border were entirely commendable, great offence was felt in Scotland at missing out, because the temperatures there are usually lower? Will he ensure that, in future, payment of cold climate allowance—such as that contained in a Bill to be proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson), and the principle of which has been contained in other Bills proposed by other hon. Members —is considered by the Department?

Mr. Whitney: Again, the right hon. Gentleman is confusing two separate issues. The criteria for exceptionally severe weather payments are very clear, objective, laid down and are available to the right hon. Gentleman if he consults the Library. The argument for a cold climate allowance has been very carefully considered during our social security reviews and has consistently been rejected by Governments of all complexions.

Mr. Andrew Bowden: Is my hon. Friend aware that many poor pensioners prefer to remain cold rather than get into debt? Will he ensure that before next winter there is in operation a fair and sensible scheme that will ensure that every pensioner is at least able to keep one room at a temperature of not less than 70 deg F?

Mr. Whitney: I repeat that the operation of the system for exceptionally severe weather conditions is under careful examination. I remind my hon. Friend that the major support for heating comes from our supplementary benefit rates, which we have maintained at levels above the rise in the cost of living. I also remind my hon. Friend that the Government are now spending £400 million a year on basic heating additions. This figure is £140 million higher than the amount spent by the Labour Government. I would also point out to him that the level of heating payments is kept significantly ahead of the rise in the cost of energy prices.

Mr. Kirkwood: Twice in my hearing the Minister has said that the severe weather payments system is under review. Will he give the House a guarantee that the review will be completed and a decision taken so that the same nonsense does not occur next winter?

Mr. Whitney: I can certainly give that guarantee to the House.

Mr. Favell: Does my hon. Friend recognise that our weather has an extraordinary propensity to change from day to day? This system must be extraordinarily expensive to administer. It is about time we called it a day. It is plain daft.

Mr. Whitney: I can only assure the House that the system is under review. It has operated for only two years. Every system that has sought to deal with the matter has run into similar problems. I also remind my hon. Friend that the major help for heating, as with other household additions, comes from our supplementary benefit and other social security programmes. It is important not to get this small addition out of perspective.

Mr. Meacher: Is not this bureaucratic obstacle course of a benefit a monumental farce when pensioners often have to wait weeks or months for the payment, and even then sometimes receive only a footling 50p? When will the Government take some real action, such as restoring the £1 cut in heating allowances which they stole from pensioners last November, building up the home insulation programme which they are now running down and scrapping these absurd severe weather payments in favour of a special fuel payment of £5 a week throughout the period from October to March?

Mr. Whitney: I remind the hon. Gentleman that the action taken by the Government lies in the fact that, for example, our heating additions payments of £400 million a year are £140 million a year more than they were when the hon. Gentleman graced the Government Benches. I also remind him that this Government have kept all the supplementary benefit rates higher than the cost of living.

Doctors and Dentists

2. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many doctors and dentists undertook National Health Service work at the most recent count; and what was the comparable figure in 1979.

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. Norman Fowler): The most recent figures (September 1984) are of 67,300 doctors and 17,200 dentists in the National Health Service in England. Comparable figures for 1979 were 61,600 and 15,300. Growth is 9 per cent. in the number of doctors in the National Health Service, and 12 per cent. in the number of dentists, over the last five years.

Mr. Knox: Does my right hon. Friend agree that these figures provide further evidence of an improvement in the National Health Service since this Government came to office and that they make nonsense of the remarks by the Opposition about cuts in the National Health Service?

Mr. Fowler: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. The figures established that this Government are devoting more resources to the National Health Service, that they are employing more doctors and dentists and, above all, that they are providing more services for patients.

Mr. Madden: Is the Secretary of State concerned about the fact that consultants regularly appear in court to give evidence during the time that they are employed by the National Health Service and that they pocket fees from the National Health Service and also very substantial fees for giving medical evidence? Does the Secretary of State agree that this is a potential abuse? Will he therefore look into it? Does the Secretary of State agree that if money could be saved in this way there would be less need for the Secretary of State to come to the House, as he did yesterday, and announce an increase in prescription charges?

Mr. Fowler: I shall look at any evidence that the hon. Gentleman can provide, although I hope that he will not persist in making generalised accusations against the medical profession.

Mrs. McCurley: Will my right hon. Friend preserve the freedom of doctors and dentists to help private practice evolve with the Health Service and to stop the accusation of cheating levelled at them by the Opposition?

Mr. Fowler: Yes. Action will clearly be taken on any abuses which are brought to my attention or which my statutory auditors find. That general and dental practitioners should have a right to private practice is clear and is the Government's policy.

Ms. Clare Short: How many people who need dental treatment are failing to turn to the NHS for that treatment because of its high cost, currently £15 for a couple of fillings, going up to £17.50? Many families must now be in need of dental care but are not receiving it from the system.

Mr. Fowler: The hon. Lady should look at the figures. In 1979-80 there were 27 million courses of treatment and today there are 31 million courses of treatment. In other words, the courses of treatment are increasing, not falling.

Lone-Parent Families

3. Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Social Security if he has estimated the increase in demand on personal social services which is caused by the increase in the number of lone-parent families.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Services (Mr. John Patten): The Government's plans for expenditure on local authority services take account of pressures on the personal social services, including the effects of increasing numbers of lone-parent families. For individual local authorities the grant related expenditure assessments are calculated using the latest available estimates of numbers of lone-parent families.

Mr. Sedgemore: Does the Minister accept the view of the National Council for One Parent Families that the GREA levels do not reflect the real needs of one-parent families? What extra help will he provide for those 13 inner London boroughs which have the highest proportion of one-parent families in Britain? In particular, what extra help will he give to Hackney, which, in order to get down to the GREA levels for the under-fives, would have to reduce expenditure by 43 per cent?

Mr. Patten: I recognise the particular problems of Hackney, which, I understand, has the highest proportion of lone parents of any London borough or any other part of the country. I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's concern for it, but he must ask himself why other London boroughs with almost as high a number of lone-parent families, such as Hammersmith and Fulham, manage well without rate capping and his authority cannot.

Mr. Fry: In assessing the extra needs of lone-parent families, will my hon. Friend examine the other benefits given to them, particularly milk tokens, which are subject to considerable abuse. Will he consider altering that system? A monetary payment might be the right answer to tokens abuse.

Mr. Patten: We shall certainly be looking at that in the course of my right hon. Friend's social security review. My hon. Friend referred to other sums and benefits available to lone parents. Let me point out that, for example, benefit for one-parent families has gone up by 112 per cent. since the Government took office, well ahead of the rate of inflation.

Ms. Harman: Does the Minister not recognise that it is not only the increasing number of lone parents that increases demands on social services, but the increasing number of unemployed and the very old? If so, why are the Government using rate capping and other rate penalties to reduce spending to inadequate levels as set by the grant related expenditure assessment? Do they not want provision to be by businesses to those who can afford it, while those who cannot afford it will have to rely on charities or, worse still, have no service?

Mr. Patten: Local authorities throughout Britain have increased their expenditure on personal social services by some 18 per cent. in the past five years. They must set their own priorities. The hon. Lady could better spend her time pointing out good practice to boroughs, such as her own, which sometimes have rather bad practice.

Board and Lodgings Allowance

5. Mr. James Lamond asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many representations he has received concerning the proposals to place a limit on the board and lodgings allowance.

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): We have received a large number of representations about the proposals directly, and the Social Security Advisory Committee has received over 500.

Mr. Lamond: Is the Minister aware of the disastrous effect that that change would have on organisations such as the Oldham single homeless project, which has now been operating successfully for seven years in Oldham? Is he aware that it would split families in the same way as the old means test did 50 years ago? It would also affect the young unemployed, who, even if they did get on their bikes, would be unable to find work outside their local area.

Mr. Newton: I see no reason why it should have the effects that the hon. Gentleman has described. I hope the House will agree that it is no service whatever to young people to give them undue encouragement to come to the big cities and then to trap them on benefit rates which mean that they cannot possibly afford to take work.

Mr. John Townend: Will my hon. Friend confirm that since 1979-80 the cost of board and lodgings allowance has risen by some 900 per cent? What will be the estimated cost in 1985-86 after the changes, and how does that compare with 1979-80?

Mr. Newton: At the moment I cannot give my hon. Friend an estimate for 1985-86. However, between December 1982 and the estimate for December 1984, the total of those payments, including residential care, has risen from £205 million to £570 million. No responsible Government could allow that rate of increase to continue.

Mr. Kennedy: Why has the Minister decided to make this change when he refuses to contemplate any of the sensible suggestions for improvements to other benefits and allowances, which have been put forward by hon. Members on both sides of the House, on the basis that a full-scale review of social security policies is taking place? Why has the hon. Gentleman gone ahead with this change when he refuses to show the same willingness to make sensible adaptations elsewhere?

Mr. Newton: We have made the change for the reasons that I have already made clear. We are doing no service to many of those who gain from the increase in benefit, and the increase is proceeding at a rate that makes it more difficult to do what we would wish to do for those in genuine need.

Mr. Meacher: Is the Minister aware that one of the groups to suffer most from this cut in the board and lodgings allowance will be the men who are kicked out of their homes as a result of his proposal to close 21 DHSS resettlement units? Is it not dogmatic privatisation of the worst kind when it is directed against people who, in addition to being homeless, have severe psychiatric problems? Do the Government not care that many of those men will not receive proper care in the community, and will die sleeping rough?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman has an absolutely relentless tendency to go completely over the top with any argument that he adopts. He referred to the resettlement units, but he should bear in mind that a significant number of those establishments are found in old-fashioned, decrepit, old RAF camps on the outskirts of our big cities.

Mr. Meacher: Not all of them.

Mr. Newton: I accept that not all of them are in that situation, but our declared purpose is to ensure that current resources are used to provide what we regard as more effective services to meet the needs of those people.

Mentally Ill People

6. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has received any representations concerning the level of local authority support for the mentally ill.

Mr. John Patten: Yes, Sir, I have received representations from several hon. Members and others since my right hon. Friend answered a similar question from the hon. Gentleman last October. The Social Services Committee has also produced its report on community care which bears on this matter.

Mr. Dubs: Does the Minister agree that, at the very time when it is his policy to discharge people from mental illness hospitals into the community, there is an additional obligation on local authorities to provide adequate care? Will he condemn the decision by Wandsworth council to cease funding the Bolingbroke day centre for the mentally ill, which means that some of the most vulnerable people in our community will be thrown onto the streets?

Mr. Patten: Local authorities are the junior partners in the movement of the mentally ill into the community, because money can be moved with patients into the community. Year on year we are providing better standards of community care, with increased numbers of day hospital places, increased numbers of day centres and, perhaps best of all, a substantial increase in — nay, doubling of — the number of psychiatric community nurses.

Mr. Galley: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's assurance that provision in the community for the mentally ill is not entirely a matter for the local authorities, and that health authorities also have a very major role to play. Will my hon. Friend take steps to ensure that mental illness hospitals are not closed before adequate provision is made in the community for those displaced, and that a flexible system of bridging finance is introduced, on the ground that the receipts from the sale of hospitals can be several years delayed from the initial capital provision required for the community facilities?

Mr. Patten: These closures of large hospitals are proceeding rather more slowly than many of us might like, because careful discussions have to take place between local authorities and local health authorities. Sometimes the root of the problem has been found to be not lack of finance, but lack of really good joint planning.

Mr. Carter-Jones: Will the Minister promise to investigate the special difficulties faced by the Salford health authority and the Salford city council regarding the discharge of patients from Prestwich hospital?

Mr. Patten: My right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health recently considered the problems of the Salford health authority.

Mr. Nicholls: Will my hon. Friend accept that if a policy of caring for the mentally ill in the community is to work, the mentally ill must be absorbed into the community at a rate with which the community can cope? Bearing that in mind, will he stress to local authorities that they must consider the extent to which people can be absorbed into their particular community, instead of, in some cases, issuing planning permission at random for a particular area because the houses there happen to be acceptable?

Mr. Patten: Planning permission is obviously an important part of the matter, and I know that there can be emotive issues, as there are in my hon. Friend's constituency. At the root of getting the relatively small number of the remaining mentally ill into the community, whom we judge can go into the community—there are about 5,000 — is not only money, but good joint planning between the health and local authorities to ensure that those people are well and properly placed.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Although I appreciate what the Minister said about the transfer of resources with patients from health authorities to the local government sector and voluntary bodies, will he accept that local authorities are anxious about the continuation of funds for places after the deaths of the patients with whom those funds come? I noted the comments from both sides of the House about the need to be sensible about the problem. Will he take them on board and examine ways to encourage local authorities to accept their responsibilities in that regard?

Mr. Patten: There are long-term issues to be considered. For the life of a patient, funds are transferred on a named basis with a particular patient.

Mrs. Currie: Is my hon. Friend aware that the Select Committee on Social Services, which recently reported on community care, expressed deep anxiety about the ready availability of rhetoric and principle and in some cases the considerable lack of action and practice? Will he comment on its recommendation that the Department's social work service has an important role to play in the setting and maintenance of standards throughout the country, possibly through an inspectorate?

Mr. Patten: My hon. Friend talks about the readiness of rhetoric, and I listened carefully to what she said about that point. We welcome the report of the Select Committee on Social Services, on which my hon. Friend gives such distinguished and painstaking service. The report has 101 recommendations, and we shall respond in detail to each recommendation, including the reference to rhetoric which my hon. Friend mentioned.

Mr. Alfred Morris: Is the Minister aware that many of the local authorities which want to do more to provide community care for the mentally ill now say that they are in a Catch-22 situation? In seeking to observe the Government's rate laws, they find it increasingly difficult to discharge their mandatory duty to the mentally ill and others under the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970. What are DHSS Ministers doing to persuade Treasury and Environment Ministers of the need to ensure that adequate funds are available for the full implementation of that Act?

Mr. Patten: Bad authorities which cannot run good social services departments should look at the best practice of good social services departments, which are run predominantly by Conservative-controlled local authorities.

Limited List Prescribing

7. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received since he announced his revised limited list about a possible appeal mechanism for the prescribing of non-listed medicines.

13. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many representations he has received concerning the revised final version of his limited list of drugs available on the National Health Service.

Mr. Fowler: We have received 123 letters commenting on the selected list which I announced on 21 February. Ninety-five have been from doctors or patients, of which 11 have been about a mechanism which would enable drugs not available at NHS expense to be prescribed in particular circumstances.

Mr. Beith: As the Minister has conceded that his first attempt at a limited list was unsatisfactory, why is he so self-confident as to believe that his second attempt is absolutely perfect and foresees every possible clinical need, given that some doctors believe that even with the new list they will be unable to prescribe appropriate pain killers for some cancer sufferers? Does he recognise that he may greatly reduce the opposition to the limited list if he provides a mechanism through which special cases could be dealt with and had it in operation as soon as the list comes into operation?

Mr. Fowler: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says. The expert committee that looked at the list of drugs believed unanimously that the selected list would meet all clinical requirements. The vast majority of concern has now been met. Nevertheless, if the profession wishes to propose some appeal mechanism I am ready to discuss it with the profession. That will mean that the profession will have to come and see me and talk about it.

Mr. Andrew MacKay: Is my right hon. Friend aware that many Conservative Members who strongly support his proposals nevertheless believe that it would be in the interests of patients to have an appeals procedure, whereby drugs that are not on the list but are later proven to be essential can be made available? Has he received any communication from the British Medical Association—a minority of whose members have behaved callously towards elderly and sick patients—as to whether it will assist in the appeals procedure?

Mr. Fowler: We have received independent advice from about 2,000 general practitoners, but regrettably the British Medical Association has said that until the House debates the subject next Monday it will not take part in talks. I regret that, but I hope that after Monday's debate the BMA will come to see me and my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health as quickly as possible.

Mr. Loyden: Does the Secretary of State agree that the Government's handling of this has been ham-handed, to say the least, and that anxiety among the sick, especially the elderly sick, could have been avoided had the matter been handled differently? Is it not clear that he must do something immediately to remove people's anxiety over whether they will continue to be provided with drugs that have been successful?

Mr. Fowler: I do not accept what the hon. Gentleman says. We have always made it clear that we would consult on our proposals and that the original list was provisional. The result of consultation is the extended list. The vast majority of the public and of the medical profession accept that the list is now good.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, although restricting the variety of prescriptions may be necessary, restricting the quantity of drugs prescribed is vital? Will he require doctors to limit prescriptions to 28 days' supply at a time, which would be cheaper, safer and less wasteful?

Mr. Fowler: I am not sure that I can require them to do that. An advantage of the debate that we have had is that there is now much more concern about prescribing habits, and I hope to be able to follow that with further advice from the Department. In principle, I have great sympathy with my hon. Friend's point.

Mr. Flannery: Does the Minister realise that we have received a heavier postbag on this issue than on almost anything else, which is the real reason why so many Tories are standing up? Does he realise that every week there is a new and developing onslaught on the NHS, which causes more and more people to worry about what the Government will do? Is this the creeping privatisation of the Health Service by 1,000 cuts, of which this cut is a major part?

Mr. Fowler: The hon. Gentleman is being more than usually absurd. He must recognise that we are trying to raise money for the NHS. However, it does not surprise me that he comes to such a conclusion. He and the Labour party want more spending on the Health Service but have not thought about how that money will be raised.

Mr. Latham: Although I welcome the tone of my right hon. Friend's answers this afternoon, especially the feeler that he put out to the medical profession, does he accept that if he met doctors' concern about an appeals procedure in cases where doctors genuinely believe that certain drugs must go to their patients he would do much to defuse all reasonable opposition?

Mr. Fowler: Indeed, and that is why I said that my door is open to listen to representations on that. I am sympathetic to the principle, but it is reasonable to say that if the BMA wants talks it must come to me and discuss the matter.

Mr. Kennedy: What consultations is the Secretary of State having with his opposite numbers at the Department of Trade and Industry, who commissioned a working paper from the pharmaceutical industry on extending patent life, which would be a way of moving towards generic substitution and thereby forgoing the shambles which this limited list has caused?

Mr. Fowler: The hon. Gentleman's description of the position is not remotely fair or accurate, and I should be sorry if he took that view into the Division Lobby. Clearly, I am consulting my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, but, as the hon. Gentleman will know, I am the sponsor of the pharmaceutical industry, which has made it clear that, despite the controversy over the limited list, it wants the DHSS to continue as a sponsoring Department.

Mr. Sims: Will my right hon. Friend say what representations he has made to the ABPI? Does he agree that its newspaper campaign has not only been misleading, but has caused quite unnecessary concern, particularly to elderly people?

Mr. Fowler: I think that the campaign of the ABPI —and I would say that at times the ABPI has not been speaking for some of the excellent companies in the industry — on occasions has been disgraceful and hypocritical. It must be pointed out that its latest proposal, in which it suggests that old people will be affected, goes ill with its suggestion that exemption should be removed as one of the ways of making money.

Mr. Dobson: Will the Secretary of State tell the House how much of the cost of his estimated saving of £75 million will be borne by pensioners? If he cannot give the House a figure, will he say why not? Surely he does not intend to take some free medicines away from pensioners without knowing first how many will be affected and how much money they will lose?

Mr. Fowler: I do not think that our proposals will affect the pensioners. What we expect this to do is to cut the drugs bill by £75 million immediately. We have always recognised that consultation would mean less saving. The aim is to look for further ways of getting better value for the drugs bill.

Mr. Baldry: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the savings made under the limited list system will redound to the benefit of the National Health Service and not simply to the benefit of the Treasury?

Mr. Fowler: Yes, that is the whole point of the proposal. The money saved will go to health care. The Opposition have been consistent in pressing me to make economies in the drugs bill. The difference is that the Government are doing something about it. The fact is, as my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) says, that the proceeds from that will go into health care.

Care in the Community

8. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement about proposed developments in relation to care in the community.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): We shall continue to encourage the development of services which enable people in need of care to live as normal a life as their condition allows.

Mr. Fatchett: I think that the overwhelming majority of people would acknowledge that as the correct policy in principle, but, will the Minister recognise the widespread anxiety among local authorities about the level of funding for community care? What guarantees can the Minister give that an appropriate and satisfactory level of funding will be made available to local authorities?

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for agreeing with the policy in principle. I can assure him that some very good things are now being achieved in practice by way of placing patients in more suitable care. Local authority social services spending has gone up by 18 per cent. on average ahead of inflation while the Government have been in office. As my hon. Friend was saying, as long as local authorities pay attention to getting the best value for that money, we believe that they can make perfectly adequate provision for this policy.

Mr. Alexander: Are we not in danger of being over-hasty over the closure of some hospitals, such as Balderton hospital in my constituency, and Saxondale hospital in his? Can he give the House an assurance that these hospitals will not be closed until firm placings are available for those who will be affected?

Mr. Clarke: As my hon. Friend mentions Saxondale hospital in my constituency, I can tell him that I well remember that being mooted for closure by the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) when he was Minister for Health. I am glad to say that we now have a definite date for closure. I agree with my hon. Friend that no closure of any hospital should take place unless and until there is proper provision for better care for the patients. The health authorities concerned are planning to provide just that.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Why should there be under-funded care in the community when there are perfectly good hospitals for the mentally handicapped available, such as the Dovenby hospital, in Cumbria, in my constituency? Is the Minister aware that the future of that hospital is being threatened only because of the backlog of repairs? Why does the Minister not cough up the money and make sure that the people in that hospital who wish to stay are not forced out into the community to save the Government money?

Mr. Clarke: Many of our mentally handicapped patients would do better and have a better quality of life in good, smaller facilities than they will by being locked away in older hospitals. That is the aim of the policy. I understand the reluctance of many of the patients, which is shared by their families, to emerge from a hospital in which they have lived for a long time. However, only recently I met a man released from a hospital in which he had lived for 44 years, spending most of that time mute and violent, who is now enjoying a reasonable quality of life in a small home in Eastbourne.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that there is a shortage of accommodation for the single homeless? In those circumstances, and in view of what the Minister of State said in answering an earlier question, will he reconsider the closure of resettlement units? The one in Newbury is a modern building, the costs of which compare favourably with private accommodation. As it has not been asked by the DHSS to trim its costs, why is it being closed?

Mr. Clarke: I assure my hon. Friend that we shall ensure that our policy towards resettlement units does not conflict with our care in the community policy. As my hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security said, we are seeking to make better use of the resources and, in most cases, to make improved provision.

Mr. Ashley: Is the Minister aware that many mentally disabled people are being pushed out of hospital, that health authorities then divest themselves of responsibility, that local authorities refuse to accept responsibility and that the mentally ill are thereby left in a no man's land, with appalling consequences for them? Is he aware that the only answer is for him to guarantee a community place for every mentally ill person who leaves hospital?

Mr. Clarke: I agree that we must ensure that such incidents do not occur and that, when they occur, they do not happen again. It is essential to make a proper assessment of any provision for each patient. We have lifted many restrictions which applied to health authorities and which previously stopped them from providing funds to enable local authorities to make more provision. We are satisfied that, with good joint planning and the good planning of resources, the policy can go forward successfully.

Mr. Rathbone: Will my right hon. and learned Friend accept that many people are thoroughly in favour of the thrust of the new policy——

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: It has been the policy for 25 years.

Mr. Rathbone: —but that there is a need to reassure some patients who are being moved out of old-fashioned hospitals and into the community that they will have the care in the community to which they have become used?

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for those remarks, though, as my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) pointed out, it is not a new policy in principle. It is, however, being handled with more care and pace than has been the case in the past, and we must reassure people with understandable fears that proper provision will be made for patients.

Ms. Harman: As the Government are prepared to give 100 per cent. disregard from rate capping for all council spending on civil defence, why cannot the right hon. and learned Gentleman persuade his fellow Ministers to give 100 per cent. disregard for all spending under joint finance for care in the community? Does he appreciate that the increased spending on the social services which he has praised is attributable largely to the actions of councils which are now being penalised by the Government by rate capping?

Mr. Clarke: We have just eased the rules on the disregarding of joint finance expenditure and put joint finance in line with the urban programme. I assure the hon. Lady that some councils—such as authorities in Exeter and Devon, which are not remotely threatened by rate capping because they provide good services without breaching the Government's guidelines — are making spectacular progress.

AIDS

9. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent representations he has received concerning his guidance about the precautions to be taken concerning acquired immune deficiency syndrome.

15. Mr. Knowles asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is satisfied that reasonable safeguards have now been taken to protect hospital staff from infection by the acquired immune deficiency syndrome virus.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I am satisfied that the precautionary measures recently recommended by the advisory committee on dangerous pathogens in its interim guidelines on AIDS for clinical and laboratory staff are adequate. Indeed, in the view of some experienced clinicians, they are too stringent. The interim guidelines were issued on 16 January by Health Ministers and the Health and Safety Commission. We have so far received only a small number of inquiries and comments, mostly relating to the interpretation of wording or specific points of detail. We are learning more about the disease as time goes on and the guidelines will be reviewed in 12 months' time.

Mr. Parry: Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware of the concern of the National Union of Public Employees on behalf of its members employed in the National Health Service, such as nurses, ancillary staff and ambulance personnel? Is he also aware of the concern that has been expressed on behalf of other public servants such as police officers, prison warders and firemen? Will he provide clearer guidelines for those people and make a statement to allay the fears that exist among the general public on this issue, so as to avoid any question of panic arising? Is he further aware of the concern of hon. Members, as shown by the fact that early-day motion 374, tabled by me, has been signed by 103 hon. Members?

Mr. Clarke: The guidelines are clear and should be reassuring. I assure the hon. Gentleman that, for example, in the United States, where there have been 8,000 cases of AIDS, there has not been one case of a hospital or laboratory employee contracting the disease as a result of his or her work.

Wrightington Hospital, Lancashire (Children's Ward)

10. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if revised proposals have yet been received regarding the children's ward at Wrightington hospital, Lancashire.

Mr. John Patten: No, Sir.

Mr. Atkins: Is my hon. Friend aware that this matter has gone on for too long? Can he give any indication when the matter will be resolved, because local people are becoming increasingly concerned about the delay in saving this very important ward?

Mr. Patten: Yes, Sir. Shortly.

Elderly Persons

11. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the latest average weekly subsidy per head paid by his Department for the care of the elderly in private residential and nursing homes for the elderly.

Mr. Newton: Our records do not identify separately payments made to the elderly in homes for the elderly. However, the most recent provisional figures indicate that in December 1983 the average weekly payment of supplementary pension—which is paid to people over pension age—in residential care and nursing homes was £75·25.

Mr. Pike: Will the Minister recognise the concern at the large growth in private nursing homes, and will he ensure that adequate resources are given to local authorities to inspect and control these homes? Will he also ensure that local authorities have adequate capital and revenue resources to provide sufficient sheltered and residential accommodation for all our people who should have this provided by local authorities?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman will know that we are anxious to have a proper balance of provision as between all the providers and that we have recently taken new steps to improve the registration and inspection of homes. I am sure that he will agree with that.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Bidwell asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 March.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. After my duties in the House, I shall be leaving to attend the funeral of the late President Chernenko.

Mr. Bidwell: Has the right hon. Lady's attention been drawn to the point raised in the House yesterday about the outrageous remarks of the chairman of the National Coal Board, Mr. Ian MacGregor? Does she think that he is really up to the job when he is capable of saying that the miners—according to the Sunday Telegraph—

"are now discovering the price of insubordination and insurrection.—And boy, are we going to make it stick!"

What kind of a clown have we in that job? Will the right hon. Lady consider sacking him and thus help to promote peace in the coalfields?

The Prime Minister: I have every confidence in Mr. MacGregor, the chairman of the National Coal Board.

Mr. Shersby: Is my right hon. Friend aware that determined action by the Conservative councillors on the Greater London council has resulted in a saving on the rates of 3p in the pound for each of the London boroughs? Does she agree this is a very significant saving for London ratepayers?

The Prime Minister: Yes. I think that the determined action of this Government, coupled with the determined action of Conservative councillors on the GLC, has been of great benefit to the ratepayers of London.

Q2. Mr. Hardy asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave a few moments ago.

Mr. Hardy: Could the right hon. Lady find time today, or very soon, to reflect upon the position of those communities, some of them in my own constituency, where scarcely any teenagers are in normal employment? Does she not even begin to understand the consequences of such a situation, and may we at least have an assurance that Government economic policy will not be maintained until our societies are utterly corroded?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, we have done a great deal, and we hope to continue to do more, under the youth training scheme, the technical education initiative in schools and many of the computer centres to enable young people to get better skills to enable them eventually to get better jobs.

Mr. Warren: When my right hon. Friend goes to Moscow tomorrow, will she make plain to the Soviet people the strong feelings, which I am sure are shared by many of us, that, with the sadness of the death of their leader, we also have high expectations because Mr. Gorbachev, on his visit to this country, opened the doors of peace and friendship, which has given hope to the people of this country that the interests and aspirations of the people of the world can be met and that we can live in peace together?

The Prime Minister: I think that that will be the wish of everyone when we go to the funeral in Moscow. I think that we may take heart from the fact that the negotiations, which were due to begin in Geneva, have begun, and we all wish that they end successfully in agreement.

Mr. Kinnock: May I first agree with every word of that last reply? Today and tomorrow, will the Prime Minister take the opportunity, when she meets representatives of our Western allies in Moscow, to discuss with them the star wars initiative?

The Prime Minister: That would be expected.

Mr. Kinnock: I am grateful for that reply. Will the right hon. Lady be reflecting to them the view expressed today by her predecessor, her right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), that star wars would be decoupling, destabilising and a diversion of resources? Since that is so obviously true, why must the right hon. Lady still trail along toadying behind the Americans? Why does she not do what a real friend would do and tell them they are wrong, honestly?

The Prime Minister: I believe that the United States is right to do research. It would be very difficult to get an agreement on research only, because there is no way of verifying what research is going on. When it comes to deployment and testing, that is already covered by the anti-ballistic missile agreement, and that is why I would expect it to be dealt with in that way.

Mr. Latham: Is my right hon. Friend aware that her trip to Moscow should certainly not lead to the decoupling of the West from its allies, as has just been suggested, but she should try to persuade the Russians to negotiate sensibly and then get the peace and disarmament that we are all looking for?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I think that it has been the unity and strength of the West that has brought the Soviet Union back to the negotiating table at Geneva.

Mr. Steel: While the Prime Minister is in Moscow, will she make it clear that not only does she welcome the restart of the Geneva talks today, but that she is willing to make a contribution to them by indicating in principle that the Polaris deterrent should be counted in in East-West negotiations?

The Prime Minister: No, I do not believe that either our own independent deterrent or the French independent nuclear deterrent should be counted in. Ours amounts to only some 3 per cent. of the Soviet intercontinental ballistic missiles. When that is brought down enormously — very substantially indeed — the situation might be changed, and we might be prepared to consider a different course.

Sir Anthony Grant: In all the euphoria over the new Soviet leader and his charming wife, does my right hon. Friend agree that the most welcome sign of a change of attitude would be a halt to the genocide that is still going on in Afghanistan?

The Prime Minister: That would be very welcome indeed. I am reminded, as my hon. Friend suggests, that this year is the 10th anniversary of the Helsinki accord. Doubtless that is a matter for us to reflect about and take action upon.

Q3. Mr. Wareing asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Wareing: Will the Prime Minister justify to the House how the Government can cut the real value of the heating allowance to old and disabled people and the housing capital investment programme on the one hand, but allow the cost of Trident to treble on the other hand? Is the right hon. Lady proud of the fact that to millions of our fellow countrymen and women she has become the personification of all that is unjust in our society?

The Prime Minister: The heating allowance has not been cut. It has gone up greatly, ahead of anything that the last Labour Government had and is far ahead of any increase in fuel costs. The cost of Trident will be paid at the time when it falls to be due. We do not know precisely what the dollar-pound exchange rate will be at that time.

Mr. Terlezki: When my right hon. Friend meets Mr. Gorbachev tomorrow or the day after, will she please ask him about the foreign policy that he wishes to implement, knowing that he may well reign over the Soviet Union for the next 20 years? Will my right hon. Friend ask him to ensure, sooner rather than later, that the Soviet Union withdraws Soviet troops from Afghanistan, dismantles the SS20s and adheres to the Helsinki final act? That is the only way to ensure peace and prosperity for all mankind.

The Prime Minister: I think that my hon. Friend has encapsulated the point and I cannot improve on the excellence of his question.

Q4. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Banks: Will the Prime Minister repeat the exact words that she used during the 1979 general election campaign when she said that she had no intention of raising prescription charges? Will she tell the House by what percentage they have gone up since 1979?

The Prime Minister: Yes, sir. I have the transcript of the press conference here with me. Word for word I shall say exactly what the hon. Gentleman asked me:

"I doubt very much whether any responsible Government could say that over a period of five years, regardless of what happened to the value of money, they would not put up prescription charges. I doubt whether they could."

Q5. Mr. Tim Smith asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Smith: Further to the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby), as Ken Livngstone recommended to the GLC the setting of a rate within the legal limit, and as he now appears to be in some difficulty about his nomination in Brent, East, will my right hon. Friennd commend him to those concerned for his new-found respect for the rule of law?

The Prime Minister: I am very pleased that in spite of all the political posturing a legal rate has been set. I am doubly pleased that it has been so, despite the advice of the Labour party conference, which we all saw on television last autumn. I hope that other rate-capped authorities will follow the example and set a legal rate.

Mr. Beggs: Does the Prime Minister share my regret that Cardinal O'Fiaich's remarks in Boston and the speech by Bishop Duffy in London appeared to support the IRA's demand for British withdrawal from Northern Ireland? Would it not be much better if these gentleman were to take the Pope's advice and concentrate on saving souls?

The Prime Minister: The troops are in Northern Ireland to protect the fundamental rights of the people. I believe they do their task excellently and we would wish to congratulate them upon it.

Q6. Mr. Tracey asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Tracey: Will my right hon. Friend urge those teachers who are taking selective strike action to go back to work and stop the damage to our children, including some in my constituency of Surbiton? Does she share an interest with me in hearing the attitude of Opposition Members to the action taken by some teachers?

The Prime Minister: I make it clear again that I deplore the action of those teachers who, to pursue a pay claim for themselves, will harm the interests of the children in their care. That is the view taken by most parents and by most people. I applaud the action of the teachers who will not go on strike but who are bearing a particularly heavy burden because some of their colleagues have done so.

Mr. Weetch: Has the Prime Minister's attention been drawn to a report on the front page of The Times today concerning the killing of 34 Lebanese villagers in an Israeli attack, which has been described as inhumanly ferocious? Does the Prime Minister know that there is a motion of censure before the Security Council at this moment on behalf of the Lebanon, which the United States intends to veto? Can the Prime Minister tell the House what her instructions are to the British representative? Will we, this time, exercise political and moral independence of the United States?

The Prime Minister: We deplore the appalling violence in south Lebanon and Beirut. It underlines the need for an early and complete Israeli withdrawal, co-ordinated as far as possible with the Lebanese authorities. Retaliation and counter-retaliation will solve nothing and will only add to the tragic suffering of civilians. We do not say how we shall vote while the motion is still being considered and the debate continues.

Q7. Mr. Amess asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Amess: Is my right hon. Friend aware that Basildon district council managed to set a rate within the limit placed upon it by the House, without cuts in services? Is she further aware that, without that limit, the ratepayers of Basildon would have had to pay double the rate increase?

The Prime Minister: I congratulate Basildon on its action. It is clearly taking the view that we have urged on many councils, that we need to get better value for money out of existing moneys rather than increase them.

Mr. Janner: When the Prime Minister sees President Gorbachev, will she tell him that there are many of us on both sides of the House who have been extremely critical of Soviet policies in the past but who nevertheless remember that it is nearly 40 years since we fought together and won the war against the Nazis? We shall also be commemorating 40 years since the liberation of the concentration camps, and we hope he will, in his regime, usher in a renewed era of goodwill based upon the final act of the Helsinki agreement.

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to the hon. and learned Member for his message. He will be aware that I also hope that the Helsinki final accord will one day be implemented fully. The 10th year since it was signed is as good a time as any other.

Mr. Corbett: On a point of order, arising out of questions, Mr. Speaker. I seek your guidance because I fear that the Prime Minister inadvertently, in her reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks)——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall hear the point of order, but I can already sense that it is an extension of Question Time.

Mr. Corbett: The right hon. Lady may have inadvertently misled the House about an election pledge that she gave on prescription charges in the Health Service in 1979.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is a perfect opportunity to debate this matter later on. This is not a matter for Question Time.

Home Affairs Select Committee (Report)

Mr. Speaker: I have received a complaint from the hon. and learned Member for Fylde (Sir E. Gardner), Chairman of the Home Affairs Select Committee, about a report in The Times on 6 March which purports to give an account of a draft report that has been circulated to members and staff of that Committee, and was strictly limited to them. I am satisfied that the hon. and learned Gentleman's complaint is entitled to precedence and accordingly, if he tables a motion relating to it, it will stand as first business tomorrow.

Social Security (Cold Climate Allowance)

3.33 pm

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide for more equitable heating allowances to reflect increased costs of domestic heating in colder climates; and for purposes connected therewith.

Spring may have arrived in these southern latitudes, but elsewhere memories remain of the bitter winter weather that we recently had, and the weather forecast for tomorrow suggests that snow and sleet are likely to return. Such weather as we have experienced has affected the south only occasionally, but further north and in higher altitudes blizzards and sub-zero temperatures are all too common; and, of course, on an annual average basis, temperatures are lower.

I first introduced the Bill in January 1984, but, more recently, the issue has been fired afresh by the iniquitous workings of the single payments system, which is supposed to cover the increased heating costs of supplementary benefit beneficiaries when exceptionally severe weather strikes. The fact that that system discriminates against those parts of the United Kingdom which are generally colder, and that the extra payments are usually made only to those living south of the Wash, has released a tide of anger and indignation in other areas the like of which I have never before experienced as an hon. Member.

I wish to make it clear, however, that this Bill is not an attempt to change that weird and wonderful system—as it has been described by the Minister. The system is already an embarassment to the Government and is under review. I earnestly hope that a new and fairer way of dealing with severe weather in all parts of the United Kingdom will emerge, and I am sure that that sentiment will be echoed by all the sponsors of the Bill.

Under present social security arrangements, the amount of money paid to recipients of supplementary benefit to cover their heating costs is the same regardless of whether the recipient lies in Cornwall or Caithness or in other words, regardless of the severity of the climate. There is, however, indisputable scientific evidence which proves that the further north and east one lives in the United Kingdom, the colder is the average annual temperature and consequently the higher one's heating bills. Indeed, it has been demonstrated that, taking two identical houses in Aberdeen and Bristol, it takes 30 per cent. more fuel to heat the house in Aberdeen and to maintain it at a given temperature than the Bristol house. Such climatic differences are not taken into account by the present fuel benefits—neither in the notional fuel element contained within supplementary benefit nor in the heating additions available to claimants over and above the normal rate of supplementary benefit, which can be obtained on the grounds of old age, chronic ill health, having children under five years of age or having a home that is hard to heat.

My Bill seeks to make changes affecting the level of payment of both heating additions and the notional fuel element itself. Using data published by the Meteorological Office, I have, on the basis of average annual temperatures, divided the United Kingdom into four zones. For the exact boundaries of the zones it has been convenient to utilise regional or, in the case of England, county boundaries. Roughly speaking, the areas with an annual average temperature of less than 8·5 deg. centigrade comprise zone 1, which is the coldest zone. The warmest zone, zone 4, has an annual average temperature of 10·5 deg. or more.

Zone 1 includes the Scottish islands councils and the Highland, Grampian and Tayside areas. Zone 2 includes the rest of Scotland, Northern Ireland, Cumbria, Northumberland, Tyne and Wear, Durham and north Yorkshire. Zone 3 includes the remainder of northern England, Wales, the Midlands and East Anglia, and zone 4 includes London and the south-east and south-west of England. The zones are described in greater detail in the Bill.

A basic level of payment with regard to both the notional fuel element and the heating additions should be made to claimants living in zone 4. Those living in zone 3 would receive 10 per cent. more than the basic rate; those in zone 2, 20 per cent. more and those in zone 1, 30 per cent. more; Regional variations in the payment of fuel benefits are nothing new. Until November 1970, they were worked out on the price of coal, which varied from place to place. My scheme calls for variations to be made on the basis of a much more constant factor—climate severity.

The Bill has received a tremendous amount of support. In the wake of the previous introduction of the Bill I secured the full backing of 50 regional and district councils in Scotland, the Scottish electricity consultative councils, Age Concern, several social welfare and pensioners' organisations and many people from all parts of the United Kingdom. A recent motion supporting proposals similar to those in the Bill was signed by 65 hon. Members representing all parties and all parts of the country, and there are hon. Members of all parties who are willing to sppnsor this Bill.

It is now widely recognised that there is an urgent need for radical reform of the system of fuel benefits. Only the DHSS attempts to defend the present arrangements. It has argued that family expenditure surveys do not show that more money is spent on fuel in more northerly areas. I and others dispute that, but even if it is true it may show merely that the elderly and poor in those areas simply cannot afford to pay more for the extra heating that they desperately need.

The correspondence that I have received in the past couple of years shows that there are many cases of need. I recently received a letter detailing the case of an old-age pensioner who has suffered two strokes, was forced to stay in the house all day and had just received an electricity bill of £203 for the winter quarter. I have received another letter from a pensioner in the Highlands who had suffered hypothermia previously and was understandably worried about what might happen during the winter. The weather had been so bad that she could not get out of the house and had to spend all of her available money on fuel. Those are just two examples of the terrible way in which many of our old and poor people suffer each winter, especially in areas with the harshest weather.

Statistics on hypothermia have recently been published in parliamentary answers. In Scotland, 174 deaths were ascribed or partly ascribed to hypothermia in 1984. The comparable figure for England and Wales was 568. In other words, 23 per cent. of all registered hypothermia deaths in the United Kingdom last year were in Scotland. I would expect the statistics to show a gradual increase in deaths according to the zones that I have described. However, we all know that the figures represent only the tip of the iceberg. Mr. Albert Long, convener of social services in Strathclyde region, has said that possibly about 3,000 people died from cold-related diseases this winter.

I have tried to keep the criteria in my Bill simple and capable of implementation at little administrative cost. The DHSS might want to adapt my proposals or to make them more sophisticated. As the social security system is under review, my sponsors and I, with, we hope, the support of the House, want to establish the principle that the greatest help should be given to those in greatest need and that, for fuel benefits, one of the main criteria of need must be climatic severity.

As Ministers work on the review, I hope that they will heed the express wish of the House and introduce a system of fuel allowances which fully and fairly reflects climatic differences within the United Kingdom.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Gordon Wilson, Mr. David Alton, Mr. Robert C. Brown, Mr. Dennis Canavan, Mr. Tom Clarke, Mr. Charles Kennedy, Mr. Archy Kirkwood, Mr. David Knox, Mr. Albert McQuarrie, Mr. James Molyneaux, Mr. James Tinn and Mr. Dafydd Wigley.

Social Security (Cold Climate Allowance)

Mr. Gordon Wilson accordingly presented a Bill to provide for more equitable heating allowances to reflect increased costs of domestic heating in colder climates; and for purposes connected therewith: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 26 April and to be printed. [Bill 98.]

Orders of the Day

Interception of Communications Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

3.43 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Leon Britain): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

On 7 February I made a statement on the publication of the White Paper setting out the Government's legislative proposals on the interception of communications in the United Kingdom. This Bill gives effect to those proposals. It is neither the purpose nor the effect of the Bill to broaden the scope of present practices governing the use of interception. Those practices have been authorised by successive Governments of both parties.

This Government neither seek nor want any additional powers whatsoever, but there is one important difference between this Government and their predecessors. It is that we are providing, for the first time, a clear and comprehensive statutory framework for the interception of communications. Even more important, we are creating, for the first time, a new criminal offence of unauthorised interception. Most important of all, we are providing, for the first time, a means of redress, and an effective one, for those wishing to complain that interception has been improperly authorised. Former Labour Ministers may protest raucously about the width of the criteria for interception, but their protests are sheer hypocrisy because their Government operated precisely the same criteria but did not dream of introducing any of the protections contained in the Bill.

Governments of varying political complexions have accepted that in defined and carefully controlled circumstances it is right and necessary to intercept communications. The ability to communicate effectively and quickly is essential to the criminal, the terrorist and the spy. The ability to intercept such communications is a legitimate and essential tool in the hands of those whose job it is to defend our society and protect our liberties. How else, for example, would the police or Customs and Excise be able to piece together information on someone operating a drugs syndicate, who takes care not to travel around to meet his contacts and does not allow them to see him? It cannot be right that such a person should be free to use the telephone in the certain knowledge that in that way he can operate without any fear that his dealings will be found out. Nor can it be right that terrorists or spies who strike at the heart of our democracy should be able to operate in that way.

The issue before the House today, therefore, is not whether the use of interception is necessary and legitimate; it is how the use of interception should be limited, regulated and controlled. As I said on 7 February, interception of communications is always highly distasteful; it is a major intrusion of privacy. Interception has, therefore, always been the subject of very stringent controls. Successive Secretaries of State, both Labour and Conservative, have set themselves the highest standards in operating the present arrangements and have established clear limitations on the circumstances in which the existing powers have been used.

This debate takes place against the background of a number of allegations in the film "MI5's Official Secrets". The allegations fall centrally into four categories—first, that interception has been authorised in circumstances that do not warrant it; secondly, that an unauthorised interception has been carried out; thirdly, that the security service has operated improperly in carrying out investigation and surveillance other than interception in relation to subversive activity; fourthly, that criminal offences may have been committed.

The first allegation covers a period during which both Labour and Conservative Governments were in power. Opposition Members must not be allowed to forget that the bulk of interceptions relate to the period before 1979. Since 1980, there has been an independent monitor of interception arrangements. That safeguard was brought into the system by the present Government. The task of the monitor—currently the distinguished Law Lord, Lord Bridge of Harwich—has been to review on a continuing basis the exercise of the powers of interception covered by the previous White Paper and the associated procedures.

As the House knows, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, with the agreement of former Prime Ministers and other Ministers concerned, asked Lord Bridge to take on the extra and particular task of determining whether the authorisation of interceptions over the whole period covered by the recent allegations named the individuals in question and, if so, whether the authorisations were sought and given in accordance with the procedures and criteria laid down in the Birkett report of 1957 and the Command Paper of April 1980. As hon. Members will know, Lord Bridge has now reported, and in accordance with——

Sir Edward Gardner (Fylde): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware of and has he read the letter in The Times today from the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins)? I do not see him in his place. Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that in this letter the most extraordinary and personal attack has been made by the right hon. Gentleman upon Lord Bridge? Does he not also agree that, in accepting the Government's instructions to make an urgent investigation into interceptions, Lord Bridge has acted with unimpeachable judicial propriety?

Mr. Brittan: I entirely agree with my hon. and learned Friend. The attack made on Lord Bridge by the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) was wholly unwarranted. In his letter the right hon. Gentleman totally ignores the fact that Lord Bridge is the judicial monitor. As such, he has knowledge of and access to all aspects of interception. In relation to interception allegations it is therefore wholly natural and appropriate that Lord Bridge should be asked to conduct an inquiry. The allegations——

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby) rose——

Mr. Brittan: I am answering a question. If the hon. Gentleman will contain himself, I shall give way to him, too.

In relation to interception allegations, it is wholly natural that the judicial monitor should be asked to conduct a special inquiry. The allegations in the film were of a limited number and the inquiry was therefore of a narrow compass. The inquiry into that matter was far closer to a judicial investigation than many of the things that judges are customarily asked to do by Governments of both parties. Therefore, I do not find it in any way surprising that Lord Bridge should have come to an early conclusion, which he reported to the Prime Minister. I regard it as deplorable that somebody with the experience of the right hon. Member for Hillhead should make a wholly unjustified attack upon Lord Bridge.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Does not the Home Secretary recognise that the burden of the attack is upon himself for having appointed as an investigator the very man whose work had to be investigated and that, as it was put in the Daily Telegraph, it was like setting Cerberus to investigate hell?

Mr. Brittan: The hon. Gentleman has completely misrepresented what was said by the right hon. Member for Hillhead. If he cares to look at the letter, he will see that there is an attack on Lord Bridge. If the hon. Gentleman wants to make a different point, he is entitled to make it. I would only say to him that it is equally misconceived because there is absolutely nothing surprising in the fact that Lord Bridge, who has experience of these matters as judicial monitor, should be invited to look back to the period when he was not judicial monitor, to consider the material that was put before successive Secretaries of State in support of applications for interception warrants and to consider whether they were well founded. That is what Lord Bridge did.

Mr. Austin Mitchell rose——

Mr. Brittan: If I may make a little progress, I shall then happily give way to more hon. Gentlemen.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): The Home Secretary has referred constantly to successive Secretaries of State and to previous Governments. May I ask him a factual question about which I have no clue as to the answer. I understood that legislation like this was always agreed on Privy Council terms and that there were discussions between the parties on Privy Council terms. Did that happen in the case of this legislation?

Mr. Brittan: If the hon. Gentleman is referring to matters that are dealt with on Privy Council terms, I believe that he would be best advised to address his question to his own Front Bench.

As hon. Members will know, Lord Bridge has now reported and, in accordance with my right hon. Friend's undertaking, his findings have been made public, in so far as that can be done in a manner consistent with national security. His review covered the period back to 1970. As he says in his report, he had regard to all the relevant criterial and had access to all the documents which he felt could be of any assistance to him. He concluded that he was satisfied, after full examination of all relevant documents, that no warrant for interception had been issued in contravention of the appropriate criteria.

In view of some of the things that have been said since about the narrowness of Lord Bridge's remit, I should make it clear that Lord Bridge's task was not confined to establishing that the necessary formalities had been complied with in respect of any warrant that was issued. He had to consider the merits of any application in order to satisfy himself that it could properly be regarded as coming within the established criteria for permitting interception. In other words, if the basis of an application were subversion, Lord Bridge's task included satisfying himself that interception could be justified on that ground.

Lord Bridge was not concerned with allegations that interception had taken place without the authorisation of the Secretary of State——

Mr. Austin Mitchell rose——

Mr. Brittan: If the hon. Gentleman will allow me, I shall develop that point and then give way.

Lord Bridge was not concerned with allegations that interception had taken place without the authorisation of the Secretary of State, or with allegations in respect of activities of the security service other than interception. Such allegations relate to the operation of the security service as a whole.

The security service's task and procedures are governed by what is known as the Maxwell Fyfe directive, which requires the director general to "take special care to see that the work of the Security Service is strictly limited to what is necessary for the purposes of this task".

It is an important part of the duty of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and myself to satisfy ourselves that the security service operates entirely within the letter and spirit of its directive. That is a responsibility which has always been taken extremely seriously. It is part of the continuing duty of any Home Secretary. But since these allegations came to the fore I have taken steps to examine the allegations that the security service has operated improperly in carrying out investigations and surveillance in relation to subversive activity.

I have concluded, in the light of the allegations and my inquiries into them, that the security service has carried out no operation, investigation, surveillance or action against any individual otherwise than for the purposes laid down in its directive and with the propriety which successive Governments have rightly demanded of it, and which this Government will continue to demand.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: The right hon. and learned Gentleman seems to avoid the point of the earlier question, which is that surely he is responsible for the inadequacies of Lord Bridge's report if he did not specify that there should be an investigation into whether there were unauthorised taps by the security service. Is he now telling us in this further amplification that there were no unauthorised taps in defiance of the Maxwell Fyfe directive?

Mr. Brittan: I was right to be reluctant to give way to the hon. Gentleman because I am coming to that point. He will recall that I specified four criticisms that were made in the film and I am dealing with them in order. If he will allow me, I shall come to that precise point.

The hon. Gentleman will recall that Lord Bridge dealt with the question of authorised interception and whether it should have been authorised. I am now dealing with the question of surveillance, investigation operations, and so on, other than interception. I have expressed my conclusion after specifically looking into the allegations.

In regard to allegations about unauthorised interception——

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) rose——

Mr. Brittan: No, I shall not give way.

There were no allegations of unauthorised interception in the "MI5's Official Secrets" film. None the less, I have inquired into that, too, and I can inform the House that I am satisfied that members of the security service did not carry out any interceptions without the authority of the Secretary of State.

Finally, it is important that I should deal with——

Mr. Winnick rose——

Mr. Brittan: I shall give way in a moment.

It is important that I should deal with all four of the allegations in the film. The Director of Public Prosecutions has asked the Metropolitan police to look into the allegations in the film which suggest that criminal offences may have been committed. When the police have completed their inquiries, they will of course report to the director.

Mr. Winnick: Our difficulty is that the Home Secretary says, in effect, that what has been done has been duly authorised. Perhaps I can refer him to the answer that he gave me yesterday regarding the newspaper report that a former editor of a CND journal had been interviewed by the special branch about the private lives of leading CND officials and the leadership style of the general-secretary of CND. Yesterday the right hon. and learned Gentleman said:

"I am assured by the commissioner that no inquiries have been initiated by the Metropolitan police special branch outside the terms of those guidelines."—[Official Report, 11 March 1985; Vol. 75, c. 28.]

I accept that, but it does not deal with the question. If such investigations and questioning took place, thereby infringing the civil liberties of those undoubtedly engaged in perfectly lawful activities, how does the Home Secretary's reply to me take the matter any further?

Mr. Brittan: The hon. Gentleman will know perfectly well that it is not the practice, and has not been of successive Governments, to comment on specific allegations. If those sitting behind him think that that is a very clever or surprising admission, they should look at what the then Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department said, very carefully, in a debate on 28 July 1977 on these very matters. The position is perfectly clear. In relation to the operations of the security service—other than interceptions, which I have already dealt with—the responsibility is that of the Home Secretary. I have given the House a clear statement of the conclusions that I have reached on that point.

What I cannot and will not do is to comment on individual allegations, any more than the Labour Government did. But let me reiterate what I have said on a number of occasions, because I hope that it will be found helpful. No member of CND, no members of a trade union—nor for that matter any individual—need fear that he is the object of surveillance by the security authorities unless his own actions and intentions bring him within the strict criteria set out in the definition of subversion. That definition was first enunciated by a Labour Government. I remind the House that subversion is defined as

"Activities which threaten the safety or well-being of the state, and which are intended to undermine or overthrow Parliamentary democracy by political, industrial or violent means."

I make it clear today, as I have done in the past, that both elements of the definition must be satisfied before an activity can be regarded as subversive. It is not sufficient for the safety or well-being of the state to be threatened. In addition, there must be an intention to undermine or overthrow parliamentary democracy. That definition governs the work of both the security service and the special branches in relation to subversion.

It is, therefore, crystal clear that peaceful political campaigning to change the mind of the Government or people generally about political issues cannot constitute subversion. But that does not mean that the security authorities should be prevented from investigating someone whose activities threaten the safety or well-being of the state and are intended to undermine or overthrow parliamentary democracy, just because that person happens to be a member of a trade union or of a particular pressure group. It would be wrong to investigate legitimate organisations as such, but it would be absurd to regard membership of such bodies as providing immunity from investigation for those who would otherwise legitimately be subject to such inquiries.

As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has reaffirmed, we do not believe there are any grounds for changing the present system of accountability of the security service to Ministers which has been in existence while successive Governments have been in power. The Bill does not alter that general arrangement. What it does do is to deal with the more limited but vitally important issue of authorised interception of communications in public systems.

I am well aware that some hon. Members would like to go further, and I understand why. They wish to see general privacy legislation. The Younger committee considered that possibility but rejected it. It pointed to the difficulty of formulating a sufficiently precise definition of the concept of privacy to form the basis of a legal remedy. Successive Governments have accepted its conclusion that the introduction of a general right of privacy would be likely to introduce uncertainties into the law which could have substantial adverse implications for the free circulation of information. But that does not mean that we should not take firm and constructive action where that is possible. It has been, and is, possible in a wide variety of ways. Like the Younger committee, we believe that the best approach is to deal with practical problems and find the right practical solution in each area. The Data Protection Act and, in a different way, the Broadcasting Complaints Commission are but a couple of examples of that approach.

It is an approach we are also applying to the question of surveillance. It is quite proper for people to be concerned about the use of surveillance or bugging devices. We have responded to that concern. Last December I published strengthened guidelines to the police on the use of such devices. The new guidelines tighten up substantially the previous criteria for the use of listening devices and of certain cases of visual surveillance: they extend the range of cases in which the chief constable's personal authority is required; and they rule out any attempt to use a listening device as a means of circumventing the controls over authorised interception. All that is new, and an extra protection.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): Does the Home Secretary agree that the Younger committee recommended that there should be a right of civil action on the part of individuals who have suffered unwarranted eavesdropping of whatever sort? Why has not a right to go to court been included in the legislation?

Mr. Brittan: The Law Commission has been considering this issue, and has made some extremely important proposals. In its report on the law on breach of confidence in England and Wales, it suggested a very interesting approach. The hon. and learned Gentleman is right in that a civil remedy was suggested. The commission recommends that people who obtain information by "improper means"—which includes the use of surveillance devices, as the hon. Gentleman knows —would be subject to an obligation not to use or disclose that information. If they did so, they would be civilly liable to an action for breach of confidence. That approach has, I believe, the considerable advantage of concentrating on the real mischief—that is, the use to which information obtained by surveillance is put. It provides the victim with a direct means of redress. I am able to announce today that the Government intend to introduce legislation based on the Law Commission's proposals. This will offer people an important and wholly new safeguard in an area of legitimate concern.

But it is not the function of the present Bill to try to deal with these matters. This Bill deals, as I have said, with authorised interception and the means of controlling and regulating that. It lays down in law for the first time expressly the grounds on which the Secretary of State can authorise interception. All of these grounds are set out in the European Convention on Human Rights—and this is important—as are other grounds such as public safety and the protection of health and morals, which have not been included in the Bill because, although they are referred to in the convention, they cover areas where the Government do not consider interception at all appropriate.

The Bill incorporates into the law all the existing stringent controls and limitations, and it also establishes new statutory safeguards and a new means of redress. In the Government's view, it fully meets our obligations under the European Convention on Human Rights.

Clause 1 is the foundation on which the Bill is constructed. First, it creates for the first time a general offence of unlawful interception. Secondly, it determines the scope of the measure. Those who intentionally interecept communications in the course of their transmission in the post or public telecommunication systems will now be committing a criminal offence.

This provision for an offence of general application is new. There are at present offences in telecommunication and postal legislation applying to the staff of the organisations concerned. In certain circumstances, others might be liable to a penalty for improperly interfering with the mail. But interception as such is not generally an offence. We believe it should be. The clause provides a maximum penalty for the offence of two years imprisonment, or an unlimited fine, or both.

It will be essential that the new law is enforced as rigorously as possible. Advice will accordingly be issued to the police before the legislation comes into effect on how they should proceed if people come forward with information suggesting that such an offence may have been committed. The House will appreciate that such advice is necessary because the provision is wholly new and affords wholly new protection. The significance of the offence will also be drawn to the attention of the Post Office and public telecommunications operators who people might in practice first approach.

The clause also establishes the exceptions to the offence. Obviously, the first is where a warrant has been properly issued by the Secretary of State. The two other exceptions provide for circumstances where interception may at present take place. They are, first, where it is with the person's consent, for example, in a case where obscene telephone calls have been made, and, secondly, where engineers or operators have to undertake what amounts to interception to establish that a line is functioning, for example, if it has been continuously engaged over a long period. The same exceptions are provided for in the existing legislation which applies to post and telecommunications staff.

Clause 1 also defines the scope of the Bill, that is, to communications in the public system. In telecommunications and the post, people have no option but to entrust information to the care of organisations over which they have no control. The sender and receiver are entitled to believe that the privacy of their communications on these systems will be safeguarded while they are out of their hands.

Clauses 2 to 5 deal with the authorisation of interception. Clause 2 empowers the Secretary of State to issue warrants. The warrants must specify the communications to be intercepted, and impose an obligation on the recipient to carry out the interception. The Secretary of State is empowered to issue a warrant if he is satisfied that it is necessary on one of three stated grounds. That is a central point. It is not sufficient that he feels a warrant might be useful in supplementing other material, or that the information it could produce could be interesting. The Secretary of State must give full consideration to whether interception is really justified to the extent that is "necessary". Moreover, as stated in the 1980 White Paper, warrants will be issued only where other methods have failed or, by the nature of things, are likely to fail.

The first ground on which, if it is necessary, a Secretary of State may issue a warrant is that it is in the interests of national security. That term is widely used elsewhere in the statute book, and occurs in some 50 statutes stretching over a long period. It is also precisely the term used in the European convention. It encompasses the protection of the country and its institutions from internal and external threats and the security of the realm, for example, from terrorists, espionage or major subversive activity.

The second ground on which, if it is necessary, the Secretary of State may issue a warrant is the prevention or detection of serious crime. As I told the House on 7 February, the police assess that in England and Wales in the past 10 years interception has made possible the arrest of some 5,000 people, and the recovery of approaching £100 million pounds worth of stolen goods and drugs. Those figures speak for themselves.

Ministers will continue to authorise such interception only on the basis set out in the 1980 White Paper and repeated in the recent White Paper, that is, only if there is good reason to think an interception would be likely to lead to an arrest and a conviction, and if the offence in question is a serious one. By "serious" is meant an offence for which a man with no previous record could reasonably be expected to be sentenced to three years' imprisonment, or an offence of lesser gravity in which either a large number of people are involved, or there is reason to apprehend the use of violence, or in which the financial rewards of success are very large.

Mr. Alex Carlile: I am grateful to the right hon. and learned Gentleman. He has given some limitations which would help to define the meaning of "serious crime". Will he tell the House why the limitations are not contained in the Bill? I would welcome a concession such as that which he made when I intervened a few moments ago.

Mr. Brittan: The reason is perfectly simple. The limitations are difficult to put into statutory form.

Mr. Carlile: "Serious offence" is defined in the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. Is the Home Secretary now saying that a "serious arrestable offence" is not serious?

Mr. Brittan: The hon. and learned Gentleman intervenes from a sedentary position having twice made a standing intervention. It is easier to deal with his standing intervention in an orderly fashion. He seems to imply that because there is a definition of "serious arrestable offence" in the Police and Criminal Evidence Act it would be appropriate to transport it into this Bill. I would not imagine that that course would commend itself because the definition of "serious", which is difficult to put into statutory form, although it has been put into the White Paper, is much narrower than "serious arrestable offence". "Serious arrestable offence" would permit interception in many cases in which it is not permitted under this definition.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): In a written answer in Hansard on 25 February 1982, Lord Whitelaw said that he had placed a copy of the Home Office guidelines to chief constables, which were issued in 1977, in the Library. The Home Secretary authorised chief constables to do surveillance where it was operationally necessary, operationally feasible and justified. There was no mention of a warrant. Will the Home Secretary explain the difference between those guidelines and the continual statements that he has authorised?

Mr. Brittan: The then Home Secretary, now my noble Friend Lord Whitelaw, was talking about surveillance, not the interception of communications. That is a completely different matter.

The third ground on which a warrant may be issued is for the purpose of safeguarding the economic well-being of the United Kingdom if, and only if, the information that it is considered necessary to acquire is about matters outside the United Kingdom, the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man. That restriction does not apply in the parallel criterion in the relevant article in the European convention.

As in the case of serious crime or national security, the Secretary of State has to consider that interception is not just desirable. Secondly, interception has to be protective. It must be concerned with safeguarding the country's economic well-being, not with promoting it. That means it relates to threats to that well-being.

Thirdly, it is the economic well-being of the United Kingdom which is at issue. By definition, the matter must be one of national significance and cannot be of a trivial kind which is peripheral to that well-being. It is a crucial part of our foreign policy to protect the country against adverse developments overseas, which do not necessarily affect our national security so directly as to justify interception on that ground but which may have grave and damaging consequences for our economic well-being, such as a threat to the supply of a commodity on which our economy is particularly dependent.

Fourthly, the purpose of interception must be purely external. A warrant can be issued only in order to obtain information about the acts or intentions of people outside the British Isles. That is fundamental. Purely domestic events cannot give rise to a warrant on the grounds that they might affect the well-being of the economy. I repeat that the provision, like the other two grounds on which interception can be authorised, involves no extension whatsoever to the practices of successive Governments over a long period.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): Am I right in thinking that, as a result of the Bill, the Executive will have no authority to intercept communications, either by tapping or bugging, other than by authority given specifically by an Act of Parliament?

Mr. Brittan: No, Sir. That is true for interceptions, but what is known as bugging is not covered by the Bill and comes under surveillance. As I have explained extremely clearly to the House on many occasions, the guidelines for surveillance, which covers bugging, have been published and strengthened by the Government.

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham) rose——

Mr. Brittan: I shall give way in a moment.

During my speech I have explained why it was not possible to have general legislation relating to privacy. I explained why the compass of this legislation was confined to the specific matter of interception, and why in the case of privacy it was necessary to proceed in many different ways, one of which was by the issue of guidelines to the police and another by accepting the recommendations of the Law Commission, to which the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) referred.

Ms. Harman: Is it not the hallmark of a democracy that, unless one is engaged in criminal activities, one should be free to go about one's business without being interfered with by the state? Is not the Bill nothing more than a licence for Governments to snoop on people, including trade unionists, with whom they do not agree?

Mr. Brittan: No. It has been a long-standing view that, unfortunately, there are threats to our society and security represented by people who have not committed criminal offences. The hon. Lady can look back to the findings of the Birkett report as long ago as October 1957. At paragraph 141—no doubt the hon. Lady is familiar with it—Lord Birkett concluded:

> "We are quite satisfied that the problems of national security are such that no reasonable weapon should be taken from the hands of those whose duty it is to watch over all subversive activities in the safeguarding of British interests. We are further satisfied, from the evidence before us, that the methods of interception hitherto employed are necessary, and have been productive of important results which could not have been obtained in any other way."

Since then the position can hardly be said to have rendered subversion less likely and the methods of dealing with it less necessary. The definition of subversion issued by the Labour Government in 1975, with its careful provision of two limbs, both of which must be met, has ensured that those responsible in the security services or special branch for dealing with such matters have dealt with them in a narrow compass and in a way that could not have been avoided. All Governments who have been in power during the relevant period have believed it necessary for the powers of interception to exist and for the special branch to operate in relation to subversion in the way that it does.

The only difference is that the present Government have tightened the guidelines on surveillance, have published and put on a statutory basis—as we are doing today—what is done with regard to interception, and will provide an effective remedy against any abuse of such powers of a sort which no other Government have dreamt of.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): Has the definition of subversion given by Lord Harris been clarified by the entry of the word "economic" in the phrase "economic well-being", with regard to the issue of warrants, and by the fact that warrants will be issued for economic well-being purposes only in cases outside the United Kingdom?

Mr. Brittan: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, whose interest in these matters is well known. The economic well-being criteria as they relate to events overseas have nothing to do with subversion. Subversion is a branch of the national security head and has a separate definition.

Clause 3 deals with the sort of warrants that can be issued. Warrants issued under clause 3(1) will be those directed at the communications of one person or organisation, or at communications to or from premises when it has been impossible to identify the person using the premises in suspicious circumstances. That arrangement is essentially the same as that described in the 1980 White Paper.

Warrants under clause 3(2) will replace those issued under the Official Secrets Act 1920 for the interception of external telecommunications. Those powers, as the Radcliffe report said in 1967, have been regularly exercised by Labour and Conservative Governments since the Act came into operation. The Government believe, like their predecessors, that they should continue to be available. The new provision will, as now, apply only to international telecommunications. However, its scope will be narrowed to bring it into accordance with existing practices. The warrant will be issued only on the same grounds as a clause 3(1) warrant.

Additionally, when the Secretary of State issues such a warrant, he will be obliged personally to issue a certificate describing the intercepted material which, having regard to the three statutory criteria, he considers it is necessary to examine. He will be required by clause 6 to ensure that there are arrangements preventing the examination of material not covered by the certificate. Finally, the certificate will not be capable of specifying communications to or from an address in the United Kingdom or islands unless the Secretary of State considers that their examination is necessary for the purpose of preventing or detecting acts of terrorism, and then only for a period of three months. All those elements constitute a narrowing of the existing provisions.

Clauses 4 and 5 deal with the issue, duration and modification of warrants. The arrangements rest on the requirement that the issue of a warrant is personal to the Secretary of State. In no circumstances can he delegate the decision. If he did not take the decision, the warrant would not be a warrant and the interception would not be authorised.

Clauses 6 to 8 deal specifically with safeguards and the means of redress. They underpin the definition of the grounds on which interception can be authorised and the warrant powers. Clause 6 deals with the proper handling of communications after they have been intercepted. It obliges the Secretary of State to ensure that there are arrangements to secure two purposes. The first is to limit, in the case of a warrant for the interception of external communications, the examination of intercepted material to that specified in the certificate which he must issue at the time he signs the warrant. The second is to ensure that access to all intercepted material is confined to those who must have it; that only relevant portions are made available and that only the minimum numbers of copies are taken; and that it is kept only for the minimum necessary period.

Those requirements must be judged together. They add up to a comprehensive code for the handling of intercepted communications in all circumstances and by all those concerned. Those arrangements must always be in place, and as he signs warrants the Secretary of State must be satisfied with the existing arrangements or make new ones. It will be a significant part of the task of the commissioner to review the terms and effect of those arrangements.

Clause 7, with schedule 1, is in many ways the most important of the Bill, and its full significance has perhaps until now not been fully appreciated. Therefore, I wish to take this opportunity to underline what clause 7 and the schedule do and what their significance is. They break completely new ground by providing an independent, powerful and effective means of redress if interception has been improperly authorised. A tribunal will be established consisting of five senior lawyers. They will be appointed by the Crown by letters patent for a fixed term. They may be removed from office only on an Address to the Crown from both Houses of Parliament. Those arrangements are, in substance, the same as those which apply to the Ombudsman and they secure the tribunal's complete independence.

Anyone will be able to apply to the tribunal if he believes that his communications have been intercepted. It will be the tribunal's first task to determine whether an authorised interception has been directed against the applicant or the place where he lives or works. The tribunal will not be concerned in cases where there may have been interception without a warrant. Such interceptions would be a criminal offence to be investigated by the police, and prosecuted if there is evidence, in the usual way. The House will recall my explanation of the guidelines that will be given to the police to consider allegations of unauthorised and unwarranted interceptions and their examination.

Mr. John Golding (Newcastle-under-Lyme): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Brittan: I shall complete my explanation of what the tribunal does before I give way.

If an application to the tribunal discloses evidence of an offence—an interception that has not been authorised—the tribunal would, of course, draw that evidence to the attention of the appropriate authorities for investigation as a potential criminal offence. But if the tribunal finds that an interception has been authorised and directed against the applicant, that is far from the end of the matter, because it will then proceed to determine whether the Secretary of State contravened the provisions of the Act, for example, when he decided to issue the warrant, or in renewing or failing to cancel it. For this purpose, the Bill secures that the tribunal will have access to the same information which was available to the Secretary of State. The tribunal will form its own judgment as to whether the Secretary of State has contravened the Act. For example, it may conclude that the Secretary of State could not properly have considered that the warrant was necessary in the interests of national security or on any of the other grounds specified. If it concludes that there has been a contravention, the applicant will be informed.

The tribunal will then be able to do three things. It could quash the warrant; it could order the destruction of all the material intercepted in this connection; and it could order the Secretary of State to pay whatever sum by way of compensation it thought fit. The Bill will impose no limit on this sum. These are very considerable powers. They enable the tribunal to overturn the Secretary of State's decision if it considers there has been a contravention of the Act.

I hope that this explanation makes it clear that the tribunal will carry out an impartial and independent review of ministerial decisions in some of the most sensitive areas one could imagine, in a way that no tribunal or court of law has ever done before.

It would clearly, however, be ridiculous for somebody to be able to discover whether an interception had been directed against him simply by applying to the tribunal. That is why the tribunal cannot operate in public. But it will have full access to all the facts and arguments. In every case of an adverse conclusion, the tribunal will have to make a full report to the Prime Minister and must make a copy of that report available to the commissioner—to whose role I shall come in a moment—who will then be able to play a full part in ensuring that adequate corrective action is taken.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): The Home Secretary has likened these arrangements to those that prevail in the case of the Ombudsman, but he omitted to point out that the Ombudsman reports to a Committee of the House. Therefore there is an ultimate parliamentary review of the way in which he operates. All that the Home Secretary has said about unauthorised interception is so difficult to enforce that he must also take into account that it is upon his and the Prime Minister's supervision of the security services that that enforcement will depend, and those too in turn have no effective reporting mechanism to the House.

Mr. Brittan: The tribunal is analogous to a court in the sense that it is the individual who complains and if his complaint is upheld he will get proper redress in he form of the quashing of the warrant and the giving of compensation. Therefore, the analogy is not a proper one.

As to the analogy with the Ombudsman, I am sorry if I raced past in describing that part of the Bill, but some hon. Members appeared to want to intervene. The analogy concerns the appointment, and that is the significance.

Sir Philip Goodhart (Beckenham): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that telephones are tapped on occasion also by those who are hostile to this country? Does he recognise that some hon. Members are concerned that, as a result of clause 7 and some of the earlier clauses, it will be easier for the IRA and the KGB than for the security services to tap telephones in this country?

Mr. Brittan: I do not think that that is quite the consequence of the Bill, although I understand and respect my hon. Friend's anxiety.

Mr. Golding: Can the Home Secretary tell us whether employees working for public telephone operators will be able to give evidence to the tribunal about unauthorised telephone tapping without risking prosecution under the Official Secrets Act 1911? If employees cannot give such evidence, are we not to depend on official sources only for what are the facts of the situation?

Mr. Brittan: I am perfectly satisfied that the tribunal will have full powers to take whatever evidence is necessary in relation to a particular case. I do not believe that there will be any inhibition of the kind that the hon. Gentleman mentions.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): Can my right hon. and learned Friend say whether the work of the tribunal will be entirely retrospective, or will it be in a position to interview and, indeed, perhaps make life difficult for those who are engaged in security matters at the time that they are doing it? Secondly, since there are to be five senior lawyers, quite properly so, and one continuing High Court judge as a monitor, does he really think that a financial memorandum saying that this can all be had for £100,000 is realistic?

Mr. Brittan: I think that the financial provision is realistic.

In answer to the first question, the tribunal will have to deal with a complaint when it is made. In a large number of cases — and this relates partly to the financial question — that will be a not very formidable task because there will be people who think that their telephone calls are intercepted when they are not, and it will be a simple matter to establish that that is the case. The more difficult task will occur when there has been interception, and the tribunal will have to consider whether, on the material available to the Secretary of State, it was justified. That is a task which it will conduct.

Mr. Maclennan: In describing the powers of the tribunal, the Home Secretary made the surprising assertion that, if it considered that the Secretary of State could not properly have exercised his discretion under clause 2, it could provide a remedy. That seems to be a construction of the Bill which has been put upon it by nobody else. Can the Home Secretary give the House his authority for that claim?

Mr. Brittan: I do not understand why the hon. Gentleman is surprised. If he had listened to the various matters that were covered when I made a statement on the White Paper, he would know that there is no doubt that it will be within the power of the tribunal to decide whether the interception was properly authorised — in other words, whether the material placed before the Secretary of State was such that he could properly have come to the conclusion that it came within the criteria specified as being ones which permitted interception. That is the task of the tribunal about which there is no doubt or mystery.

If the hon. Gentleman finds that the redress is wider than he had assumed, I am glad to clarify the situation. There is no doubt about the position.

The post of commissioner, established by clause 8, complements the tribunal. Whereas the tribunal is charged with reviewing the Secretary of State's decisions when it receives an application, the commissioner conducts a continuing review on his own initiative. His responsibilities cover everything to do with the warrant powers in clauses 2 to 5 and all the arrangements for the handling of intercepted material made under clause 6. He is in this way looking not only at the Secretary of State's individual decisions, but at everything to do with applications that are put before the Secretary of State and with the execution of warrants. In short, the commissioner will oversee the whole field of authorised interception at all levels and in all respects.

The commissioner will be a judge of at least High Court standing, and will be the successor to the existing monitor of interception arrangements established following the 1980 White Paper.

As a consequence of his continuing review, the commissioner will be required to take two courses of action. First, if at any time it appears to the commissioner that there has been a contravention of the warrant powers not already reported on by the tribunal he must report that matter to the Prime Minister. Secondly, he is obliged to submit an annual report to the Prime Minister on the general exercise of his functions. The Prime Minister will be obliged to lay that report before Parliament, subject only to the deletion, after consulting the commissioner, of any passages whose publication would prejudice national security, the prevention or detection of serious crime or the safeguarding of the country's economic well-being.

The various safeguards introduced by the Bill need to be judged——

Mr. James Callaghan (Cardiff, South, and Penarth): I recognise that the commissioner is responsible under the Bill for interception only. With regard to any official of MI5 who felt unhappy or concerned about the work that he or she was being asked to do, which I understand was the case that arose in the recent television documentary, will the Home Secretary consider before the Bill is considered in committee extending the functions of the commissioner so that any officer of MI5 concerned not only about interception but about the nature of the targeting that he or she was asked to do might be able to go to the commissioner rather than to the television studios in order to provide an outlet for somebody who is dissatisfied?

Mr. Brittan: I understand what the right hon. Gentleman is suggesting, but I do not believe that the commissioner is the best route for dealing with the matter. It is the task of the director-general to support and guide the staff of the service in carrying out their functions.

As it happens, I have taken a personal interest in this matter and I have made it clear that I would encourage anyone in the security service who is concerned about any aspect of his work to take up the matter with senior management in the proper way—[Interruption.] I know that the right hon. Gentleman, if not others, is concerned about this issue.

I regard it as an important part of management's function in any organisation to take seriously and to listen carefully and sympathetically to any anxieties. I would not wish there to be an atmosphere in which any individual felt that it was improper, inconvenient or unwelcome for him to raise his concerns.

That is something which the organisation itself must ensure and which I, as Home Secretary, must be satisfied the organisation is ensuring. I assure the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) that it is an aspect of the task to which I attach considerable importance.

The various safeguards introduced by the Bill need to be judged together. The bedrock of the scheme is the offence of unlawful interception; any interception not expressly provided for, whoever, carries it out, is a criminal offence. There are no exceptions to that. Only a Secretary of State may authorise interception and he may act only on the criteria laid down in the Bill. His decisions may be overturned by the tribunal if it finds that he has acted outside his powers. He is not, therefore, the final arbiter either as a matter of law or in practice. He is required to take steps to ensure the proper handling of material gained from interception. The exercise of all his powers, and all the associated arrangements, are subject to scrutiny by the commissioner, who will report on them. The scheme is, therefore, one of a series of complementary checks. Taken as a whole, as they must be, the provisions add up to a comprehensive series of safeguards.

The Bill raises issues of great importance to the preservation of law and order and of our national security. The Government have been far more open in their approach to these matters than any of their predecessors. The Bill is, I believe, a considerable further step forward. It will reinforce public confidence in the handling of this most sensitive area, providing for the first time a means of redress for the individual. But we must also ensure that nothing we do prevents us from safeguarding our national interests. That is something the public also expects of us, and is fully entitled to. The Bill maintains the right balance, and I commend it to the House.

4.42 pm

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): I beg to move, to leave out from "That" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

"That this House declines to give a Second Reading to a Bill which gives statutory authority to interception of communications on criteria at once so vague and so sweeping as to permit interception on an unacceptably wide basis, and which provides insufficient safeguards for those adversely affected by unlawful interception."

The advance publicity orchestrated by the Home Secretary for his speech in the Daily Telegraph yesterday said:

"Mr. Brittan, Home Secretary, is preparing a trenchant counter-attack against the Government's critics of telephone tapping for tomorrow's Commons debate on the issue."

I hope that, if that speech was trenchant, the Home Secretary will never set out to be soporific.

We debate the Bill at a time when there is profound concern about the erosion of civil liberties in Britain and about serious allegations made in connection with the security services. That concern will have been deepened as a result of the 59-minute smug, complacent and insensitive speech that we have just heard from the Home Secretary.

Mr. Brittan: I wonder whether the right hon. Gentleman wrote that beforehand.

Mr. Kaufman: Yes, I wrote it beforehand — [Interruption.]—in anticipation, knowing the right hon. and learned Gentleman well. He may bore, but he never disappoints.

In recent weeks, particular disquiet has been expressed following the allegations made in the television programme "MI5's Official Secrets", the programme which was cravenly banned by the Independent Broadcasting Authority and which then became widely available and discussed, even though it was banned.

In Soviet Russia, material that is prevented from being officially published but is then illicitly circulated is known as samizdat. It is a sign of the similarity of attitude of this Government and of the Soviet authorities towards disfavoured dissent that, when it was required, a samizadat system instantly sprang up in Britain, its somewhat incongruous parents being The Guardian and Virgin Records.

That programme was finally shown last Friday and, as we know, a film transmitted on Channel 4 normally has an audience that does not compare all that favourably in size with that of a closed circuit television programme. However, the IBA's craven and contemptible ban ensured that the programme "MI5's Official Secrets" was watched by several million people.

The IBA suppressed that programme for fear of being prosecuted under the section 2 of the Official Secrets Act. It must be said that some puzzlement has been aroused by the manner in which the Attorney-General has been operating the Official Secrets Act in the past few months. At best, his conduct has been capricious. At worst—and much more likely—it seems that it has been motivated by concern for the interests of the Conservative party rather than the pursuit of justice.

When Sarah Tisdall leaked information which had not the tiniest impact on national security but simply revealed a characteristically squalid example of news management by the Secretary of State for Defence, she was tried at the Old Bailey and sent to goal. When Clive Ponting leaked information which the prosecution admitted did not breach national security, he too, found himself in the Central Criminal court.

Yet what happens to Cathy Massiter, an employee of MI5 for 14 years, when she comes forward with what she claims are details of MI5 operations entailing serious allegations of malpractice by the special branch, by MI5 and by the Secretary of State for Defence? What happens? Absolutely nothing.

Indeed, it was indicated that the matters involved in Cathy Massiter's allegations were far too secret to be aired in court. Thus, the lesson for public servants who are thinking of leaking is clear: if one wants to reveal something, make sure it is nothing trivial. The more secret one's information, the greater one's chance of staying out of the dock.

One may, however, be sent to see a psychiatrist, as Cathy Massiter was. It seems that the parallels between this country and Soviet Russia are growing, if official reaction to dissidents here is to treat them as candidates for mental hospitals.

Why did the allegations made in the "20:20 Vision" programme arouse such widespread alarm? It was partly because the allegations implied that Ministers might not have been carrying out their duties according to the rules officially laid down. Even more, it was because a fear had arisen that the security services might have been taking, on their own initiative, actions which had the most alarming implications for civil liberties and the right to engage in free, non-violent, democratic dissent in Great Britain.

The allegations against Ministers are twofold. It is alleged—and so far it has not been denied—that in August 1983 the Home Secretary signed a warrant authorising the tapping of the telephone of Mr. John Cox, a vice-president of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament, on the grounds that he was a Communist and therefore a subversive, yet that label of subversive violated the definition laid down by Lord Harris, repeated by the Home Secretary this afternoon and explicitly accepted by the Prime Minister.

Miss Massiter claims that Mr. Cox did not meet the test of being a major subversive, terrorist or espionage threat, which alone under the rules would have qualified him for surveillance. He was, she says, simply the best person that MI5 could think of if it was to have an excuse for tapping the telephone of a leading member of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament.

Again, she alleges that secret information obtained by covert and clandestine means for MI5 was passed to the DS19 unit at the Ministry of Defence. She claims that a briefing paper on CND was specifically prepared for MI5 by the Secretary of State for Defence. She claims, further, that this material was then used by the Secretary of State for party political purposes.

If this allegation is true, both MI5 and the Secretary of State are in violation of the Maxwell Fyfe directive of 1952, which has been cited by the Home Secretary this afternoon, because that directive lays down:

> "It is essential that the security service should be kept absolutely free from any political bias or influence."

Those allegations are disturbing enough, but Miss Massiter has made further charges against the security services. She says that they infiltrated the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament even though that organisation cannot, within the Home Secretary's own rules, be described as subversive. Indeed, the Home Secretary has repeatedly given the CND a clean bill of health. He told me in the House on 10 December:

> "So far as the legitimacy or otherwise of CND is concerned, I do not think it is for me to legitimise it or otherwise. There is no doubt that peaceful political campaigning to change the mind of the Government and of people generally about the validity of nuclear disarmament, whether unilateral or otherwise, is an entirely legitimate activity which does not fall within the very strict criteria of the 1980 White Paper." [Official Report, 10 December 1984; Vol. 69, c. 737.]

That is what the Home Secretary said and he has repeated the essence of that statement on several occasions since. Yet, according to Miss Massiter, MI5 deliberately and wrongfully classified Joan Ruddock, the Chairman of CND, as a subversive so that they could open a file on her, including Special Branch references to her movements.

Since the controversy about the Channel 4 programme began, there have been further serious allegations about unauthorised activities by MI5, including telephone tapping and surveillance by other means of organisations which do not meet any of the required criteria. Misgivings have become widespread. This is a comment—very anguished, and properly so—in a leading article in the Sunday Telegraph last week:

"The chief danger of police-state methods creeping into democracies is not that they are authorised from above but that they generate themselves from within."

Concern expressed in this way over a wide spectrum of opinion in this country was at first brushed aside by the Government. At length, however, 12 days ago, the Prime Minister announced that she had asked Lord Bridge of Harwich to conduct an inquiry into the allegations. As we know, Lord Bridge reported within five days. Some people asked how he was able to complete his investigation in so short a period. For me the puzzle was how he managed to spin out the time, for he investigated hardly anything.

When the Home Secretary made his announcement of the inquiry, in that curious way that he has, I asked him a series of questions about the terms of reference of this inquiry. I asked him if Lord Bridge would deal with allegations of persons being falsely classified as subversive. The Home Secretary said that Lord Bridge would. But there is nothing in Lord Bridge's report to indicate that he did.

I asked if Lord Bridge would deal with allegations that material obtained by MI5 had, against the principles of the Maxwell Fyfe directive, been used for party political purposes. Again the Home Secretary said yes. Again there is no evidence from Lord Bridge's report that he did anything of the kind.

There were two areas of concern which the Home Secretary made it clear would not be within Lord Bridge's terms of reference. One was infiltration other than interception. The other was unauthorised interception—that is, interception not authorised by Ministers but undertaken independently and illegally within the secret services. Lord Bridge duly, as required, ignored these matters. I do not criticise him at all. He looked into only what he was told to look into. So, inevitably, he provided the report that he was required to provide. But that was really not a report. It was a theorem; all that was missing at the end of it was the letters "QED".

No wonder that this disreputable exercise has allayed no fears but instead aroused derision. Indeed, there are those who say that the Prime Minister only did it in a desperate attempt to prove that she has a sense of humour.

Mr. Hanley: Disgraceful.

Mr. Kaufman: The hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley), the son of a well-known comedian, is right to complain that anybody should allege that the Prime Minister has a sense of humour.

The question arises, have elements within our security services got out of control? Are they acting irresponsibly on their own initiative? Are they taking an improper interest in political and industrial matters far beyond their proper purview?

Mr. Winnick: Accepting that, indeed, it is quite likely that MI5 is out of control — as a former Home Secretary, the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins), has more or less said in a letter in The Times today — is it not a fact that the guidelines first mentioned by Lord Harris in February 1975 are so wide that it is quite justified for the special branch to do the kind of investigation that I mentioned earlier during the Home Secretary's speech — namely, to ask a former CND official all kinds of questions which had no bearing whatsoever on national security?

Mr. Kaufman: It is arguable that, as my hon. Friend suggests, the guidelines are too wide, but, however wide they may be, the signs are that if these allegations are accurate, those guidelines are being exceeded. That is the problem; we do not know, and it is worrying enough that such questions even have to be asked.

It is also grubbily characteristic of this Government that their response is not to seek to allay fears by seeking the truth, however much of the truth it may be possible to make public in these shadowy areas. Their response, as ever, is "How can we cover it up?" If the Home Secretary really believes that we are satisfied with what he has told us today, with him looking into matters on his own account during a period of a very few days, he is even more complacent than we thought he was.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths: It is of course relatively easy for the right hon. Gentleman, like the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins), to make allegations about members of the security forces being out of hand and conducting themselves in a way that is illegal as well as beyond the guidelines. But what evidence does the right hon. Gentleman have and, if he or the right hon. Member for Hillhead have any, why has it not been brought forward and given to the Home Secretary?

Mr. Kaufman: I am not making allegations, and I do not speak for the right hon. Member for Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins). I am saying that allegations have been made and that those allegations have aroused widespread misgivings across a wide spectrum of public opinion, including the Conservative press. If the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) does not care about it, he does not care about civil liberties.

The matters that we are discussing this afternoon are very important in a free society. They will not go away. Her Majesty's Opposition insist that what is needed is not a rich charade like the Bridge inquiry, or the kind of exercise that the Home Secretary has gone through and on which we have to take his word, or an internal police examination of the kind he says, but a full and independent inquiry. Only in that way can serious allegations be answered, and proved or disproved.

It is against that background that we must examine the Bill, the Second Reading of which the Home Secretary moved today. We must admire the effrontery with which he did it. He boasted that it is the first statutory limitation on interception. That is true. But the Government never wanted to do it. They have been dragged kicking and screaming all the way. They would have continued to resist if it had not been for the Malone case. It was Mr. James Malone who, when tried for dishonestly handling stolen goods, discovered that his telephone had been tapped by the police. It was he who brought a High Court action against the Metropolitan police. It was he who, even though he lost the case, heard the judge, Sir Robert Megarry, state in court that telephone tapping is a subject that cries out for legislation, who took his case to the European court and who then, almost a year ago, saw the House of Lords pass, against the Government's wishes, a Labour amendment to the Telecommunications Bill placing controls on interception. That is why the Government are legislating. It is not because they want to; it is because they have to.

The Bill that the Government have brought forward is only a little better than no Bill. Indeed, in some ways it actually makes matters worse than the current practice with regard to warrants for telephone tapping. What is more, it deals only with telephone tapping and interception of letters sent by post. Incidentally, talking of interception of letters sent by post, it is appropriate that today the Post Office has brought out a new series of pictorial stamps, all of which show pictures of bugs.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kaufman: Not at this point. I will later, if I have the opportunity. The Home Secretary spoke for an hour, and I want to leave time for other right hon. and hon. Members to make their speeches.

Yet we all know that telephone tapping is now technologically an almost primitive form of interception. Other methods are freely available. Pick up any edition of Exchange and Mart, and one will find dozens of advertisements. Here is just one out of many:

"Security and surveillance equipment. We have just moved to new premises and are currently the largest manufacturer in the United Kingdom of hi-tech microchip systems. Among our vast range are micro transmitters, pens, adaptors, calculators, lighters, body-worn desk equipment, etc., all types of microphones, probes, dishes, rifle, wall and window, etc. VOS units, receivers, recorders telephone monitoring equipment, infinities, etc. . . . Send sae . . . for 32-page catalogue . . . Access, Barclay and American Express cards welcome."

That advertisement appears in the section of Exchange and Mart disturbingly headed "Leisure".

The Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure specifically required that in the legislation that it recommended should be introduced:

"The specific practices subject to regulation should be set out in secondary legislation to enable new techniques to be incorporated as they are developed."

That recommendation of the Royal Commission has been ignored. It said that warrants should be specific, yet the Bill allows interception without any warrant when a person occupying the premises consents. So a live-in landlord can authorise the tapping of his tenants' telephones.

Mr. Mikardo: Or a hotel manager.

Mr. Kaufman: My hon. Friend, who lives a more gregarious and lively life than I, makes that point, too. In my constituency, I simply deal in squalid multi-occupation.

The Bill allows single warrants covering a number of addresses or whole organisations. So the number of warrants issued need represent only a fraction of the number of people to be covered by such warrants. In certain circumstances, tapping of communications into or out of the country will not carry even such safeguards as attach in the Bill to warrants for internal interception.

Furthermore, the definitions of the criteria for issuing a warrant are vague to the point of giving the Home Secretary and his colleagues a completely free hand. The Home Secretary referred to the criteria in clause 2—

"national security . . . preventing or detecting serious crime; or . . . safeguarding the economic well-being of the United Kingdom"— and compared them with the authority given by the European Convention on Human Rights for interception in the interests of national security, prevention of disorder or crime and safeguarding the economic well-being of the country. But the admirable but abstract sentiments of a general declaration are not enough to provide the tight definitions that are required by an Act of Parliament by which specific actions will be authorised. What is extraordinary is that the Government have, in drafting the Bill, brushed aside their own White Paper "Interception of Communications", which they issued in 1980 and from which the Home Secretary quoted freely this afternoon, therefore implying that he still believes it. That White Paper did not vaguely cite "national security", in the words of the Bill, but said:

"there must be a major subversive, terrorist or espionage activity that is likely to injure the national interest".

There is no wording like that in the Bill. The 1980 White Paper did not vaguely cite "serious crime" as the Bill does, but said:

"there must be good reason to think that an interception would be likely to lead to an arrest and a conviction."

There is nothing like that in the Bill. The Government's own White Paper said that if a warrant was to be issued for interception on behalf of the security service, it must be a principle of authorisation that—I quote once again from the Government's White Paper cited by the Home Secretary—

"the material likely to be obtained by interception must be of direct use in compiling the information that is necessary to the Security Service in carrying out the tasks laid upon it by the Directive".

That is, the Maxwell Fyfe directive.

Again, there is nothing like that in the Bill. In laying down conditions for the issue of warrants to assist in detecting crime or on behalf of the security service, the Tory White Paper of 1980 insisted:

"normal methods of investigation must have been tried and failed, or must, from the nature of things, be unlikely to succeed if tried."

There is nothing like that in the Bill.

Therefore, we shall move amendments to put all Lord Whitelaw's principles into this Home Secretary's Bill, because, taking into account the free-for-all permitted by the vague inclusion of "economic well-being", clause 2 will, as it stands, and if it passes into law in that form, be hailed as a tappers' charter. The duration of warrants is unacceptably expanded. This is what the 1980 White Paper said about it:

"Every warrant is time-limited: it includes a date on which it expires if not renewed. All warrants are first issued with a time limit set at a defined date not exceeding two months from the date of issue, and are subject to review before expiry. Warrants may be renewed only with the personal authority of the Secretary of State. Warrants issued on the application of the police may be renewed for not more than one month at a time; warrants issued on the application of the Customs and Excise may be renewed for not more than two months at a time; and warrants issued on the application of the Security Service, and postal warrants on behalf of the Metropolitan Police Special Branch, may be renewed for not more than six months at a time".

That was current practice according to the Government in April 1980, yet clause 4 of the Bill permits all warrants —all the categories that I have just quoted from the Government's White Paper—to be issued for a full six months and to be renewed for a similar period. In the light of that fact, how could the Home Secretary claim in his speech that it is neither the purpose nor within the scope of the Bill to widen current practice, when that provision does widen current practice? We shall table amendments to put that right as well.

Perhaps the most grotesque provision is contained in clause 9. It changes the law so that in future there may be no reference in court proceedings to the use of interception. Of course, the Malone case and what followed from it stemmed from the admission of tapping made by the police in court during that trial. In turn, the Bill stems from the Malone case. So we have the extraordinary fact that if at the time of the Malone case the proposed legislation had been in operation, the Bill would never have been brought forward. Just think about that, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The safeguards in the Bill, about which the Home Secretary has boasted, are almost meaningless. The Birkett report of 1957 recommended:

"There should be a regular review of outstanding warrants not less than once a month both by the Home Office and by every authority that is granted a warrant to intercept."

No such review is required by the Bill. We shall seek to insert it.

The European convention, which the Home Secretary has quoted in aid this afternoon, lays down:

"Everyone whose rights and freedoms, as set forth in this convention, are violated shall have an effective remedy before a national authority."

Yet the tribunal created by the Bill will not be effective. It is to be composed entirely of lawyers. The Home Secretary boasted about that. There is no reason why it should be composed entirely of lawyers. It would be useful, for example, to have a communications engineer as a member, since he would know more about the subject than the barristers, advocates and solicitors who are to be recruited.

Incidentally, the Home Secretary gave no clear reply to the question by my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding) about whether telecommunications employees would be able to give evidence to the tribunal without risk of breaching the Official Secrets Act 1911. The Home Secretary responded with a vague generality. I hope that before the end of the debate we shall have a specific reply to that question.

Mr. Mikardo: Or something in the Bill.

Mr. Kaufman: Something in the Bill would be better but we should like an anticipation of what is to be put in the Bill.

In any case, the tribunal will be able to operate only if a warrant has been issued against a person who complains. Therefore, it will not be able to investigate the possibility of unathorised interception. If a warrant has been issued, all the tribunal can do is to check that the statutory procedures have been observed. It cannot consider the merits of the decision.

Mr. Brittan: That is not correct. I made it clear that it has to consider, among other things, whether or not the criteria set out in clause 2 have been met. That is clear. In response to interventions by the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) I clarified that point beyond peradventure, as I have done in the past. The right hon. Gentleman persistently and wilfully refuses to see what is plainly there.

Mr. Kaufman: I am grateful to the Home Secretary for that absolute, clear, unquestionable, categoric assurance. I hope that he will continue giving that kind of assurance in answer to questions such as the one I have just put again on behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme.

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon): Let us have it now.

Mr. Kaufman: Indeed, yes, as my right hon. and learned Friend says, the Home Secretary leapt to his feet when he was able to correct me on another point. Let him leap to his feet again and give us the other assurance which we require. No? That is a pity. Therefore, in a way we have our reply.

Overall, even though we have got a further assurance, which I welcome, it has to be said that compared with the likely results of the activities of the tribunal, the Bridge report looks like a mighty blow for civil liberty.

The new office of commissioner has greater and potentially more beneficial powers. I very much hope that the important suggestion made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) will be considered by the House. It is important that members of the security service should have access to an independent person if they have misgivings about what they are being asked to do.

The drawback about the office of commissioner is that he will be appointed by the Prime Minister and will report to the Prime Minister. There will be no accountability to Parliament. We strongly take the view that the House must seize the opportunity of the Bill to start the process of making the security services responsible to Parliament. We believe that the commissioner should be appointed not by the Prime Minister but by the House, and that he should report not to the Prime Minister but to a Select Committee of the House. He should be a servant of Parliament, not a functionary of the Government. We shall be moving amendments to bring that about.

When it commented on the White Paper from which the Bill originated, the Financial Times said in a leading article:

"at every sensitive point of balance between the rights of the individual and the interests of the state, it fails the individual . . . the best advice seems to be to say and write as little as possible."

That is a devastating comment to be made by a responsible newspaper on the state of freedom in this country under this Government, but it is an accurate statement.

The turmoil taking place in the security services and the allegations about transgressions of the rules by the security services are harmful to the very national security that those services are supposed to safeguard. If MI5 wastes so much of its time spying on people like Joan Ruddock, no wonder it was unable for so long to spot a Bettaney in its own ranks. If MI5 is accumulating mountains of paper about hundreds of thousands of often innocuous persons, that is enormous time and effort taken away from dealing with the real enemies of the country.

The problem is that all security services operate in a climate created by the Government of the day. If a judge can say that the political interests of that Government are synonymous with the national interest, it is understandable that MI5, or at any rate some people in it, make the same mistake, regardless of the directives that govern them. If we have a Prime Minister who says that local councils which wish to pursue their own policies rather than those of the Government must be put down, as she did three days ago, people in MI5 can be understood, if not forgiven, for taking that ugly intolerance as the new conformity. If we have a Prime Minister who says of the miners' strike, as she did three days ago, "I am fed up with people saying, 'Don't gloat'," people in MI5 can be understood, if not forgiven, for regarding trade unionists as persons who can justifiably be spied upon.

The Prime Minister has become like the Queen of Hearts in "Alice in Wonderland". She goes about all over the place saying, "Off with their heads!." Indeed, it is difficult to be sure whether it was the Lewis Carroll character or the right hon. Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher) who made that memorable pronouncement, "Sentence first, verdict afterwards." During the past six years we have had too much of, "Sentence first, verdict afterwards." We need proper, fair, democratic procedures, and never more so than in these matters which the Diplock report four years ago rightly said have always been looked upon with suspicion and distaste. It is because the Bill fails to meet that test that we ask the House to vote for the amendment.

Sir Edward Gardner (Fylde): My concern about the Bill is a concern, shared, I like to think, by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House, that there should be a proper and acceptable balance between the right to personal liberty and the need for an effective and efficient security service as an essential part of the defence system of the country.

I was at least made happy by one sentence used by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) when he was attacking the Bill. He acknowledged that this country has real enemies. Those real enemies are within our midst and have to be dealt with. One way of dealing with them is by the proper and efficient use of the security service.

My concern is also that the powers that are given to the security service should be, as indeed they are, express and limited powers, and should in no case be extended into general powers. I am also concerned, as I am sure that the House is, that nothing should be done to disturb or to diminish our right to personal liberty without the clear, imperative and overriding need to deal with subversive activities and the activities of espionage and terrorism.

It is unrealistic to suppose that our personal liberties can be protected and sustained without giving up something at times. Every time we go to an airport and have our clothing searched, or every time we go to a public building and are stopped and asked to open the packets that we are carrying, that is offensive to public liberty. However, it is something that we accept because if we do not accept it we should be giving terrorists, subversives and spies an open invitation to get on with what they are doing and to do their worst. These things have to be accepted by society, and we know that.

I am particularly concerned, as I hope the House is, that we should have an efficient security service using the same weapons that are used against us by our secret enemies — the weapons of secrecy, stealth and surprise. One thing that the House and everyone who values personal freedom has to be careful about is to see that we do nothing to undermine the efficiency of the secret service, because if the secret service is no longer to be secret, what is it? I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw) who said the other day in the House that he wanted his money back. We must have secrecy, and that secrecy must be protected.

Mr. Winnick: That intervention by the hon. Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw) concerned us because it was made without qualification and quite obviously meant CND and trade union people. The hon. Member said, to roars of Tory laughter, that if such people are not being checked he wanted a refund. Does this not illustrate the lack of concern on Tory Benches over civil liberties? People such as Joan Ruddock, Mrs. Haigh and Bruce Kent are being investigated because of their political views, but they are not a threat to national security. That is the core of the issue that concerns Labour Members.

Sir Edward Gardner: This is to turn reality on to its head. We do not say that, because somebody happens to be a member of a trade union or of the CND, or is a dentist or a member of the Bar or any other particular calling or profession, it therefore follows that they are subversive and enemies of the country. However, it does follow, as everybody who looks at this problem with any sense of reality must accept that it follows, that such organisation as trade unions, the CND and, for all I know, professional bodies throughout the country, offer cover to our secret enemies. Therefore, if one is seeking to identify those enemies, one has to see who is in these organisations.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that hostile intelligence agencies would be failing in their duty to their masters if they did not seek to penetrate such organisations? They do not always succeed, but it must be right for our intelligence agencies to keep an eye on those hostile agencies that seek to infiltrate such organisations.

Sir Edward Gardner: I hope that in what I have said I have already made my meaning clear. That is, that if one is looking for secret and hostile elements, one has to bear in mind that they can operate only under a cloak of secrecy and they may do that as a professor in a university, or as a member of the dental profession, a trade union or the CND.

Mr. Mikardo: Or MI5.

Sir Edward Gardner: The hon. Gentleman is right. That is an important point, to which I shall come.

The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) is standing reality on its head because the secret service has to identify people who shelter under anonymity and discover who the hostile elements in the country are who shield themselves by secrecy. This can only be done—there is no other way of doing it—by a security service that can rely on secrecy, stealth and surprise.

The House will remember that Lord Birkett in 1957, when he was making his report on the security service, saw as a highly effective method of identifying secret enemies the interception of communications. Lord Birkett said that this is the only effective method of counter-espionage and of safeguarding the vital secrets of the state. No doubt, if he had been reporting today, Lord Birkett would have added to that, as he would have had to, protection against terrorists.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that there is a danger in saying that the powers should be directed at those who are hostile? Hostility to the state is not what is objectionable, because in a sense that is a matter of opinion. It is the willingness to use either violent or subversive methods to promote that hostility that is objectionable.

Sir Edward Gardner: I agree with my hon. Friend. I was using a blanket word, and I should put it more carefully. I should use with greater confidence the definition of subversive that Lord Harris gave in the other place when he was Minister in the Labour Government in 1975. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary quoted that well-known definition. It is that subversive activities are those that affect the safety and well-being of the state and that are intended to overthrow and undermine parliamentary democracy by political, industrial or violent means.

The Select Committee on Home Affairs has had its attention directed to Lord Harris' definition. The Committee has taken a considerable amount of evidence from a number of witnesses, including my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary. No doubt it is a matter of debate whether that definition is one that ultimately will be accepted. I say personally, divorced altogether from what the Select Committee says, that when I started to look at that definition, I had some doubts about it. I was especially uncertain about the wisdom of including a reference to the well-being of the state. However, having spent a considerable amount of time—as did all the other members of the Select Committee—in considering the definition, I am coming to the conclusion that it is, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary said when he gave evidence to the Committee, a definition that it would be hard to improve upon.

While taking evidence, we asked a number of witnesses in public session — so I can repeat what was said without any breach of privilege—about that question. Speaking personally, I felt that they had some difficulty in improving upon the Harris definition.

Mr. Hanley: In the context of the Bill, does my hon. and learned Friend not agree that qualifying the phrase "well-being of the United Kingdom" by the word "economic" makes the Bill clearer than the definition of subversion?

Sir Edward Gardner: That may well be so. It is because I feel offended by any possibility of the misuse or abuse of the powers—the limited powers—given to the security service that I especially welcome clause 7, which establishes a tribunal to determine whether the Secretary of State responsible has exercised his powers correctly in granting a warrant. I am pleased to note that anyone who feels aggrieved and thinks that he has been injured by incorrect exercise of the powers used by the Secretary of State to issue a warrant can now look forward, by means of appearing before the tribunal, to being compensated for any injury.

I am also very content that the Government in clause 1 have created a criminal offence of the unlawful interception of communications which, if proved, will attract a prison sentence of up to two years or a fine.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I wonder whether my hon. and learned Friend can help the House on one point? The tribunal has an important role to play in testing the appropriateness of the warrant, but how does someone go to the tribunal and establish that the Secretary of State was wrong to issue a warrant on the grounds that he thought it necessary to do so "in the interests of national security"?

Is that not a concept so broad as to be incapable of challenge?

Sir Edward Gardner: I do not think that such a case would be incapable of proof, although it might well be difficult to prove. It would depend entirely on the circumstances that gave rise to the allegation and how each and every one of those circumstances could be established before the tribunal.

Although I welcome clauses 7 and 1, I am not satisfied that the Bill goes far enough. If a member of the security service had a suspicion, or had cause to believe, that powers were being misused or abused, there is no procedure in the Bill that would help him to make his complaint known to any particular person upon whom he could rely for remedy. I put to my right hon. and learned Friend the argument that no matter how excellent the quality of a public service may be, there must always be a risk that there will be in that service someone who will misbehave himself. It that happens now, I cannot see how that misconduct will be exposed to inquiry or how someone who suspects or believes that that misconduct is taking place can appear before someone who could determine whether the suspicion was justified. I cannot, in reality, believe that a member of the security services is likely to go to his superiors and say that he believes that certain misconduct is taking place. To do so might well put at risk his future hopes of promotion or even his job.

I therefore ask my right hon. and learned Friend to consider seriously the possibility of appointing an independent and objective member of the security services to whom those with such a complaint could turn, and who could, within the secrecy and security of the service, investigate the complaints. When he had made his investigations, the complaints could be dealt with within the service and without any breach of security.

Our most valuable and precious possession is personal liberty. I would not in any way advocate that anything should be done by the House in the Bill or in any other Bill that might in any way taint what Edward Gibbon called "the image of liberty in which we delight".

I believe that the Bill is a measure that we can rely upon to sustain our liberty, to benefit our liberty and to improve our hopes of keeping that liberty in the future.

5.37 pm

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): All Home Secretaries have to maintain a balance between the need to maintain the security of the state and the need to maintain and preserve civil liberties. That is sometimes a very difficult task, and judgments have to be made. Whatever the rules may state, and whatever may be laid down in White Papers, there comes a time when one has to think hard before one allows, or does not allow, something to happen.

I declare an interest in that as Home Secretary and as Secretary of State for Northern Ireland I authorised telephone tapping over a period of five years. I declare a further interest. Since March 1974, to varying degrees, I and my family have been protected by the special branch against terrorist attack. I do not have to read about the activities of the special branch, because I meet members of the special branch frequently. I am not naive enough to believe that they never do anything wrong, but I am closely in touch with them.

I have also received valuable advice from a small number of people in MI5 who gave me information about the work of terrorists, particularly in one part of the world and eventually in many parts of the world. The advice and information that they gave me has served the nation well, despite the fact that, on many occasions, we did not prevent terrorist activities. Had we done so, people would not have been killed in shopping precincts and elsewhere in this country. That small group of officers are friends of mine. I have learned to respect them. They are certainly not stupid reactionaries.

Home Secretaries have a difficult time answering direct questions about telephone tapping. It is easy to say no, but if one says no, when the time comes, why should one not say yes? I should like to comment on some of the allegations that have been made. On the last day of the Labour Government in 1979, after my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) had conceded defeat, I went back to the Home Office and signed some interception warrants. That was necessary, because there was at that time no successor. They had to be done that evening. I think that I signed four and wrote on them that they had to be looked at by the new Home Secretary when he was appointed. The job of Home Secretary is not like any other in government. He is alone. He sometimes gets in touch with the Prime Minister, but it is not a Cabinet or Cabinet Sub-Committee decision.

When Lord Bridge ruled that no warrant for interception had been issued in contravention of the rules, I was not the slightest bit surprised, as I do not believe that that has been done by any Home Secretary. In any event, the checks and balances make it impossible. However, subjective considerations come into play when decisions are made.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The right hon. Gentleman has great experience, and he might be able to help the House in an unusual way. According to clause 2, a warrant can be issued if the Home Secretary thinks that it is necessary for national security or economic well-being. Does the right hon. Gentleman think that it is possible to formulate the criteria more narrowly and precisely or should they be left broadly drawn?

Mr. Rees: I had intended to make some suggestions about that later. I think that they are drawn too broadly. To put it another way, they are drawn more broadly than the rules that emerged from White Papers of the past.

The Bill has arisen out of the Malone case. In March 1979, I announced that I was setting in train a study of the implications of the case. The process has taken six years, although I understand that other things have occurred. The judge ruled that telephone tapping could be done lawfully because there was nothing to make it unlawful. All Home Secretaries used the prerogative. But the judge also argued that telephone tapping was a subject that cried out for legislation. I agree. Mr. Malone appealed to the European Court of Human Rights which, in 1982, issued an opinion in favour of him and ruled that the action had been in breach of article 8 of the convention for the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

It is important to recall what article 8 says:

"Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence."

That takes us into privacy legislation and the like. Article 8 continues:

"There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security"— that is pretty broad—

"public safety or the economic well-being of the country".

I have never authorised a telephone tap in the interests of the economic well-being of the country, and nor has anyone else as Home Secretary. That is new. By absorbing what the European court says, we have taken on a new concept. Article 8 continues:

"for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others."

That is what the Government have put in the Bill. They have taken the words of the European court. Much as I respect the European court, such a general statement is not good enough for legislation.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Is the right hon. Gentleman right in saying that the economic power is new? Has it not been operated by the Foreign Secretary, though perhaps not by the Home Secretary?

Mr. Rees: I said by a Home Secretary. I was careful to say that, although I did not know until I checked with my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) that apparently it had been authorised by the Foreign Secretary. It was never done by me.

I agree in principle that we should give statutory approval to telephone tapping. It is vital that we be able to add to our information to apprehend certain categories of people. However, it is not the prime mover or the main means of getting information. When I was asked for a telephone tap, those asking had sheets of paper giving information such as that there would be a robbery on Saturday, that armed men were involved and the rest. They had everything except information about where it would happen. I can remember telling people with whom I had agreed a telephone tap to come back on Monday morning and tell me what they had found out. It would be foolish to imagine that telephone tapping is the main source of information.

We hear of informers in Northern Ireland and it is a means of getting information. This is also the case in the criminal world. Of course, telephone tapping is important in regard to terrorism. I had better be careful what I say. A foreign terrorist might for example, come here through Heathrow and I might be told that he is part of an international terrorist gang. Telephone tapping in this type of case might be the only way in which to get information.

There has been much talk about Left-wing subversives because of a recent television programme. In espionage, it is rarely that way round. I was always surprised to find out who it was alleged was involved in espionage. On the whole, they are not from my constituency or the village in which I was born—they come from a different walk of life. However, I must admit that I often used to make snide remarks about that until I realised that many people that I knew never had the opportunity.

There is an important point to make about drugs and through a tap eventually sewing up a drugs case and gaining the information to lock up people for a long time. A television film might show a policeman on a bike suddenly arriving at a seaside resort in Cornwall, and the media describe him as a clever policeman because he arrived at the right moment. However, a lot of thought was given to the exercise before the policeman arrived.

I believe in parliamentary democracy. This House believes in parliamentary democracy. Those who want to overturn parliamentary democracy by revolutionary means are, in my view, subversives. However, many people who call themselves revolutionaries could not overturn a rice pudding. I was born into the Labour movement; I did not come to it after studying PPE or modern greats at Oxford. During my 50 years in the Labour movement I have seen the paper revolutionaries come and go and become good Catholics and good members of the Conservative party in less than 20 or 30 years.

Mr. Dalyell: While my right hon. Friend is in such an expansive mood, could he give us a judgment whether, when he occupied the high office of Home Secretary, he thought that he was told all that he needed to know by the security forces? I ask that as an interrogative question.

Mr. Rees: I was always told what I wanted or needed to know about telephone tapping. In Northern Ireland, I knew a devil of a lot more about a great many people. I locked up 600 people. Two or three of us would talk into the long hours of the night; we talked as friends and as people who knew a great deal. To this day, when I read what certain people now say I give a wry grin.

When I was Home Secretary, I could not possibly know everything that was happening in MI5 — not because anyone was trying to fool me, but because it is the nature of the system. However, I am not saying that because of that I was not responsible—I accepted full responsibility for anything that was done. But it was impossible to know all.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Did my right hon. Friend note the source quoted in The Sunday Times, which in reference to the Home Secretary's effectiveness said:

"He hasn't got a clue what is going on . . . When he comes round, you lock away any sensitive files and set up a display file specially for him to look at—a spoof file on some imaginary subversive with lots of exciting material in it. He's not going to know any better."

Hon. Members might think that stupid, but my constituents and millions of people are concerned that the Home Secretary does not know what is going on. My right hon. Friend is a former Home Secretary. Does he accept that anything in that newspaper comment is true?

Mr. Rees: Quite frankly, I do not. Perhaps someone is preparing false files, I do not know. I simply repeat that it is impossible for a Home Secretary, dealing with all the various aspects of a wide Department, even to pretend that he knows all that is going on in MI5.

In any aspect of the security services, the Home Secretary must trust the man in charge. Even if the Bill were 600 pages long, with a list of rules and regulations as long as my arm, ultimately everything depends on the trust placed in the man in charge of the organisation. There is no way around that.

I am mainly concerned about clause 2. I certainly could not support economic sanctions, even though the Bill refers only to economic information from abroad. We may talk about subversives, but there are those who indulge in financial deals across the exchanges who do more harm to this country than many people who call themselves subversives. The Bill refers to deals outside this country, and that concerns me because I do not understand what it means. Does it mean that if a firm in this country has headquarters in New York, it is all right to try to find out what is going on in that company? [AN HON. MEMBER: "The Isle of Man"] I had responsibility for the Isle of Man when I was Home Secretary, but I did not know too much about that, either.

There are already rules covering phone tapping. None of the rules in the White Papers led me to tap a phone to gain economic information. That would be wrong and outside the rules. No Home Secretary of any party would sign a warrant to get economic information from a firm, trade union or anyody else.

In the recent film on television, allegation was made about the fire service dispute, so I checked on the steps that I took. When representatives from the union told me that there was to be a strike, I said that I would have to have green goddesses available. The union co-operated fully. The last thing that it wanted was the middle of London to burn. Why on earth would anyone want to tap the union's telephones? Such an allegation is made more in paranoia than anything else.

Subversion is a subjective definition, and I have already said that parliamentary democracy weighs with me. I have to ask such questions as whether there is contact with a foreign embassy, whether certain people are anything more than windy revolutionaries and whether there is any talk of arms. If there is any danger of this, there is subversion.

The Guardian took me to to task recently because, apparently—I never remember these things—during a short debate someone asked me who determined the meaning of subversion. I said that I did. The Guardian said that that was a delusion of grandeur. It was not—it must be a judgment for the Home Secretary to make.

Every hon. Member is affected by his experiences. I first entered politics in the 1930s, and I have never forgotten what happened in Germany. In the early days, as a member of the Labour League of Youth, I was in politics when others who stayed on were only in the school debating society. I was concerned when I saw the flicker of civil liberties going out in Germany. It came from a National Socialist party, and I learned that not everyone who says, "Lord, lord, I am a Socialist," is necessarily a Socialist.

Harold Laski used to tell us that there are 999 definitions. I knew the only one that mattered to me: that one would get power through the ballot box, despite all the difficulties and problems that are involved. I take up the point that was made earlier: when the Prime Minister referred to "the enemy within" was that a subjective definition of subversion? I say it is a subjective view. I was asked whether there needs to be a sharper definition. However sharp that definition may be, a subjective evaluation has eventually to be made.

Another problem arises from the enormous number of foreign agents who come to London. Some large countries seem to me to deal with their unemployment problem by having a large secret service. Their foreign agents talk to unsuspecting people in this country and report back. This is picked up by somebody else and the next thing is that a file is opened on the person because it is thought that he is in contact with a foreign agent. That is why I never go to foreign embassies if I can avoid it. It seems to me that they earn a living by building up out of nothing the importance of those to whom they speak. It causes trouble. I hope that it has never caused trouble for me, but I know that it has caused trouble for other people.

On clause 2 and the rules with which it deals, may I put this point to the Home Secretary. The place to put the Maxwell Fyfe rules and the Birkett rules, suitably brought up to date, is in a schedule to the Bill. I believe that clause 2 ought to be a general clause, with a schedule to the Bill containing the rules that I used to operate brought up to date. Any Home Secretary will have to look at those rules. I used to look at a list of my duties, under which I operated. I would be surprised to find how much a Home Secretary was responsible for. But clause 2 is not good enough as it stands. It needs to be refined. The subsection dealing with the economic well-being of the United Kingdom needs to be taken out completely. The details need to be put into a schedule to the Bill. Much discussion will have to take place, as the rules are brought up to date.

I did not understand what the former Home Secretary, the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins), meant when he said that the political aspect of the work ought to be dropped. I came across a political problem once. The National Front used to parade in my constituency with the red hand flag of Ulster. It had a link with the Ulster Defence Association. A member of the National Front, with a Conservative councillor, was supplying arms to paramilitary groups in Northern Ireland. They were arrested. They regarded themselves as a political organisation. Although one may say that politics must not enter into it, when one tries to define what is meant by politics it is not easy to do so. I read that in a Film there was a "plant" in a fascist party in Leeds. I knew nothing about it. I am very glad that there was. It may regard itself as a political organisation. I want everybody in this country to be able to stand up and put their views, whatever they may be. All I know is that black kids in Leeds were beaten up and that this political organisation was involved. I believe that such political activities need to be monitored, but that monitoring needs to be controlled. Clause 2 needs to be shorter, with the details spelt out in a schedule.

As for the allegations made in the film about the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament, in December of last year I said in the House that I had never regarded CND as a subversive organisation. The fact that an organisation says things with which many people disagree does not make it a subversive organisation. CND cannot possibly be a subversive organisation. Many of those who live in my part of Yorkshire and disagree with my views on defence are members of CND. To say that they are subversives is stupid. Many of them are Christians. They are imbued with the same spirit as the members of the Peace Pledge Union of the 1930s. In no way could I regard them as subversives. As for the allegation regarding Shelter, I have never heard anything so daft. If the Communist party, for what it is worth these days, were to take over Shelter, I do not know that I would lose much sleep. I have doubts about the allegation.

As for the point made by my right hon. Friends the Members for Cardiff, South and Penarth and for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), I believe that members of MI5 should have the right to go to a tribunal on the question of telephone tapping. This is a telephone tapping Bill. If citizens in general can go to a tribunal, members of MI5 ought to be able to go to a tribunal.

Clause 4(1) reads:

"A warrant shall not be issued except—

(a) under the hand of the Secretary of State; or

That is far too broad. I am told that certain senior offices are not really offices under the Crown. Anyway, I have been stopped on the motorway and at the nearest police station I telephoned a deputy under-secretary or the permanent under-secretary and spoke to nobody else. The reference to a person holding office under the Crown debases the existing rules. Only a Home Secretary should issue such a warrant, nobody else, and, if necessary, via a senior civil servant. The clause is too vague. As for timing, my right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton is right. I have already revealed that one gives permission for a period of time. Some telephone taps continue for a long time. I do not intend to spell it out, even in this House. However, I imagine that every hon. Member knows what I am talking about. They are blanket tappings. They are not on individuals. However, even those blanket tappings were reviewed every six months. But six months, in general, is too long.

There is a great deal to tidy up in the Bill. I welcome the fact that telephone tapping is to be put on a statutory basis. How could I say anything else? I cannot change my mind because I am in opposition. What had to be done was obvious. I ought not to say that one cannot change one's mind when in opposition, but I am not prepared to change my mind about telephone tapping. Nevertheless, the Bill needs to be substantially amended. I shall play my part in Committee. I am not being asked to vote against the Bill, but unless I receive assurances on the breadth of clause 2, I shall vote for the amendment.

I have read the script of the film that I watched last night on tape. I want to say two things about it. One of them has made me very angry, for personal reasons. An allegation was made about a man called Tommy Roberts who worked in the information office in Belfast. He had lived in this country for 20 years and worked in the Ulster Office. He then returned here. By the very nature of his office, the Home Secretary hardly knows anybody below a certain rank; his Department is so big. However, in Northern Ireland the Department is so small that I knew everybody. I knew Tommy Roberts. I remember that in August 1976 I asked Tommy Roberts and his wife Margaret what they were going to do. They said that they were going to march with the peace people down in Belfast and that they had come to collect my wife at the Castle to go with them. For the first time I had to say to my wife, "Please do not go."

Once the wife of the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland was seen marching with the peace people in Belfast the media would immediately say that the peace people were organised in the Castle. Northern Ireland politicians, with one or two exceptions, would have drawn exactly the same conclusion.

Tommy and Margaret Roberts were good people. They were going to go down to Belfast in the rain that day and make their little mark for peace in Northern Ireland. What do we get in the film? Tommy Roberts would not have known about telephone tapping of any sort. He would not have known the remotest thing about it. But what did the film say? The allegation that it made about telephone tapping and Tommy Roberts is complete rubbish. I have discussed it with my right hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason) who succeeded me in Northern Ireland.

That would not be too bad, but what did the programme go on to say? It said that at a party Tommy Roberts was drunk and that he was "a close aide of Mr. Roy Mason". Clever stuff! It is said that he said, "I know you. We have got you taped," or, "We have got you tapped". He was taking the mickey, although the Northern Irish use a different word. It was said, "Because he was drunk, I asked him again." Has anyone ever thought of Margaret Roberts? Tommy has been dead for five years. That was repeated again on the Sunday after the film by the scissors and paste journalists who regard their research as a matter of going to an old paper and cutting something out. It was rubbish. In the Elysian fields Tommy Roberts is having a good laugh and taking the mickey out of those journalistic warriors in the Europa hotel, some of whom never budged an inch to get their information. However, some were excellent. I determined to speak today on behalf of Tommy Roberts. He was a good man whose name has been besmirched.

As far as I know, I have never met Harry Newton. According to the film, he was a Left-wing informer and a former member of the Communist party. A friend of mine, whom I would trust completely, and a close friend of Mr. Newton, told me that the people doing the film came to see him and he told them that he knew Harry Newton. They said that they had a lot of information for a film on MI5 which was dynamite and they wanted personal information on Mr. Newton because he had been a victim of surveillance by MI5. They did not tell him of the allegation that he had been an informer and they told him a lie to get the information. If a Minister did that on the Floor of the House there would be hell to pay. But that was done by a journalist, getting information out of a friend of mine who is on the Left of the Labour party by a long way, who was glad that there was to be an investigative television film, who thinks it incomprehensible that Harry was an MI5 agent for over 30 years. He told me that he still thought that it was a leg-pull.

The Secretary of State is not here. I appreciate that he cannot say anything about telephone tapping. Harry Newton is dead. But an allegation has been made by a journalist. I bet that they would be shouting to have it cleared up if that had come from the Secretary of State.

Mr. Winnick: If Miss Massiter were telling the truth and if what she stated on the film is the position—we know why she decided to give up the work—and if she made those allegations regarding Mr. Newton, what possible motive could she have if they were not true?

I do not know and who does in the House except perhaps the Home Secretary, if he has checked the files? If the position is as alleged by Miss Massiter it must be taken into consideration. If she was not telling the truth, what possible motive would she have for making those allegations on the film?

Mr. Rees: I do not know. All that I am concerned about is that it has been brought to my notice that a man's character has been besmirched. All I am saying is that it ought to be cleared up.

Let me make a general observation on the media. Quite properly, there is concern about the film. Quite correctly, there is concern about what MI5 does. But the media must think carefully about what they do as well. The other day The Guardian went on to say that I "got rid of Messrs. Agee and Hosenball on the basis of undisclosed and highly suspect security information."

It could not possibly know. But that will appear again, on the scissors and paste basis, as people try, not very well, to emulate the Washington Post. The Guardian says: "Highly suspect." It goes on to say that in the ABC case the information came from the offices of the National Council for Civil Liberties. That is rubbish too, but it will appear again. The responsibility of the media in that respect is suspect.

I do not need instruction on civil liberties from those who have no responsibility. I have often called in aid the Franks committee of 10 years ago. I remember that the press came to us and said that we need not worry about the Official Secrets Act. They said that they were responsible and would look after it. We said:

"The news media . . . have a public function as well as the Government and would act responsibly by refraining from any seriously damaging disclosures of official information."

In those lovely words—I did not write them, but I can guess who did—the report said:

"It seemed to us that this second argument rested upon a number of premises of doubtful validity and we discussed it closely with the representatives of organisations holding such views who came to see us."

The report went on:

"The constitutional responsibilities of the Government and Parliament for protecting the nation cannot be abdicated on the basis that a failure to exercise them will be made good by the responsible behaviour of others. The same degree of responsible behaviour is not, in any event, shown by those who may publish or communicate official information. Restraint in publication varies from one kind of publication to another."

I read that because the Government, of whatever political persuasion, have a responsibility for secret information which cannot be bandied about.

The Bridge report dealt with one aspect of the current allegations on MI5. I am concerned about files on non-subversive organisations. I am concerned, if such is the case, about lack of co-operation between MI5 and special branch in certain areas. MI5 or the special branch has no role in narrow political surveillance. I have been very concerned about the setting up of DS19 in the Ministry of Defence. It is not the function of the Ministry of Defence, whether on the decision of the Minister or not, to be a political Department. If the Government want to get at CND, they should set up a department in the Tory Central Office. With DS19 we see what happens. Someone could ring up and say that he was head of DS19, and ask for some information. There would be two official Departments talking to each other. It was wrong. If my right hon. Friend had become Prime Minister after 1979 and had set up a political department in the Ministry of Defence, the media criticism would not have stopped. DS19 was the wrong thing to set up and it needs to be looked into. These rules should be included in the schedule. I do not want a Minister of Security. That would be dangerous. There is apparently to be a new head from outside. We did that in 1978. That is a useful thing to do from time to time.

What has been said about the setting up of a Privy Councillors' committee probably will not wash. The last Franks committee saw everything and reported truthfully. Indeed, I signed truthfully, or I would not have done so. People said that there was a cover-up. But whatever Privy Councillors do, people will say that there has been a cover-up.

Nevertheless, there is a lot of information that cannot be slung around in the House or in Committee——

Mr. Dalyell: Which Franks committee?

Mr. Rees: The committee dealt with a subject called the Falklands. However, I still suggest that there should be a committee of Privy Councillors to look at the rules. The Government should give an assurance that before reaching clause 2, such a committee will have a chance to provide a new set of rules. We would need to have a look at a schedule that is far tighter than the clause.

The same group could look annually at a report from the head of the secret service. It would have to report to the Prime Minister and Parliament upon matters such as files, surveillance and so on. The Home Secretary published the rules on surveillance in December. I have with me the statement on surveillance, and it is far more important than telephone tapping. We are moving out of the horse and buggy age. However, I believe that this type of surveillance should be covered by a separate Bill, as the subject needs to be given much more consideration.

As a first step, we should ensure that telephone tapping is covered by statute. I shall play my part in Committee. As it is, the Bill is not suitable, but I could not vote against Second Reading for that reason. However, I shall certainly vote for the amendment unless we are assured that something will be done. This matter is important. An ex-Home Secretary cannot just join the ex-Home Secretaries club and say that there are no problems. Of course there are problems. In all walks of life there are changed values. We are operating in a different world from that of the 1930s, 1950s or 1960s. But it is no good crying about that. We had better look at the issues involved. After all, the House has a responsibility.

Those of my right hon. Friends who say that something must be done are not being unpatriotic. They are doing what hon. Members have done many times before. They are asking awkward questions. I might not like some of the questions and I might be glad that I am not a member of the Government and having to deal with them. But those questions must be answered. This country must be superior to all other countries in this respect. It is a good country that asks questions. The questions have now been asked, and it is up to the Home Secretary and the Government to respond.

Sir Anthony Kershaw (Stroud): The right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) made a most compendious speech, which will greatly benefit the House. He drew on his experience and the wisdom that he has accumulated over the years, and the House should be grateful for what he said.

I believe that the surveillance of those who feel little or no obligation to obey the law is both justifiable and desirable. Of course, as the right hon. Gentleman said, the vast majority of cases involve criminal offences to do with robberies, drugs, and so on. But there are a few cases that are pursued more in the interests of the state, and it is only right that they should be looked at.

There is one body, CND, which seems to think that it falls into some sort of special category and which resents such security activity more than most people, and has said so in a letter to me. That body maintains that CND merely seeks to change the legislative process by legitimate, obvious and democratic means. It is its right to do that, and no one can possibly carp about that, or criticise CND for it.

However, one is entitled to ask, if such people have nothing reprehensible to hide, why they are so sensitive about phone tapping, especially when they spend quite a lot of their time upbraiding the Government for their secretiveness. But no one can overlook the fact that some members of CND have broken the law or have condoned those who have done so. Nobody denies that a high proportion of the CND council are politically to the Left or that there are some Communists and Trotskyists whose loyalty to this country cannot necessarily be assumed.

In those circumstances, it would be a breach of duty in this age, in which subversion and terrorism have taken the place of open war, if my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary did not take reasonable precautions against such people in order to defend the state. I commend him, and his Labour predecessors, for the action that they have taken.

Mr. D. E. Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): In the hon. Gentleman's reference to senior members of CND, is he including Mr. John Cox?

Sir Anthony Kershaw: It is not fitting to give the names of particular people, but it has not been denied that there are five people on the council of CND who are of the extreme Left persuasion. There were eight members before the last election. However, they are perfectly entitled to their views.

I turn to another subject. I have been surprised by rumours in the press, presumably inspired by Whitehall, that the Prime Minister intends to shake up the security services by appointing from outside a sort of cleaner of the Augean stables. If those rumours were inspired by Whitehall—the newspapers were rather specific about that—it was surely an error of judgment on the Government's part. On the one hand, the Government, by this Bill and by their speeches, justify the activities of the security services—as we have seen today—and on the other they seem to allow snide suggestions to be made that the services have broken the rules. I hope that my hon. and learned Friend the Minister will say whether the Government consider that the security services should be cleaned up. If so, who will they appoint to do that?

Several suggestions have been made about the degree to which, and the methods by which, the security services should be supervised. Up until now, those ultimately responsible not only politically but adminstratively have been the Prime Minister and certain other Ministers. When things have gone wrong, commissions or individuals—drawn from among the great and the good—have sought to analyse what has happened. Their reports have necessarily been secret, but have been understood to say either that all was well, or that it shortly would be. Unfortunately, those assurances have been repeatedly falsified. After each debacle, there has been another separate inquiry. I do not think that the tribunal outlined in the Bill will do the job of supervising the way in which the security services do their job, that some sort of supervision is necessary can hardly be denied. Unless Parliament and the public are satisfied that the security services are acting correctly, they will not have confidence in them, and the security services will not have confidence in themselves.

As pressure on the security services, in the present climate of public opinion, is bound to increase, just as before the war, before the fallacies of Socialism were clear and the dangers of Fascism were obvious, there were found to be those whose loyalty broke, so, now, a long peace has lessened the fear of military defeat, and uneasiness about nuclear weapons may erode the loyalty of those in the security services.

I should like to contrast the treatment meted out to some of the major traitors since the war with the threats and actual prosecutions that have been made against some of the minor MI5 officers, whose motives in making their revelations were not to bring down but to strengthen this country's security. The sort of reassurance that we need about our security services will not be provided by the occasional Law Lord or tribunal. Such people can have no technical expertise about the ins and outs of security work. They do not command the extensive files and so on that have to be produced for a proper investigation.

I do not believe that such bodies have in the past got down to the nitty-gritty of the issues involved. We need someone, or a body of people, with inside knowledge. We need people from inside the security organisation.

I know that asking a policeman to watch another policeman has sometimes been criticised, but the merit of it is that only another policeman knows all the detail and where to look for weaknesses. The idea is not novel. Many public bodies have an inspectorate. The Foreign Office, the education system, the armed forces and the constabulary all have inspectorate systems. The existence of such a body would remind services, if they needed to be reminded, to remain within the guidelines and the law. If such a body had been in existence, it would have discovered or discounted the serious events which have so dramatically and squalidly been a feature of our intelligence services since the late 1940s.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths: Does my hon. Friend also regard as critical the proper screening of those who join the security services both at the beginning of and on many occasions throughout their careers?

Sir Anthony Kershaw: I have no doubt that that is important. It is clear that when Miss Massiter and Mr. Bettaney joined the service they were acceptable and that during their service they changed. Presumably, they had no one to complain to, their jobs were not supervised, and the secrecy which necessarily exists in such organisations meant that they worked on their own and suffered all sorts of pressures which those outside such services cannot easily recognise.

A body which is known constantly to keep an eye on details, on what is going on and on those who work in those services might have prevented both of those cases. The two people might have changed their minds or, if it had been detected that they wished to leave the service, they could have done so and the disasters would not have occurred.

I do not forget or deride the misgivings of patriotic law-abiding people who may fear that their privacy may be invaded. I hope that the Bill will reassure them by codifying the practice. However, they would be even more reassured if they knew that the security services were properly run according to the law. A permanent inspectorate along the lines that I have outlined would benefit both the service and the country.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): The hon. Member for Stroud (Sir. A. Kershaw) has turned the debate to the ways in which the Bill could be bettered, especially by considering the adequacy of the scrutiny provisions. He has helpfully moved the debate forward.

It is right to remind ourselves that the right of a citizen to respect for his private life, his home, family and correspondence is a fundamental freedom, which we enjoy and which distinguishes democracy from dictatorships. For British people that fundamental right is guaranteed by article 8 of the European convention on human rights. However, it is not an unlimited right in the Convention.

I remind the House that the European Court spelt out the necessity for a limitation in a case which preceded the Malone case that has given rise to the Bill. In the Klass case in 1978 the court stated:

> "Democratic societies nowadays find themselves threatened by highly sophisticated forms of espionage and terrorism, with the result that the state must be able in order effectively to counter such threats to undertake the secret surveillance of subversive elements operating within its jurisdiction. The Court has therefore to accept that the existence of some legislation granting powers of secret surveillance over mail, post and telecommunications is, under exceptional circumstances, necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security and/or for the prevention of disorder or crime."

If that right of surveillance is abused by a public authority or if it constitutes an unlimited discretion, it would undermine or even destroy our democracy on the grounds of defending it.

In the Malone case, the European court held against the British Government on the grounds that the protection from that abuse of power in the United Kingdom rested not in law but on administrative procedures which, although hallowed by Home Secretary after Home Secretary and Government after Government, were founded not on the expression of law but on the reiteration of administrative practice. For that reason, not for a sudden perception of the importance of statutory control, we have the Bill today.

It is noteworthy that when the Home Secretary introduced the Bill he never once referred to the Malone case or to the fact that as recently as 1981 his predecessor specifically ruled out any question of placing the control of abuse on a statutory basis.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Does my hon. Friend agree that a reason why the Home Secretary did not mention the Malone case was that the Bill palpably fails to meet the circumstances of the Malone case? Indeed, with the rules of evidence and questioning which are introduced in the Bill, Mr. Malone would never have found out that his telephone was tapped because his counsel could not have asked the question that led to that discovery.

Mr. Maclennan: I agree with my hon. and learned Friend. I intended to turn to that point.

Today's debate was preceded by a trailer—the public exchange about the revelations of Miss Massiter in the television programme that was made for Channel 4. The debate might have been different if that trailer had never been shown. It is common ground, at least among those who have had responsibility of Government, that surveillance is a necessary defence of the state, that there must be discretion, albeit within limits, and that it is appropriate for some form of scrutiny to take place. What has given the debate its sharpness and partisan character, which was shown in the speeches of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) and of the Home Secretary himself, is the fact that the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary reacted to the revelations, not with any recognition of the public anxiety, but in a partisan and inappropriate way. Whether the revelations are true or false, they are serious and should have been subjected to proper and searching scrutiny and examination.

[Mr. Maclennan]

The inquiry by Lord Bridge was inevitably incomplete because he was told to limit the scope to cases where authorisation had been or should have been given by Ministers. Certain matters were specifically ruled out and, therefore, Ministers cannot be surprised that their assertions are regarded as inadequate. The matter is not irrelevant to the provisions of the Bill. The Bill proposes that we should establish a commissioner with powers similar to those at present exercised by Lord Bridge. The adequacy of those provisions must be tested by our experience of how they have worked in practice. The fact that they have palpably not worked in the present case must make us question the adequacy of the provisions relating to the establishment of a commissioner.

A Bill is certainly needed, but this Bill falls far short of what is required to protect the public from abuse of the Secretary of State's discretionary power to order surveillance. The Home Secretary claimed three things for the Bill — first, that it does not widen the scope of existing powers. That is clearly not true. The Bill widens those powers extensively in several respects, including the duration of the warrant. He said that the Bill is clear and comprehensive. It must be said that it is neither; it is not clear with respect to the powers enjoyed by the tribunal. That is one of the most important defects of the Bill with which the Home Secretary will have to deal in Committee.

As I read the Bill, and as I believe all outside commentators have read it, the tribunal will not be allowed to examine whether the Secretary of State, in exercising his powers under clause 2, was right in his judgment that it was necessary to do so for the public interest as defined in clause 2. It will be impossible for the tribunal or anyone to stand over the Secretary of State's shoulder and question his subjective judgment that the issuance of the warrant was necessary. That is a crucial question in determining whether the tribunal has effective powers of scrutiny.

That leads me to the third test which the Secretary of State put forward.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Has the hon. Gentleman read schedule 1(4), which states:

"It shall be the duty of every person holding office under the Crown to disclose or give to the Tribunal such documents or information as they may require for the purpose of enabling them to carry out their functions under this Act"?

Is that not wide enough to cover everyone who might have to give evidence and information to the tribunal?

Mr. Maclennan: I doubt whether the tribunal has powers of subpoena. They are certainly not spelt out. If it does not, it should have. The procedural limitations on the role of the tribunal vitiate its effectiveness and make it unlikely that it will be able to grant effective redress. The House cannot regard that lightly, because the European convention requires that effective redress be given to the individual. Article 13 mentions "effective domestic remedies", but I do not believe that the Bill provides effective remedies.

In exercising the right to order surveillance, it is inevitable that wide considerations will move the minds of Secretaries of State who have that power. That is why I am sceptical about at least two of the proposals that have been put forward as methods of controlling the exercise of the power. The first proposal, which is to follow the practice in the United States, is that the issuance of a warrant will be acceptable only if it is done judicially—by reference to the courts. That is also provided in parts of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. I doubt whether, in practice, where matters of national security are concerned, a judge in this country would put himself in the shoes of a Minister and hold that the Minister's certificate was capable of being challenged in the courts. That is not an effective route.

The second possible route—it was mentioned by the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees), who formerly held the high offices of Home Secretary and Secretary of State for Northern Ireland—is to narrow the grounds on which the power is exercised. I am somewhat sceptical about that, too. The language of the European Convention, which is incorporated in clause 2, is extremely broad. It may not represent the practice of the right hon. Gentleman or other Ministers who have authorised surveillance, but it is probably necessary that it be broad to encompass the circumstances in which it would be proper for a Minister to order surveillance. But it is proper to have those broad categories of powers only if they are qualified by something that is not in the Bill, but which is part of the international law of the European court: that the test of necessity should be applied in interpreting whether the broad powers have been used properly. That is not a subjective test like the one written into clause 2.

A central issue in the debate is that the Bill makes no provision for scrutinising whether a Secretary of State in issuing the warrant acted proportionately to the end to be achieved and whether the interference was necessary to achieve the intended objective. That test must be written into the Bill, and the power of objective scrutiny must be given to the tribunal and to the commissioner if we are to rely on the third and proper route, to ensure that Ministers do not abuse their powers of telephone tapping and surveillance, which is the effective ex-post facto scrutiny of what has happened. It is unreasonable to seek to fetter the discretion of a Minister who must deal with great issues of state, including the threats of terrorism and serious crime, and threats to the economic well-being of the country, by saying in advance that he can operate only in certain narrow categories of circumstances. But we must have a guarantee that, after the event, his actions can be examined objectively.

How can that best be done? Not, in my view, by the strange provisions of the Bill: establishing by letters patent —in other words, on the say-so of the Prime Minister— a tribunal which may hear complaints from those who, by chance, suspect that their telephones have been interfered with. It is proposed to ask five lawyers to join the tribunal. I doubt whether that can be regarded as an appropriate organisation.

When considering what is appropriate, it is sensible to examine what has happened in other countries. I draw the Government's attention to the experience in the Federal Republic of Germany, which was approved by the European Court of Human Rights in the Klass case. In Germany, two bodies are responsible for scrutinising surveillance powers. The first is a parliamentary body drawn from the Bundestag in proportion to the representation of political parties, which represents the senior voices of the West German parliament. That body in turn appoints the equivalent of the commissioner proposed in the Bill. The Federal Government do not themselves appoint a commissioner, as would happen here if the Bill became law. In Germany, a man of high judicial office assisted by two lay assessors is empowered by parliamentary appointment to investigate the complaints of individuals, that they have been subjected to unjustifiable interception. I realise that systems are different and that our parliamentary system of scrutiny, of ministerial discretions has grown up quite differently from that of the Federal German Republic, and the two experiences are not wholly interchangeable. However, I believe that there is merit in considering a system of external scrutiny which is established by Members of Parliament, although answerable to the Prime Minister and to members of the Government. I commend that procedure to the House for further deliberation in Committee.

Mr. James Callaghan (Cardiff, South and Penarth): I fully agree with the last sentiment of the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan). I do not intend to take up much time in view of the wide-ranging and powerful speech made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees).

The debate raises in an old form the never-ending conflicting questions of security and civil liberty, or security versus civil liberty, and accountability and secrecy, or accountability versus secrecy. The job of the House is to try to strike the right balance between the two, and Ministers must be constantly called to account in the exercise of responsibilities in these matters. There is no ideal answer. It is a question of drawing a balance between the two conflicting sets of questions.

I believe that when the Bill is on the statute book, for whatever reason it was introduced, much responsibility will still attach to the Home Secretary and to the director of MI5 for the way in which it is operated, and Parliament will never be able wholly to call either of them to account. On balance, the statute, I think, will be a help.

The Home Secretary made some play about the fact that he is introducing the Bill and that the Labour Government had not done so. The right hon. and learned Gentleman knows the reasons for that, and I shall not go into them.

I take the view that the fact that we are making unauthorised telephone tapping a criminal offence must of itself be a gain. If any officer in MI5 has been minded to tap a telephone, up to this moment, if it were known, I assume that he has been subjected only to some disciplinary procedures. From now on, he will be committing a criminal offence and can be subjected to a severe fine or on indictment to a period of imprisonment. That must be a gain, and I do not think that it is possible to say otherwise.

Likewise, with all the defects of the tribunal and the commissioner, they are a long-stop which I believe will be of some benefit. I do not think that in any way they solve the great problems outlined in the first part of my speech. They are a long-stop and, therefore, are themselves of some value.

I do not regard the Bill, however, as being of supreme value — nor, I suppose, does the Home Secretary. Indeed, my guess is that by the time we reach Third Reading he will be very sorry that he has had to introduce the Bill because the number of amendments that can and will be attempted to be written into such a Bill are manifold.

The Bill is an attempt to legislate for something that hitherto has been exercised by the Home Secretary in my view with responsibility, with care and with due recognition of the conflict between civil liberty and security and between accountability and secrecy. Therefore, I feel that in this, as in other fields, an attempt to legislate will involve the Home Secretary—not that I should weep any tears about it — in a tremendous problem by the time that he has finished.

I wish to make one or two comments about certain provisions of the Bill. First, I believe that there would be an advantage — because, in my judgment, Ministers should not get too intimately concerned with the affairs of MI5 — in having some independent discussion between the head of MI5 and a group of outsiders, whom I will not define more closely than that at present, about the objectives, targets and priorities of MI5 from time to time and, indeed, fairly regularly. After all, although there is a great deal of fantasising about it, MI5 at present has a limited number of people at its disposal. The idea that thousands of people are wandering round gathering information is absurd. There is a limited number and in my experience — although I agree that it is now nearly 20 years since I was Home Secretary, and the practice may have changed — it is the director of MI5 who broadly decides the targets, priorities and objectives. He may be the most estimable man in the world, but for him to act on his own, or at least in concert with his senior officials, all of them in a rather enclosed society, is not to my mind the best way to aim at and secure the right targets or, indeed, to determine the correct priorities.

It is said in the film, of which I have read the transcript, that the CND was first made a subject of surveillance — not of interception, according to the film—and then in 1981 it was taken out. I assume that that was done on the judgment of the director of MI5, if the statement in the film is correct. I think that there is a great deal to be said for having a group of people with a broader understanding of the ebb and flow of political activity in the country who can at regular intervals discuss with the director of MI5 why he has chosen certain objectives, why he has decided that one matter should be a priority rather than another and why he is concentrating on certain areas. That could only be of value to his work. In my judgment, it might present a better balanced picture to the director of MI5 of what is necessary.

I am not speaking about the security field directly — espionage, the IRA, international terrorism and other such areas — although obviously there might be value in discussions on whether it is right to place a degree of priority on international terrorism as against the IRA, or on the IRA as against some other kind of subversion. I am talking about what the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) referred to earlier today as political activities — the position of the Communist party, the danger of the Communist party. For example, assuming that the Communist party is targeted on the ground that it wishes to overturn parliamentary government in the country, would it be right to target it rather than the Workers' Revolutionary party or some other party which is attempting to subvert the state by overthrowing parliamentary government?

I am sure that the director of MI5 has his views about these matters, but in my view it would be wholesome and healthy if there were others with a political judgment to bring to bear—not, I think, judges or Law Lords, but people with some experience of politics, and I guess that some could be found. Such people could have discussions not only with the director of MI5 but with the Prime Minister or, indeed, the Home Secretary.

Although the Bill is not directly concerned with this aspect of the matter but is concerned, as I recognise and said in an earlier intervention, with interception in the broadest sense, the issues that have been raised as a result of the Bill and the things that have been said demand that public confidence should be satisfied. I believe that there is something to be said for the idea that I have put forward.

I think that there is a case for dissatisfied officers having another outlet apart from the director of MI5. I heard what the Home Secretary said, and I fully recognise that it is their job, if they are dissatisfied on certain matters, to go to the director. We have seen two cases recently, if not three. Two cases were mentioned in the film, there is the case of Mr. Bettaney and there have been others. In these cases, the people who have been concerned have been unable to find a suitable outlet for their disquiet.

The security services are essential and nothing that I am saying is intended to derogate in one jot or tittle from their responsibilities or morale. Rather, my remarks are intended to make it easier for them to operate, with the full assent of the people. It is important for officers who find themselves operating in a semi-political field and who are dissatisfied to have a further opportunity to consult, and that is why I suggested the commissioner. I appreciate the Home Secretary's objection to that suggestion, but he should consider some other way of meeting what has become a problem in this area. It must have adversely affected the morale of MI5 to have had the two recent cases.

I thought that the suggestion of the hon. Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw) of an inspectorate was going along the path that might be traversed. How it should be devised must be a matter for close consideration and I would not think of suggesting a final answer now. The Home Secretary rather ruled out my suggestion, and I am not sure whether he was in his place to hear the suggestion of the hon. Member for Stroud. Suffice it to say that a problem exists and that it must receive close consideration.

The Bill represents an improvement but not a solution. Indeed, I doubt whether there ever will be a solution. Even when the measure is passed, everything will finally come back to the discretion of the Home Secretary and the integrity with which he discharges his task. There is no need to doubt that integrity in any Home Secretary, past, present or future. The Home Secretary has a difficult task to perform. He should not interfere too closely in the affairs of MI5.

Party politicians, even when Home Secretaries, can misuse information, although I do not believe that that has been the case. However, I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South that it was a grave error on the part of the Government, in setting up DS19, to try, if they did, to use information gained by MI5 for their own purposes in combating CND.

That, if it happened, was going beyond the proper remit and ambit of an exchange of information. I hope that it will not happen again, if it happened then, and I am glad that the unit has been wound up.

The Bill represents a slight advantage. It will introduce some elements of safeguard in that the tapping of a telephone without a warrant will be a crime. I repeat, however, that the most important safeguards that we have at the end of the day are the integrity of the Home Secretary and the knowledge, understanding and firmness of principle of the director of MI5. They cannot be replaced by any statute, no matter what it might say.

If the Prime Minister decides to appoint someone from outside, that should not be taken as a slur on MI5, as the hon. Member for Stroud pointed out. It may be thought that there is no one from within who entirely fits the bill. We have had no hesitation in appointing people from outside to other occupations, and there is no reason why MI5 should be exempt in that respect.

It is important to maintain MI5's morale, which has been shaken by recent events. Our job is to strengthen its morale, but at the same time to ensure that neither its officers nor Government go beyond what we believe to be the correct balance between the security of the state and the civil liberty of our people. In the end, MI5 is about the civil liberty of our people. That must be protected. MI5 should not misjudge its remit. Nor should we hamper its activities.

7.5 pm

Mr. Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): The House will have been struck by the contrast between the speeches of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman)—a clever, facile and secondhand speech—and those of the former Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) and the right hon. Member for Morely and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees).

While the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South was speaking, I heard a remark from below the Gangway opposite to the effect that the Home Secretary could be deceived. Hon. Members should remember that one can perhaps fool a weak Home Secretary about some things for much of the time and about many things for some of the time, but one cannot possibily fool a diligent Home Secretary about everything all the time.

I agree with the central point made by the right hon. Members for Cardiff, South and Penarth and for Morley and Leeds, South that, at the end of the day, this House must trust the Home Secretary. We have no alternative. He is accountable to Parliament and he must exercise his discretion maintaining the difficult balance between liberty and accountability, secrecy and freedom, and it is right that we should put on record that we have had good reason to trust all our Home Secretaries. I include in that the present Home Secretary. In trusting them and allowing them to perform their difficult task we thereby strength the morale of the security service, on which a great deal depends.

My interest in this matter has developed over about 25 years. I knew of Burgess and Maclean in Washington. I did not know when I met them that they were traitors. They were men of charm and high intakes of liquid. Subsequently, from time to time, though not closely, I also knew Kim Philby. I did not know then that he was a spy.

I was told subsequently by people in the American security service that a fourth man was spying in Britain and I pursued that matter closely, inquiring into it at the highest level of politics and security in this country. I was told that there was nothing in the story. In fact, we were wrong and the Americans were right. Anthony Blunt was the fourth man.

Since then I have followed these issues as closely as it is possible for an hon. Member to follow them—and as one who has links with the police service in Britain—and I have no doubt that at any time there is a persistent attempt to spy on this country, to sell its secrets and to subvert its freedom. The Bill must be seen against the background that we are facing, whether or not we like it, a continuing attack on our liberties by those who wish to destroy us.

I support the Bill, as one who at one time had his telephone tapped. I support the Bill because it will clarify the law, because it will regularise the procedures under which this disagreeable but necessary activity is to be allowed and because it will provide important and new safeguards.

Most of all, I support the Bill for the larger reason that it will help to tackle the threats to our society from terrorism; from trafficking in drugs, which is often used to finance terrorism; from the increasing problem of assassination, which is used as a method of achieving political change; and because there is a continuing risk from abroad to our democracy.

I have over the last three or four years been able to make some study of terrorism and I should like to indicate to the House one or two of the things that I have discovered. They may well be known to other hon. Members.

Looking simply at those acts in which terrorists have crossed international frontiers and used weapons, explosives or funds that originated in other countries, there have been, since 1970, 3,400 separate such incidents. These have included 1,800 that involved the use of explosives, more than 300 hijacks of aircraft, close to 200 kidnappings and perhaps 85 or 86 assassinations of political leaders or diplomats, the most conspicuous recently being the assassination of Indira Gandhi in India.

Among the heads of state who have been assassinated in the past 10 years are the President of Bangladesh, the head of state of Nigeria, the Presidents of Afghanistan, Yemen, South Korea and Liberia, and so on. Also, some 23 ambassadors have been assassinated in their posts.

The worst feature of terrorism almost certainly is bombing. Bombs are easy to make and can be and are planted without the terrorist himself running any risk of detection. What happened at the Grand hotel in Brighton is clear enough evidence of this, and the same goes for the majority of the 8,000 or more bombings that have taken place since 1969.

The hijacking of aircraft comes second in the league table of terrorist incidents. I have here a record of some 300 aircraft hijacks and, despite the relative success that we have had over the past 10 years in reducing the incidence of hijacking of aircraft through new surveillance systems, including the telephone tap, terrorists now have found a way round these techniques.

Two recent incidents—in both of which the bags had been thoroughly examined before the passengers boarded the aircraft but nevertheless hijacks took place—were founded on the simple fact that the terrorists had been able to carry on board their so-called duty-free bottles of liquid. In fact, those bottles contained in one case petrol and in the other diesel oil. They were mixed in the lavatory, an appropriate wick was put in and the terrorists then had Molotov cocktails. They doused some of the passengers with petrol, walked up and down with a lighted copy of a newspaper, and by that act they were able to have their own way. Hijacking is still a serious matter.

So, too, is kidnapping. About 1,800 people have been kidnapped for political purposes in the past five years. And so the problem goes on.

As the terrorists develop their onslaught on civilised society, two other developments can be seen. First, their technology improves. Secondly, their international co-operation increases all the time. The rifle that killed President Kennedy was fired from a distance of 200 paces. That meant that the area of search for the police and security people was perhaps 1 square mile. Today there are available to terrorists through the arsenals of both the Warsaw Pact and NATO precision guided missiles which can be fired from a stand-off position of some three or four miles. They will literally go round corners and they have a 90 per cent. guarantee of killing. The consequence of that advance in technology is that the search area which the security services must clear when guarding against such an attack—at the inauguration of a president or at the Cenotaph in Whitehall — has been very greatly increased.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Griffiths: No, not for the moment.

The dilemma that I am putting to the House is this. Technology is assisting the terrorist and making more difficult every day the counter-efforts of the security services. That is precisely why it would be madness to seek to take away from the security services the technology of telephone surveillance in trying to prevent the murders, bombings and assassinations that threaten our society. It is in that light that I wish to refute the murmurs and, indeed, the comments that I have heard in the House and read in the press that it is totally wrong to permit, or even to regularise, the tapping of telephones. The issue is simply how——

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for an hon. Gentleman to accuse hon. Members of the Opposition of not wishing to legalise telephone tapping when I successfully tabled an amendment in Committee to the British Telecommunications Bill in 1981, supported by hon. Members on both sides?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman knows that that is a point of information, not a point of order for me.

Mr. Griffiths: I turn now to the Bill. My main concern is whether, by its complexity, it might hobble the security service. I have listened very carefully to what has been said. I certainly go along with what the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth said about the need for the director of MI5 to have access from time to time to some other body for advice, for an incestuous or even monastic quality can develop in that organisation. The idea of an inspectorate put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw) should be considered very carefully by the Government.

What I find attractive about this Bill is that for the first time it makes it illegal for anybody improperly to intercept communications in the public system. It is something of a surprise to discover that there has never before been such an offence of general application in our law. Postmen and the staff of public telecommunication systems have long been liable to prosecution for improper interception, but until today there has been no specific proposal for the statute book to contain a single, comprehensive offence applying to everybody irrespective of who he is or who he works for. This Bill now provides that, and I welcome it.

Secondly, the legislation sets out the grounds on which interception can be authorised. It is surprising that the statute book has never before set out these grounds. The Bill lays down the form in which warrants must be issued, how they must be handled and when they must be re-examined if they are not to lapse. It ensures that all decisions to issue warrants must be, as they always have been, personal to the Secretary of State. There can be no delegating and no passing of the buck.

Thirdly, the Bill establishes entirely new safeguards. These are a crucial element in creating the confidence that the public needs to feel whenever we enact legislation of this kind. The tribunal not only has the ability to adjudicate on decisions taken by the Secretary of State but can also offer means of redress. It can, if it thinks fit, quash the warrant in question and award compensation against the Secretary of State.

Mr. Barron: That is right.

Mr. Griffiths: Indeed it is. I am glad to have the hon. Gentleman's support. That is a real advance and I should have hoped that the Opposition, in those circumstances, would welcome the Bill instead of seeking to nit-pick it to death.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): We have tabled a reasoned amendment.

Mr. Griffiths: That is one way of putting it. No doubt the hon. Gentleman will make his point later.

I should like to conclude with this general point.

"There are continuous, organised and dangerous efforts to spy out the secrets of the state. Similar organised and continuous efforts are made to spread subversion and to penetrate the apparatus of the Government and work of high security."

Those are the words of the Birkett report, under which successive Governments have operated. Against the background of the crime, violence, terrorism and assassination that we see today, I do not think that anyone can doubt that those words of Lord Birkett in 1957 are even more applicable today.

The point that the Home Secretary had to make bears repeating to the House. The police in England and Wales estimate that in the past 10 years they have been able to make more than 5,000 arrests to recover more than £40 million worth of stolen property and to seize drugs valued at over £50 million as a result of interception. Anyone who knows the situation in Northern Ireland would agree that if those have been the fruits of authorised interception in England and Wales, many lives have been saved and many terrorist incidents have been prevented by the proper use of interception in Northern Ireland.

I hope very much that in Committee there will be some amendments to the Bill. One amendment that I would support, if I had the misfortune to serve on the Committee —and, frankly I shall do my utmost to avoid it because the Home Secretary may regret——

Mr. Alex Carlile: But the Committee will be on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Griffiths: In that case, I shall have opportunity to make a contribution in Committee, although I do not believe that that decision has been taken yet, and I doubt that the Bill will be taken on the Floor.

Nevertheless there will be some amendments and one that I would support is the clearing up of the economic dimension—I am not sure that I know what that means — and the clearing up of clause 3, as well as the question whether the members of the tribunal will be able to bullyrag practitioners while they are on the job. Restrospection is one thing. Involving themselves in the day-to-day workings of the service while it is conducting investigations is a very different matter.

I detected in the Opposition — not throughout the Opposition, as I know that there are different views and wide experience on the matter — a collective sigh of relief when they came to this Bill. At long last they can get into the open ground of attacking our so-called secret police. They spent much of the past year attacking the police over the miners' strike for being a paramilitary force, a national force, a Conservative party force and a brutal force. All those allegations have been shown not to be true. But, now that the miners' strike has come to an end, thanks in large measure to the actions of the police in upholding civil liberty, the Opposition cannot wait to create the new demonology of something called the secret police and telephone tappers.

I understand the politics of why they are doing that. However, I hope that they will listen to the wisdom and experience of the former Home Secretary, the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South and the former Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South, and Penarth. Both spoke with knowledge, not prejudice.

Mr. Ian Mikardo (Bow and Poplar): I always try to begin any speech by following the usual practice of the courtesy of the House by referring to the speech of the person who spoke before me. However, on this occasion I cannot comment on the speech of the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) because it consisted of nothing but what Mr. Punch used to call a glimpse of the obvious. There is no point in the hon. Gentleman holding forth about the necessity to use powers of invigilation, surveillance and interception against terrorists, kidnappers, assassins, drug pushers and people undertaking other serious crimes because there is no dissent in any quarter of the House from the proposition that it is right to use all possible methods for dealing with such crimes and with any threat to the state from hostile forces outside the state. There is no argument about that.

The reason why the hon. Gentleman could not name a single one of the persons who he says have been opposing telephone tapping for any purposes whatever is that the whole lot of them are figments of his fevered imagination. We all admire the splendid job he does in earning the lolly that he gets from the Police Federation. Nobody wants to interfere with a chap, a working man, earning his living. So we are always very tolerant of him, and I shall therefore pass on without further comment.

The hon. Gentleman knows as well as I and every other Member of the House that the Bill has been introduced not because of the unhappy increase in the incidence of drug pushing, assassinations or aircraft hijacks. There is only one reason why the Government have brought in the Bill, and we all know it. It is absolutely clear. They have reluctantly brought in the Bill only because they were compelled to do so by the condemnation of the European Court of Human Rights. Without that condemnation, we would not have the Bill. They have brought in a Bill that does the absolute minimum necessary to push aside that condemnation of the European court, instead of a Bill dealing seriously with the problem of safeguarding the rights of non-criminal citizens against the ever-increasing arbitrary powers of the state apparatus, which is the sort of Bill that they should have introduced.

It is pretty clear that the Home Secretary does not understand the problem at all. Whenever he is challenged on any aspect of this multifarious problem, he always falls back on the assertion that he has never acted improperly in authorising a warrant for a telephone tap. Recently, he got Lord Bridge to confirm that assertion. For my part, I do not need Lord Bridge's confirmation. I have never doubted for a moment that the right hon. and learned Gentleman and all his predecessors have always acted, in respect of the authorisation of telephone taps, with absolute and total probity.

The problem is not phone taps authorised by the Secretary of State; it is the very much larger number of phone taps that are made without any application for an authorisation, perhaps because it was known that an application might be refused by a Home Secretary acting properly. The much larger number of phone taps made without application for authorisation have absolutely nothing to do with serious crime or a threat from enemies of the state abroad. Telephone taps concerning those matters are applied for because the authorisation will be given. The ones that are done without authorisation are virtually by definition those that are not concerned with the security of the state or serious crime. If the Home Secretary does not know about that, he is very much alone and very much an innocent abroad.

Annex 2 of the White Paper shows that in 1984 there were 581 unauthorised taps. The number of people involved in the work is just over 400, so on average each of them did one telephone tap every nine months. That is not a high level of productivity for a Government who are always going on about the need to increase productivity. The most elementary arithmetic leads to the conclusion that 581 taps are only a small fraction of the total number of interceptions.

Mr. McWilliam: Will my hon. Friend reflect on the fact that the people making the taps are now employed by private enterprise? What does he think the attitude of private enterprise would be to that level of productivity compared to the attitude of the state by whom the people were employed previously?

Mr. Mikardo: That is a subject on which I hesitate to speak, because I have no authority so to do. I do not have enough knowledge to make a serious, authoritative comment on that question. I hope that my hon. Friend will catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because many hon. Members, not on this side alone, are well aware that almost certainly he knows more about the technology of these matters than any other hon. Member. I am sure that his contribution to the proceedings on the Bill will be valuable.

The Home Secretary's ignorance of what is happening is exposed further when he keeps on telling us that no hon. Member is having his telephone tapped. When he says that, he is saying something that he does not know. All he knows is that he has not authorised a tap on the telephone of any hon. Member, but there is, unhappily, good reason to believe that there is eavesdropping on some of our telephones. In his starry-eyed ignorance of what is going on all round him the Home Secretary reminds me forcibly of the man who for 19 years played the piano on the ground floor of a honky-tonk without finding out that the upstairs floor was a brothel.

The Home Secretary has told us that under the Bill unauthorised tapping will be a breach of the law. I suppose that that will help a bit, but hon. Members are wrong if they take that as total security for citizens. The security forces often behave as though they are above the law. They defy existing laws with impunity as, for example, when they break into a house or an office to plant a bug or to steal papers. They regard that as part of their normal day's business. If they are prepared to defy and violate present laws, why should anyone think that they will feel obliged to obey this law if and when we pass it?

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): Will the hon. Gentleman cite some evidence for all the assertions he is making?

Mr. Mikardo: I have a great deal of evidence for what I am saying. I am prepared to give that evidence to a Minister. I have offered it and the offer has not been accepted. I have knowledge about the telephones of Members of Parliament being tapped.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Let us have it.

Mr. Mikardo: I shall claim the same privilege as the Minister. I am not giving information in public about particular cases. If he has that right, so have I.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Giles Shaw): The House has listened with fascination to the hon. Gentleman's allegation. He no doubt heard my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary say that all the allegations that have been brought to his attention in relation to the unauthorised use of the powers of surveillance services have been examined. If the hon. Gentleman has such evidence, and would like to give it to a Minister, I should be delighted to receive it.

Mr. Mikardo: I shall be happy to tell the Minister of an occasion on which somehow an employers' organisation knew of the decision of a trade union about the bottom figure at which it would be prepared to settle in a wage negotiation. I have evidence of other breaches as well. If the Minister sends me an invitation to talk to him about these matters, I shall gladly accept it.

Mr. McWilliam: Perhaps I can help my hon. Friend. On page 161, of the now unavailable book "Operation Julie", the head of the operation, Inspector Dick Lee, explained how he avoided routine police channels and persuaded an unnamed organisation to tap a suspect's telephone. I put that on the record for my hon. Friend.

Mr. Mikardo: When the time comes, we shall deal with it. I promise hon. Members that I shall not run away from the challenge. I have never run away from a challenge in the years I have been in the House, and I will not do it now.

Another serious defect of the Bill is that it does nothing to protect people against interception of communications by means other than the post or the telephone. As I have said, there are bugs put into houses and offices. Bugs are planted in motor cars and in hotel bedrooms. British and other west European business men going to do business in Moscow used to regale each other in the aeroplane on the way there with stories of the consequences of their hotel bedrooms in Moscow having had bugs planted in them. There are hordes of funny stories on the subject. We now know that hotel rooms in Great Britain are bugged as well. Direction-finding listening devices can be beamed into a room from a vehicle parked a couple of hundred of yards down the road.

The plain fact of the matter is that this country is rapidly falling victim to some of the practices of a police state. It is becoming increasingly difficult for us to deliver curtain lectures to other Governments about basket III of the Helsinki final act without being conscious of the mote and the beam. Let me illustrate that by pointing out some comparative examples. I have already mentioned phone tapping that takes place here, as it does in totalitarian countries, and the bugging of hotel bedrooms. There are other examples. In the Soviet Union any opposition to Government policy automatically ranks as subversion and can, therefore, be treated as a crime. Recently in Great Britain a Government representative and a judge both claimed that opposition to Government policy automatically ranked as subversion, and, therefore, could be treated as a crime. In the Soviet Union——

Mr. Sayeed rose——

Mr. Mikardo: No, I am not giving way. I want to draw to a close. Other hon. Members want to speak. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

In the Soviet Union a man can be denied employment, and often is, in the public sector solely because of his political beliefs. In Great Britain a man can be denied employment in some parts of the public sector solely because of his political beliefs. I should have thought that Conservative Members would be as offended by all this as I am. I do not know why they seek to defend it.

In the Soviet Union a man can be convicted of a crime by a single judge on the basis of evidence given only by a bribed police informer. In one part of the United Kingdom, a man can be convicted of a crime by a single judge on the basis of evidence given only by a bribed police informer.

In the Soviet Union some completely innocent people are prevented from travelling outside their own gubernya. Recently, in Great Britain, some completely innocent people were prevented from travelling outside their own county.

In the Soviet Union some people cannot even get to their own homes without showing their identity cards. In one part of Great Britain, people will have difficulty getting to their homes without showing their identity cards.

In the Soviet Union restrictions on movement within, and out of, the country are applied discriminately against some ethnic groups. In the United Kingdom restrictions on movement into the country are applied discriminately against some ethnic groups

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) reminded the House, in the Soviet Union, public servants who query Government policy can be recommended for psychiatric examination. In Great Britain recently, at least two public servants who queried Government policy were recommended for psychiatric examination.

In the Soviet Union the Government withhold from the people any information that might show up their leaders in a bad light. Recently in Great Britain the Government have withheld from the people some information that might have shown up their leaders in a bad light.

In the Soviet Union politicians addressing their party conferences make use of information winkled out by the security snoopers. In Great Britain one Minister, addressing a gathering of members of his party, has made use of information winkled out by the security snoopers.

I have a final example. The Soviet Union has refused to sign the United Nations convention on torture. Great Britain has refused to sign the United Nations convention on torture.

We in Great Britain detest the suppression of human rights and civil liberties in the totalitarian countries, but increasingly we show our detestation of these practices by copying them. We have not yet reached the high level of tyranny that has been reached, for example, in South Africa, Chile or the Soviet Union, but we are learning fast and we are catching up fast. Great Britain has managed to get itself condemned by the European Court of Human Rights more times than any other country. I see that the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) enjoys that. Perhaps he is proud of the fact.

We need a Bill to begin reversing that awful process instead of this pathetic and ineffective measure, which will do nothing to offset serious breaches in the rights of ordinary, decent non-criminal citizens.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): I always consider it a privilege to follow the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) because he is a very senior Member of the House. He sits with me on the Foreign Affairs Select Committee and we have a fair bit in common on a number of issues. Therefore, it saddened me to hear him being so paranoid when he addressed the House on this subject. One gets the feeling that some hon. Members are upset that they are not considered important enough to have their telephones tapped. The hon. Member for Bow and Poplar said that Members of Parliament are having their telephones tapped, but when he was asked for evidence on this at this late hour he talked about employers bugging some trade unions. That has nothing to do with Members of Parliament.

There may be a lot of bugging. I have no doubt that as the methods that are cheaply available are far more widely developed and the electronic apparatus is improved, more and more people will engage in bugging. The first question whether the state is doing so, and the second whether the state can stop the activity without the need to resort to a police state. That itself would be counter-productive and undesirable as a means of monitoring what is happening elsewhere.

The hon. Member for Bow and Poplar read out an absurd list of comparisons between this country and the Soviet Union. I shall mention just three as the hon. Member was going so fast that I could not get them all down. He said that identity cards are being used here in the same way as they are used in the Soviet Union. The identity cards that I think that the hon. Gentleman is referring to are to help the residents of Molesworth to get home. They are not there to stop the residents of Molesworth from getting home, which is the purpose of identity cards in some other states.

Mr. Mikardo: Comrade Ivan must know that that is what the Russians say that they are doing.

Mr. Lawrence: The hon. Gentleman knows that when the Russians say that, it is not true. Perhaps he should ask the residents of Molesworth, who want to be able to get home, whether they would prefer to be able to do so or be prevented from doing so. The procedure is just to make it easier for law-abiding citizens to go about their ordinary lawful ways. The hon. Gentleman knows that one of our criticisms is that that is not what happens in the Soviet Union.

The hon. Member for Bow and Poplar talked about recommendations to psychiatric help. That may or may not have happened, but there is the world of difference between recommending critics of the regime to have psychiatric help and forcing them to do so even when it is not justified, which is what is happening in the Soviet Union.

The hon. Gentleman also said that in the Soviet Union a person can be convicted on the bribed information of a paid informer. Perhaps that does happen, but in this country nobody can be convicted on such evidence alone, unless a jury of 12 good men and true is convinced that that is the appropriate way to deal with the problem. When one examines them, there is not a great deal of merit in some of the rather more paranoid utterances of the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar. He greatly amuses the House and is greatly respected, but he sometimes goes over the top, and this is one of the subjects on which he does so.

The only disturbing thing about the debate is that Her Majesty's official Opposition are against the Bill. The most positive action that the Government have taken and will take to strengthen civil liberties is opposed by the Opposition.

That the Bill does not deal in one swift, all-embracing, legislative swoop with every single unjustified infrintement of the liberty of the individual in an increasingly complex and vulnerable society, is no reason for voting against it. That it may not be yet the most perfect tool for accomplishing the end that it seeks, is no reason to vote against it.

This is the first serious attempt to put into statute form a protective set of principles and rules in favour of citizens and against the insidious power of the state encroaching on the privacy of our lives. It is there for all to see and to know exactly what it contains and what their rights are, and for independent watchdogs to monitor these activities. I would have thought that all libertarians of all parties would support this Bill. However, Her Majesty's Opposition—I have listened to most, if not all of their speeches—seem to be opposed to it.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): The hon. and learned Gentleman is supposed to be a lawyer. I warn him that he will soon be added to the list of lawyers whom I would pay not to defend me. Almost everthing that he has said has been factually wrong. It is factually wrong to say that we intend to vote against the Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman should at least be able to read the Order Paper and understand what is written on it.

Mr. Lawrence: I listened with great interest to the speech of the right hon. Membe: for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). If that was a speech in favour of the Bill, the right hon. Gentleman could have fooled me.

Mr. McWilliam: There is a reasoned amendment.

Mr. Lawrence: There may be a reasoned amendment, but it is directed against the structure of the Bill. That is astonishing, given that the structure of the Bill is in favour of protecting the rights of citizens against the encroaching power of the state.

Perhaps the Labour party is no longer concerned about the freedom and protection of the individual. Certainly when the Labour Government were in office for five years they did nothing to guard the citizen in that respect, while, if the film "20:20 Vision" is anything to go by, they took every opportunity to tap the telephones of trade union leaders. Perhaps moderation and good sense have gone out of the window since Labour's takeover by——

Mr. Merlyn Rees: I wish that the hon. and learned Gentleman had been here to listen to the speeches. He is making a silly party political speech worthy of a barrister with a poor brief. This is not a matter for silly nonsense. The hon. and learned Gentleman has not listened to the debate. We are not going to vote against Second Reading, and we have made it clear that clause 2 needs altering. The hon. and learned Gentleman is debasing the whole debate.

Mr. Lawrence: The right hon. Gentleman is being offensive. Perhaps he does not mean to be. I heard 35 or 40 minutes of his speech, and I found it most interesting. He did not seem to be aware that, under his Government, the Foreign Secretary had powers to protect the economic well-being of the nation. Perhaps I misunderstood the right hon. Gentleman. When I intervened, he said that he had meant only that the Home Secretary did not have such powers. That was very interesting, but it did not advance the argument.

I may be mistaken in saying that the Opposition are voting against the Bill but I am not mistaken when I say that the Opposition speeches — I have heard most of them—show that the Opposition are strongly opposed to the Bill, and that is what I am criticising. It is impossible for anyone who is concerned with the protection of the liberty and the rights of the individual strongly to oppose the Bill. The Bill provides for that protection for the first time in statute form, and makes unauthorised tapping a criminal offence.

If the criticism is that the Bill is not wide enough, that is a reason for supporting it. It is not a reason for opposing it in the way that it has been opposed this evening.

Perhaps the Opposition cannot make up their minds about their attitude to the Bill. Perhaps they do not wish to appear to be moderate. Hon. Member after hon. Member faces reselection by extreme Left-wing committees who do not encourage moderation. I do not know what the reason is, but I am astonished that any hon. Members who believe in the liberty of the individual can speak as strongly as they have against the Bill.

It is clearly in the public interest that for the first time there should be a statutory framework for the protection of the rights of the individual in questions of telephone tapping and postal interception. Nearly everyone must agree that in some circumstances the public interest has to be served by making interceptions. It may be believed that national security is being breached by espionage or subversion. Serious crimes may be about to be committed, or may have been committed but not yet detected. It may also be necessary to preserve the nation's economic well-being.

However, if we believe all that we hear on television, and anecdotal and direct evidence of interferences with individual liberty, we are driven to believe that a gap can arise between the rules laid down by Government and the operations of the interception services or of individuals outside those services. How is that gap to be bridged? It is all very well to criticise a Government for bringing in a Bill to deal with the part of the matter that lies within the Government's sphere of influence, but the right hon. Member for Bow and Poplar suggested no way in which a Government could prevent people outside their control from tapping other people's telephones.

To some extent, the Bill will help to close that gap. Ideally, we should go further. In time we shall do so. However, it is difficult to see how the gap can be closed completely when we are not agreed on the methods necessary to stop all unjustified interference with privacy.

Meanwhile, the Bill is an important step. It does not extend the state's power over the individual; it limits it. I think that the Bill should enjoy the support of both sides of the House. It is not perfect. If Bills were perfect when they were brought in, there would be no need for Committee stage or Report. The Bill needs further thought and attention.

Together with my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Fylde (Sir E. Gardner) and the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer), I have the honour to serve on the council of that admirable organisation Justice. Justice has already suggested some improvements. Most of them were taken up by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton. Indeed, they formed a major part of his speech.

Justice says what the right hon. Gentleman refrained from saying — that the Bill certainly improves the situation. We shall be churlish if we do not admit that that is so. Justice suggests, first, that judicial authority should be obtained for every warrant. I do not agree with that. The Secretary of State will know more about the need for a warrant than any judge, and if a judge said yes to every Secretary of State he would be a mere cipher, and that would be a position unbecoming to the judiciary.

Justice suggests, secondly, that the purpose for which surveillance is required needs to be more precisely defined. I agree with that. Serious crimes should be properly, and more restrictively, defined. Thirdly, Justice suggests that a Bill that allows the manager of a hotel to consent to the surveillance of a resident is defective. I agree with that.

Fourthly, Justice suggests that if he comes upon contraventions against an individual that the individual himself does not know about, the commissioner should inform the tribunal and action should still be taken. Certainly, effective protection would need to involve more than a complaint from a member of the public who is aware of an infringement. That is common sense.

Fifthly, Justice suggests that mistaken material should be destroyed. I agree with that.

Public confidence will be most important in the operation of the law. If there is some doubt about whether lawyers ought to be chosen by the Government, the lawyers could be chosen by the senate of the Inns of Court, or by the Law Society — [Interruption.] If the Opposition believe that those bodies are politically governed, will they tell me which political party governs them? I do not see why the tribunal should not be selected by independent bodies, subject to the disapproval of the Prime Minister if she knows something that they do not.

We are striving to strike a balance between the security of the state and the freedom of the individual. That task becomes more difficult, but more urgent, as international terrorism grows stronger, assassinations become more frequent and crime becomes more international and ever more serious.

One point at issue between the two sides of the House is whether there should be more public scrutiny by Privy Councillors or a Select Committee, or whether we should trust the judgment of the Home Secretary, the Foreign Secretary and the Secretaries of State for Wales or Scotland — improved, as the Bill requires, by the monitoring of a tribunal and a commission. The problem is that the more public scrutiny there is, the greater is the chance of the nation's secrets, whether by espionage or criminal or economic information getting out. If such information is given to a Select Committee or even to Privy Councillors, the chances are that information will get out, not because of malice, dishonesty or impropriety, but because we are constantly under scrutiny and, bit by bit, the media manage to worm things out of us. If such information gets into the hands of the enemy of the state, our security is at risk.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: It occurs to me, as the hon. and learned Gentleman has emphasised the importance of facts derogatory to the economic performance of the country, that it might be useful if the facts about our economic performance got out so that everyone could do as badly as us.

Mr. Lawrence: The hon. Gentleman reminds me of Art Buchwald who once asked at an Oxford union debate why we did not give the Russians our secrets as that would put them three years behind. I do not recommend that doctrine any more than the hon. Gentleman's.

There might be changes and improvements to the Bill to reassure Opposition Members, who might support it, and the public. I am sure that the Government will listen to those suggestions and take the necessary steps to improve it. It is one of the most substantial steps towards the protection of the civil liberties of the individual in recent memory. As such, it deserves the House's support and I hope that it gets it.

8.1 pm

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): I am proud to declare my interest as a sponsored member of the National Communications Union (Engineering Section), which was formerly the Post Office Engineering Union. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) has left, as there are a couple of points that I should have liked to put to him had he been here.

I should like to put clearly on record my union's stance on interception of communications and then make a couple of points for myself. I cannot deny that interceptions are sometimes made by members of my union. The National Communications Union welcomes the Government's recognition of the need to introduce legislation in respect of the interception of communications. Indeed, it has campaigned since 1980 for a precise statutory basis for such interceptions.

In 1981, I managed to amend the British Telecommunications Bill in Committee, but when it came to the Floor of the House several hon. Members, such as the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) and the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds, who have said that they have not had an opportunity to vote for a controlled statutory basis, voted against my amendment. I have checked the Division list. They voted in favour of the Government's amendment which removed the statutory basis. It is not true to say that hon. Members who have been here since 1979 have not had an opportunity to put the interception of communications on a proper statutory basis. The then Home Secretary, who has been translated to another place, told us, "Everything is all right, lads. There is no problem. Vote this one down; we do not need it," when he knew that the Government were in trouble in the European Court of Human Rights and likely to be clobbered by the Malone judgment. I leave it to Conservative Members to examine their consciences and to consider where this new-found enthusiasm for legislation has come from. I include the Home Secretary and several others in that criticism.

My union acknowledges the important role of telephone tapping and the interception of mail in combating crime and espionage. However, it is important that there should be safeguards against the misuse of such powers, those involved being accountable to law. That is where the Bill begins to fall down. Our members take a professional pride in their work. We welcome a statutory framework which clarifies matters and assures my members' integrity in the eyes of the public. Such assurances must be called for increasingly with the privatisation of British Telecom. No longer is tapping to be carried out by a public corporation because it is now a private company.

With the liberalisation and diversification of the communications industry, which the Government have encouraged, more private companies have potentially become involved in the interception of communications. Mercury, cellular radio consortia and cable television companies have all become involved since the Telecommunications Act 1984 was passed, and with none of the safeguards that used to exist when the dear old Post Office engineers were established civil servants and subject to the discipline code of the Civil Service. They are now subject only to the profit motive of their employers.

Two significant events have increased the pressure on the Government. One is the Malone case, on which 18 judges declared unanimously that the warrant system for telephone taps authorised by the Home Secretary lacked clear safeguards and violated rights to privacy. Even before that judgment, the Government were committed to introducing legislation on this subject as there was an Opposition amendment to the 1984 Telecommunications Bill. My colleagues and I withdrew the amendment on the basis of a clear commitment that the Government would introduce proper and separate legislation that would cover the issues that my right hon. and hon. Friends have mentioned today. The Bill does not fulfil the commitment.

There is another problem, because the Bill covers only telephone tapping and the interception of mail. It does not cover surveillance techniques. All kinds of things are being used. Hon. Members have mentioned infinity taps, spike microphones, fibre-optic taps and parabolic microphones. I shall not take time exploring the merits of some of these questionable devices, but it is clear that if the Government are saying that the use of such devices will also be covered by warrant and scrutinised properly by the House they are saying, "We have been forced by the European Court of Human Rights to put some controls on, but we do not give anything for human rights." They are saying that they will determine the safeguards, which will not be subject to criticism or challenge, and that they are prepared to allow other abuses of privacy to continue.

Mr. Mikardo: It seems a quite tenable proposition that the Home Office has told MI5, "Look chaps, bad luck, we have to introduce this Bill to limit telephone tapping because we have been caught out by the European court. Don't worry, you will still be able to keep tabs on anyone you want to keep tabs on. You need fewer taps and more bugs."

Mr. McWilliam: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point. Some devices are neither a tap nor a bug, but both —for example, the infinity tap. That is inserted in a telephone which is switched on by dialling the number of the telephone and sending an ultrasonic tone down the line. The telephone does not ring, and when the last digit is dialled it turns the telephone into a microphone that can pick up all conversation in that room. In Committee on the Bill, I shall detail the history of the infinity tap. I believe that a member of the public has been deprived of his rights. He invented the infinity bug as an experiment. It was picked up by the security services when they raided his flat, and they never returned the relevant papers. He has not received a halfpenny in compensation for his invention. One has to tap the line, but it turns into a bug when it is in a telephone. There is a grey area—it is impossible to distinguish clearly between interception and surveillance. Indeed, there are a number of grey areas in this murky ground that we are now covering, but I shall not waste too much time discussing them tonight.

One of the problems is the grounds on which warrants are issued. The proposed grounds detailed in the White Paper give much scope for interpretation of the definition. For example, in the category relating to serious crime the definition includes "an offence of lesser gravity in which . . . a large number of people is involved."

Does that mean that the miners' strike and the relatively trivial offences committed would, by definition, give rise to interception of communications? When my union was in industrial dispute with British Telecom and the Government last year, interception certainly took place. As one would expect, my union members are quite good at finding out about such things and we know how to set up false pickets and other false events and then send someone along to take photographs of the police turning up with nobody else present.

It is wrong to say that interception has not happened without warrants. In addition to officially authorised taps certain official tappings do not require warrants. That derives from an institutional relationship between the police, the CID or the special branch and the Post Office —subsequently British Telecom—which was established in the Home Office circular in 1969, and was cited by L. H. Leigh in "Police Powers in England And Wales" on page 215. We know that such things have happened in the past, and the information has been published. Therefore, the remarks made by the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds and others about all taps being covered by warrant are nonsense.

The category of warrant concerned with national security includes major subversive activity and circumstances related to internal and external aspects of the nation's security. The recent concern raised by the claims by Cathy Massiter show the sensitivity and importance of a precise definition. It also highlights the problem when a Minister is given powers to interpret such definitions — for example, in the Ponting case — and the accusations, justified or not, that he or she may lay themselves open on grounds of political partiality.

The 1980 White Paper "The Interception of Communications in Great Britain" stated that warrants are renewed for one month for the police, two months for the Customs and Excise and six months for the security services. The Bill extends that to six months in all circumstances. We have not heard a word from the Home Secretary about that, so I hope that the Minister will tell us why that should be the case.

The Bill provides for an investigation by a tribunal. However, I believe that the safeguards are thoroughly inadequate. The Bill provides for five legal gentlemen on the tribunal. I make no complaint about the legal profession. I would not think about lecturing the Home Secretary on the legal profession because he is a lawyer and I am not. However, I take it ill when he lectures me about the telephone system and how to intercept it. I have spent some 20 years in the design, construction and maintenance of that system. I do not believe that the Home Secretary would recognise a bug if it jumped up and bit him, any more than I would recognise a tort if it had jam on it and I thought I could eat it.

It is no good having five lawyers, because all that they can determine is whether the paperwork is right. They cannot determine whether an interception has taken place. The Home Secretary is shaking his head. I draw attention to clause 7(3)(a), which states:

"On such an application"—

one where there is the belief that there has been an unauthorised interception—

"other than one appearing to the Tribunal to be frivolous and vexatious"— that safeguard is needed because a number of people tell me that their lines have been crackling and making strange noises, but anyone who thinks that their line is intercepted because of that is round the twist, and I assure hon. Members that if a telephone line is intercepted, the line is as clear as a bell because the first thing that is done when the line is tapped is to get rid of all faults—

"the Tribunal shall investigate."

What will it investigate first? Will it be whether there is a relevant warrant or a relevant certificate?

I accept the logic for what it is, but if the tribunal first tries to discover whether there is a warrant and then whether there is a tap without a warrant two things will happen. First, the tap will be taken off and, secondly, the Minister will be told that there is not a warrant. That is the wrong way round. The first duty of the tribunal should be to determine whether the line is intercepted. Its second duty is to determine whether there is a warrant. If it is the other way round, an official tap cannot be detected because it will have been taken off. If the taps are carried out by an unofficial agency, they will not be carried at the telephone exchange. The telephone exchange would be needed to determine whether there was a tap on a line, but unofficial agencies would not have access to the exchange. Therefore, the Bill is fundamentally flawed. I hope that the Minister will explain the logic of checking the paperwork before checking whether there is an interception. Why does he believe that checking the paperwork first will safeguard anyone?

I have had a great deal of experience in this area. I look forward to putting specific points and amendments in Committee. In 1981, in Committee stage on the British Telecommunications Bill, I made a serious and determined attempt to bring about a statutory provision that would allow telephone tapping to be legal and would protect the rights of the individual. My hon. Friend the Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) also served on that Committee and assisted me. We accepted amendments from Conservative Members and produced a compromise which provided a far better basis for the interception of communications and for the protection of the individual than this Bill provides. It did not go as far as I wanted it to go. It possibly went a shade further than Conservative Members of the Committee wanted it to go. However, when it returned from Committee to the Floor of the House it was voted down by the Government. The Government cannot now stand up with clean hands and say, "We wanted to introduce a statutory basis for the interception of communications." They do not have clean hands; they have been forced into it. The Government have taken the minimum step that they believe they have to take in order to be cleared by the European court and the European convention on human rights.

I have to remind the Government that two sections of the European convention on human rights are involved. The Government have covered section 8 fairly well. However, they have not even begun to attempt to cover section 13, which gives individuals the right of redress. Even if the Bill became law, I do not believe that it would meet the objections of the 18 judges who were involved in the Malone case, nor do I believe that the Government could depend upon it in a future case in which somebody might think that he had been deprived of his rights—I believe deliberately—because of the form of the Bill.

We shall not vote against Second Reading. The hon. and learned Member for Burton must not imply that we shall. We shall vote for the reasoned amendment and will attempt to amend the Bill in Committee to cover some of the points that both I and other Opposition Members have made. Above all, we shall try to bring the Bill fully into line with articles 8 and 13 of the European convention on human rights. The Bill does not do so at the moment.

Mr. Derek Spencer (Leicester, South): For those hon. Members who like hunting the bogey man, this subject is full of possibilities. Some right hon. and hon. Members of the Opposition have thrown themselves into the chase with all the vigour that they can command. But for those of us who are of a less neurotic disposition I believe that this topic is important and practical and that most people take as their point of departure the principle that those who seek to justify these powers have the burden of showing to everybody's satisfaction that such powers are necessary, that they are not exercised beyond the extent that is necessary and that their exercise is properly circumvented by remedies and checks. That is the gut reaction from which most people in this country start and it is not surprising that the common law contained the offence of eavesdropping which was defined as

"listening under walls or windows or under the eaves of a house and framing slanderous or mischievous tales."

Some of my political opponents on Leicester council who are currently engaged in a rate-capping campaign may find themselves embraced in that activity.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Will the hon. and learned Member give way?

Mr. Spencer: No, not at the moment.

The penalty for eavesdropping was the use of the ducking stool. Therefore, right hon. and hon. Members will not be surprised to learn that, although the gut reaction of the English common law was to institute the offence of eavesdropping, it was in fact abolished in 1967 by the Criminal Law Act of that year when misdemeanours and felonies were consigned to the shelves of legal history. I shall now give way to the hon. and learned Gentleman.

Mr. Carlile: I am most grateful to the hon. and learned Member. His history lesson is very constructive and interesting, but in the light of the experience of the common law and of the wise use in days gone by of the offence of eavesdropping, does not the hon. and learned Member agree that the Government should have learnt the lesson of history and incorporated in the Bill the recommendation of the Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure that the use of all surveillance devices by the police should be regulated by statute?

Mr. Spencer: The hon. and learned Member has already heard what my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary had to say on that point. If the hon. and learned Member speaks later, I hope that he will take the opportunity to refer to the fact that no Government have done as much as this one in drawing to the attention of the public the guidelines about surveillance under which the police now work. We are indebted to my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary for the guidelines that he made available at the end of last year which, for the first time, brought that matter before the eye of the public. The nonsense that we hear from the Opposition about this Government trying to suppress civil liberties is, I believe, the absolute reverse of the truth. No Government have done more to reveal to the public the guidelines under which the police operate in relation to surveillance, and now the Government are legislating in relation to the interception of communications.

It is a tribute to the tranquillity of our constitution that it has taken 106 years for any party to introduce legislation relating to the interception of communications. The first telephone installation took place in this country in 1879. There were seven lines. Last year there were more than 20 million lines. This Conservative Government are now introducing legislation.

We would be justified in asking, first, whether it is necessary to have this practice at all, or whether we can take the view that our society is so well ordered and tranquil that the interception of communications is not required. I believe that no reasonable person would seek to advance that proposition. Every right hon. and hon. Member of the Opposition has tonight, either expressly or by implication, accepted the need for some degree of interception of communications to be carried out by the organs of state.

I put this question fair and square to the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick): if the National Front were to go to my constituency, 25 per cent. of the constituents of which are of Asian origin, and plan a major riot and attack upon the Asian section of the community, does the hon. Member think that the Home Secretary might be entitled, if he saw fit, to authorise an interception of communications against those members of the National Front who were minded to engage in that kind of activity? I shall look forward to hearing his answer in due course. I shall take no more time to answer the first question, whether we all take as our common point of departure that in some circumstances the interception of communications is necessary. The answer must be yes.

I pass on to an area which it is more useful to investigate: and that is, whether the interception takes place in circumstances that make it strictly necessary. Certainly the evidence that we have heard today from the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) takes the wind out of the sails of those who would say that a great deal of it goes on. Obviously, there is not a great deal of it going on. According to the figures available, there are four warrants per 1 billion letters that go through the post and there are 21 warrants for every 1 million phone lines. Therefore, in purely statistical terms, the extent to which interception takes place is, as it should be, on a small scale.

Opposition Members say that the criteria in clause 2 are vague and unsatisfactory, and they seek to impugn the Bill on those grounds. That attack is difficult to sustain. The words are clear and unambiguous. The three criteria use ordinary English words that any member of the public could easily understand. The warrant must be necessary

"in the interests of national security; for the purpose of preventing or detecting serious crime; or for the purpose of safeguarding the economic well-being of the United Kingdom."

There is nothing vague about that.

As an extra line of attack, it is said that the Bill is sweeping. Certainly it is couched in general terms, but the answer to that has already been given by the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South. His speech illustrated how, right at the heart of the Home Secretary's duties, lies the exercise of discretion and judgment, which it is not easy to translate into words which will cover every conceivable eventuality. Although I followed his factual exposition of the burden which the Home Secretary has to carry, I did not go with him along the road down which he invited us to follow him when he said that the categories of cases and criteria which the Home Secretary should apply should be set out in a schedule to the Bill. That conclusion which he sought to draw was at odds with the premise that he had earlier laid down.

The answer to the second question, whether the interception takes place only in circumstances which make it necessary, has been affirmatively given by the Opposition.

That leaves us with only the last question: are the safeguards adequate for instances where interception takes place? That is what the Bill is all about. It introduces, for the first time, a new criminal offence of unauthorised tapping. That is quite new in our law. Surely it must be calculated to deter those people who are contemplating unauthorised tapping.

[Mr. Spencer]

Clause 7 is drawn in wide terms. It is purely subjective. If any member of the public believes that his phone has been tapped in an unauthorised manner, he can complain to the tribunal, which has available to it the various powers that are given under the Bill. It would be open for the tribunal to call for papers to see whether the original warrant complied with the criteria set out in clause 2. That is an effective check upon the exercise of ministerial discretion.

An hon. Member sought to attack the Bill on the grounds that the tribunal is comprised only of lawyers. Being a lawyer myself I would be the first to say that they are by no means perfect. They have a range of defects. But for the most part they do not have any special defects. Those that they have tend to mirror those of a cross-section of the community.

The important thing is that, in the Klass case, the European Court of Human Rights considered the position in West Germany where the supervisory system is not a judicial one. It said that in its view the best supervisory system was comprised of judicial personnel. In setting up such a tribunal in this Bill we are surpassing the German model and complying with the exhortation that came from the European Court of Human Rights in the Klass case.

This is a workmanlike Bill. It is a balanced and common sense approach to the problem. If there is any threat by Big Brother, he will hereafter be more of a bogey man and less of a reality.

8.37 pm

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): My interest in this debate is that it is one of the few occasions—I cannot recall another one—when we have had a debate on the security services. If we are to discuss the security services, we should look at the threat. We must analyse with clinical precision what it is that the security services are there to protect Britain from.

I do not think that any hon. Member would disagree with the proposition that the security services are there to protect us from violence, from abroad or at home, or from crime. But there is a substantial difference between criminal and violent actions and radical opinions. This Bill —this is why it is so important that we should debate it —deliberately fudges the difference between the two.

It is a bad Bill. Clause 2 gives a blank cheque to the Home Secretary to tap or intercept any telephone call. But what is most offensive to me about the Bill is that it was introduced and supported with soothing words implying that in our most perfect of all perfect democratic worlds there is very little interception of telephone calls. Indeed, when the Home Secretary introduced the Bill, in a speech that was as soothing as it was deceptive — indeed, misleading — in character, he said that there was no change in the status quo.

Therefore, I want to begin by bringing such experience as I have had as a former Postmaster General, Minister of Technology and Cabinet Minister for many years to bear on what happens. We should know what happens. The reality is that for many centuries the Government of the day have maintained a continuous interception and surveillance of all their critics. Indeed, the Royal Mail was set up in 1660 because the king had to be able to open everybody's letters to know who was writing to whom about what. The prerogative of the Crown, which, until this Bill, was the sole authority for interception, goes back to that. Those who have read 19th century Labour history will know about Oliver the spy, and will know that the state has always had agents provocateurs who have operated mainly in the Labour movement.

Today, I received an extract from Hansard through the post. I did not pick it out myself, but it is dated 2 July 1925. The then hon. Member for Leith, Captain Wedgwood Benn, asked the Home Secretary

"what general rules govern the attendance of secret police at meetings; on what subjects they are asked to report; and whether they are employed to register in general opinions expressed, or whether their duties are limited to the prevention of crime and of the advocacy of crime?"

Sir William Joynson-Hicks replied:

"It is the duty of the police to obtain all the information they can with regard to the aims and projects of revolutionaries, in order that they may inform His Majesty's Government on the subject and be forearmed against any attempts to put such projects into effect. It is impossible to state categorically the means by which this duty can best be discharged, and even if it were possible, it would not be in the public interest to do so."

The hon. Member for Leith, who happened to be my father, then said:

"Could the right hon. Gentleman say clearly whether the purpose of these secret police visits is to register opinions or to prevent the advocacy of violence? That is the question".

The Home Secretary replied:

"The object of police attendance at any particular meeting is to inform me of what takes places at that particular meeting; and if there are revolutionary sentiments or revolutionary projects discussed at that meeting, it would then be my duty to see that they are not carried into effect." — [Official Report, 2 July 1925; Vol. 185, c. 2778-9.]

At least that was honest. The Home Secretary then said that he was going to send secret police to meetings to tell him what was said. That has been the basis of Government surveillance and of the interception of all telephone calls and other communications ever since then. It would be ludicrous for one party to try to gain an advantage over another, and so I must say in all fairness that what we are discussing has gone on under all Governments, with very little difference between them. Anyone who has read Barbara Castle's diaries will know that she reports in them that the security services from time to time reported to her about the attitude of trade union leaders.

When I recommended Jack Jones, who was one of the pillars of the Labour Government in the support that he gave to our incomes policy and so on, as a possible chairman of the National Enterprise Board, Box 500 told me that he was subversive. Actually, he did not want the job anyway. Hugh Scanlon was described as subversive.

Anyone who thinks that the supervision, surveillance, bugging and tapping of trade union leaders has not gone on under other Governments is misleading himself. It is important that we should be honest with ourselves and with the public, as otherwise no one will believe a word that we say.

Harold Wilson, who had an absolute obsession with Communists and particularly with Trotskyites, used to boast of the amount of surveillance that he undertook. I think that it is right—at least I feel an obligation—to tell those who do not know it that if they are Communists, read the Morning Star, Militant or the Socialist Worker, or if they are active in strikes, are perhaps members of Friends of the Earth, hunt saboteurs or engaged in, say, the activities of the Animal Liberation Front, they will be watched, bugged, intercepted and listened to, because that has been the practice of successive Governments.

To the best of my knowledge, I never met Harry Newton, but on the assumption that Catherine Massiter spoke the truth, he was recruited from the Communist party and was engaged in penetrating CND or whatever for 30 years — and I cannot see why Catherine Massiter should not have spoken the truth—in acting as an agent provocateur, and in encouraging people to do things that they would not otherwise want to do. Thus, if we are told that we are maintaining the status quo, we should be clear what it is.

I come to an important point that has so far been missed. I am glad that my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) is here. All the talk about security is about the Home Secretary. But security in Britain is controlled by the Prime Minister. My right hon. Friend is one of the very few people—and he may be unique—who has occupied three great offices of state, or four if one includes the Treasury. He has been Foreign Secretary in charge of MI6, Home Secretary in charge of MI5 and Prime Minister in charge of the lot. When discussing security, the most important thing is to know that it goes back to No. 10 Downing Street. I am not even sure—and I wondered when I listened to my right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees), who was once Home Secretary—how far Home Secretaries always know what is happening in security, or how much Prime Ministers tell Home Secretaries and Foreign Secretaries.

I recall one occasion in 1966 when I had a particularly sensitive nuclear secret that I had to take to the Prime Minister. He told me not to tell the Foreign Secretary, who was then George Brown. I can quite understand why he said, "Don't tell him," but the fact remains that the Prime Minister said to me, "Whatever you do, don't tell the head of MI6 what you've told me about this particular nuclear secret."

The question whether we are propping up or undermining parliamentary democracy arises because this whole security business rests on the use of an undiminished mediaeval prerogative. Indeed, I made that point in the Belgrano debate. The Prime Minister has the power, and so has the Home Secretary under his authority, to intercept, and to define national security and then to keep secret what is done. It is important to make that point.

I made my next point in the Belgrano debate too, because the issues are comparable. It is important that the country should know that British intelligence is wholly integrated with, and subordinated to, United States intelligence, which supervises and controls our intelligence service. Anyone who has followed this issue — perhaps my interest stems from many years as a Minister with nuclear responsibilities—knows that what is called the special relationship with America, and is often referred to at Pilgrims' dinners and on formal occasions, in fact means that in return for American intelligence supervising our intelligence and obtaining information from our intelligence about our "subversives", the Americans let us have access to their military and nuclear technology.

Therefore, we are not special or free agents. As I said in the debate on the Belgrano, the decision to ban trade unions from GCHQ was part of the price paid for that special intelligence relationship. Indeed, there is an inner, inner Official Secrets Act that Ministers have to sign, over and above their general responsibilities, if they are to be allowed to have access to United States intelligence.

In the light of that, I come to the criteria in the Bill. Those set out in clause 2(2)(b) about crime are wholly acceptable. Who could possibly object to a Home Secretary deciding, in anticipation of some serious crime, to put a bug or a tap on communications? But clause 2(2)(a) and (c) about national security and economic well-being is entirely discretionary in character. There is no objective test that could be applied.

I have mentioned the question whether the Bill upholds or undermines parliamentary democracy, because the whole purpose of Parliament is to discuss and decide what is in the interest of the nation in terms of security, and what is in the interest of the nation in terms of its economic well-being. The democratic process is determined on polling day and then reflected in subsequent votes in Parliament. But once national security and economic well-being are abstracted from that, and are withdrawn into the prerogative, and once it is said that those are matters for the Prime Minister to decide, then the very parliamentary democracy that the system is allegedly being used to defend is undermined.

Arguments about national security must be central to a free debate. Let us take the argument of whether our national security is improved or harmed by nuclear weapons. I shall not go into the arguments in detail, because this is not the time or place for that. But there are those—including the Secretary of State for Defence and the Prime Minister—who believe quite sincerely that we must have nuclear weapons with which to defend the security of the country. Others, including me, believe that the presence of American nuclear bases which can be used to fire nuclear weapons without the consent of the British Government, is a threat to national security. It is impossible to take that out of the debate and to say that that is something which, if the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary so determine, justifies bugging. That would destroy Parliament.

As to economic well-being——

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way.

Mr. Benn: I shall not give way, as I should like to develop my point. I am trying to be non-controversial. I am making a constitutional point, and I ask Conservative Members to consider the following. If a Government were elected which Conservative Members did not like, and used those powers, and said for example that monetarism was damaging the economic well-being of the country and that the telephones of monetarists, stockbrokers and anyone engaged in closing a factory here and opening one in South Africa could be tapped, they would not like it. The House should be careful that it does not give too much power to the executive. Although the words look lovely to a Thatcherite Government, they might not look so lovely to the Conservative party if these powers were in the hands of those who fundamentally disagreed with its philosophy.

One cannot fall back on the final defence that the measure is to protect parliamentary democracy. Many of the keenest and most important debates in our history have been about parliamentary democracy. I looked up one of my favourite quotations from 6 July 1831. Sir Robert Peel, who opposed the Reform Bill, warned that even a limited extension of the franchise was contrary to our parliamentary traditions. He said:

[Mr. Benn]

"I am convinced that it is not founded on the acknowledged principles of the constitution — because it does not give security to the prerogative of the Crown—because it does not guarantee the legitimate rights, influences and privileges of both Houses of Parliament".

The case against the Reform Bill was mounted on the grounds that it would undermine parliamentary government.

Mr. Asquith, who opposed votes for women in 1910, argued the same case, and said that if Parliament gave votes to women, it would undermine parliamentary democracy. I warn the House to be extremely careful not to allow national security, economic well-being or a definition of what parliamentary democracy is to be subtracted from the public arena, the Chamber, and handed over to secret decisions by a Home Secretary and Prime Minister surrounded by security officers. If one did that, one would undermine the parliamentary democracy that we are supposed to be protecting.

The proper handling of the matter should include a full inquiry into the security services by a Select Committee and detailed discussion about what is subversive. As I said earlier, there is a subversion of violence or the planning of crimes of violence which is clear, but radical personal conviction is not the same as subversion. To argue that those who hold an unpopular view are by virtue of their view or membership of an organisation subversive, is a dangerous doctrine. That is true of the Right and the Left. There must also be accountability for operations undertaken by the security services afterwards under the proper protection of either Privy Councillors or a parliamentary Committee. The Americans have that and there is no reason why we should not have it.

I am deeply worried that the Prime Minister, who loosely used the term "enemies within" to cover everything from the IRA to the National Union of Mineworkers, is building a public argument to give herself that power in the guise of national security or economic well-being. She is giving herself the power to watch and control everybody, and for the first time that power is to be put in statute form as well as used as a prerogative.

To put it bluntly and simply, the Prime Minister, Ministers and security services who support the Bill are endangering the democracy that they pretend to defend. Because Governments of all parties act in that way, surveillance, interception, bugging, tapping and agent provocateur work will continue under any Government. It always has done and always will do.

However, we must safeguard our liberties. Sarah Tisdall, Clive Ponting and Cathy Massiter are people from within the service who were moved by their consciences against what they were asked to do. The ultimate safeguard of our liberties does not rest with the Home Secretary, the head of MI5 or any of the officials who work in it, but with those who are committed by conscience to their convictions: those outside who campaign for change, and those inside who have the integrity to differentiate between what they are asked to do and what they know is right. Our safeguards rest with them, not in this place, in Acts of Parliament, in judicial inquiries or with lawyers, who are paid, I fear, to say almost anything. Our safeguards lie with the basic integrity of people who argue their case from conviction and those inside Government who will not be the tools of a police state.

Those thoughts should be on our minds when we debate the Bill in Committee. On reflection, the Conservative party may conclude that it has as much to lose from the subtraction of legislative power and its transmission back to the executive, as have the Opposition.

Mr. Stefan Terlezki (Cardiff, West): I believe that the Bill is most important for national security, the well-being of our great country and, indeed, the national economy.

I am worried that some Opposition Members attack and criticise the interception and surveillance of organisations such as the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament and of extremists, and say that militant leaders of trade unions must never be interfered with. They also say that the leaders of Militant Tendency, Trotskyites, Marxists, crypto-Communists and Fascists should never be interfered with and should be left alone.

As a taxpayer and one who believes in freedom, democracy and the well-being of the economy, I should be horrified and appalled if extremists, Trotskyites and organisations which might damage our economy, policies and the political freedom of this House were allowed to get away with it, and to pursue their destructive activities against my country. They should not be allowed to undermine the economy and our national security, or be a threat to freedom. I would be worried about that. Therefore, I agree with and respect the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan), who spoke wisely and helpfully in the debate.

Of course we all accept that phone tapping is a frightening intrusion into the privacy of the individual and that it must be controlled and supervised carefully and rigorously to ensure that we do not fall into the category of interrogation, as some of us have experienced in our lives. Governments of all parties have authorised, through their Home Secretaries and Foreign Secretaries, the tapping of a limited number of telephone lines. Now, for the first time, an independent tribunal will be established to provide effective protection of the individual, which will have the power to do a job effectively for the benefit of our citizens. Interception is authorised only when the Secretary of State considers that it is justified for the prevention or detection of serious crime or to safeguard national security. The maintenance of the economic well-being and the security of our country must be paramount.

The authorisation of the interception of communications as a means of finding out some of the secrets of criminals and terrorists engaged in dangerous activities must be carefully pursued. Regrettably, Britain is suffering from the activities of the most highly organised criminal gangs, especially in drug trafficking, that we have ever encountered. The ruthlessness and violence of criminals and terrorists are increasing. There is a constant threat from terrorism which has resulted in many callous and indiscriminate murders, and it is no secret that our national security is constantly at risk because of the activities of foreign spies and their treacherous stooges who have infiltrated our security network. They are the apparatchiks who, in co-operation, regrettably, with born and bred British people, are trying to undermine the security and freedom of our country. I regret that very much.

The Government would put innocent lives at risk if they were to deny the police those essential powers. Every Government must ensure the safety of their citizens and the security of the country, and all previous Governments have done so. Regrettably, the Labour party today is different from the Labour party of the past. The organisations and fringe bodies that have latched on to the Labour party contain individuals who are more concerned with wrecking the nation than with promoting alternative democratic policies and protecting freedom and democracy. We should ask ourselves the straightforward question: does the controlled use of phone tapping prevent terrorist outrages, convict major drug traffickers or identify traitors seeking to undermine our security? If the answer is yes, I am convinced that we must support the Government and the Bill, because it is the best safeguard that we can have.

9.3 pm

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): The Bill is being debated against a background of serious allegations about the security services. During the past few weeks, we have been informed—it has not been contradicted in any way — that leading trade unionists, leading campaigners for nuclear disarmament and other such people have been the victims of state harassment. That is why it is important that adequate provision is made to protect the civil liberties of our people. The Bill has been harshly and rightly criticised from the Labour Benches because it is completely inadequate.

Many people are bound to ask: how useful is the proposed tribunal when that body will be able to decide only whether interception has been properly authorised? It will not be able to give all the reasons why authorisation was given in the first place. The Home Secretary told the House two or three weeks ago that anyone who has suspicions about telephone interceptions can refer them to the tribunal, which will have access to relevant information and can establish whether there has been interception, authorised or not, and whether, if the interception was authorised, that authorisation was properly given. In other words, at most it will be the remit which was given to Lord Bridge. That will certainly not answer the complaints of people who have every reason to believe that their telephones are being tapped.

As I have stated, the tribunal will not be in a position to go into all the factors that have led to the authorisation being given. If I understand the Bill correctly, the tribunal will not be able to tell somebody that his or her telephone has been tapped if an authorisation has duly been given. What safeguard is that to the people whom I mentioned, be it the chairperson of the CND or an official of a trade union? They will make their complaints to a tribunal, but they are not likely to get much satisfaction. That sort of harassment is not likely to come to an end. Is it any wonder, therefore, that we are critical of the Bill?

I do not deny—nor, I assume, would my right hon. and hon. Friends — that there are occasions when interception, as in criminal cases, can be justified. It is not part of my argument to say that in no circumstances is interception unnecessary. However, it should be kept to the very minimum. I also accept that there are cases where, in the defence of the realm and of security, there are justified reasons for it.

Labour Members who serve on the Select Committee on Home Affairs have been concerned about the guidelines on subversive activities in the course of the public sessions. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) that these matters have been going on for some time. The present guidelines were issued in February 1975 by Lord Harris, then a Labour Minister of State at the Home Office. The guidelines state:

> "Subversive activities are generally regarded as those which threaten the safety or well-being of the State and which are intended to undermine or overthrow Parliamentary democracy by political, industrial or violent means."

"Political means" can have a pretty wide interpretation by the security service and special branch. I am convinced that those guidelines are far too wide and that, as long as they remain, the kind of abuses will occur about which we have been hearing, and which concern certainly Labour Members if not Conservative Members. If we are properly to safeguard our citizens, the guidelines given to the security service must be considerably tightened up.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield, speaking as a former Cabinet Minister, in a frank speech said that these practices have been going on for a long time. Indeed, he took us back, and rightly so, to past centuries and to the way in which Governments have used spies, agents provocateurs and so on. I am sure, however, that some of the practices that went on in the 1970s have been widely extended in recent years. It may well be that other Governments intend to act in the same way. The difference lies in the attitude of Labour and Conservative Back Benchers.

Labour Members, even if our party were in government, on seeing a film like "MI5's Official Secrets" would be deeply concerned, as we are now. We would be no less concerned because our own Government were in office. But there does not seem to be much concern on the Conservative Benches. That is why, when the hon. Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw) in an intervention in Home Office questions the other week said to the Home Secretary—without qualifying it—that if such people as CND and the rest—this is clearly what he meant—were not being investigated, he wanted a refund of his money, Conservative Members roared with laughter. I do not consider it amusing. It should not be part of our duty to permit the sort of abuses that have occurred and which clearly should be brought to an end.

Consider, for example, the film "MI5's Official Secrets" which was originally banned and which, perhaps because of pressure and the fact that no prosecutions were to take place, was shown on Channel 4 last Friday. No Minister has said that the facts depicted in the film were incorrect. Like other hon. Members, I knew nothing of Miss Massiter before the film was made.

If Miss Massiter is genuine—I have no reason to believe otherwise—and if she has no motivation other than what she stated on television, what she said should concern hon. Members in all parts of the House. If agents of the state—she was employed of course by MI5—are harassing law-abiding citizens, who certainly believe in parliamentary democracy and so on, she is to be congratulated on performing a service to the state. We should know about abuses that have occurred.

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe): The hon. Gentleman suggests that Conservative Members, particularly Back Benchers, are not concerned and have expressed levity about the matter. Is it not a fact that the Government have introduced this legislation because of incidents that arose in the Malone case, those incidents having occurred during the lifetime of the last Labour

[Mr. Richard Hickmet]

Government? Is it not also a fact that the ruling of the European court as much as anything else stimulated the presentation of the Bill?

Mr. Winnick: It is clear that the Government have been forced into it by the European Court. I do not believe that they would have acted otherwise.

Consider the case of the late Mr. Harry Newton. It is understandable that his widow and some of his friends are concerned about allegations that have been made. The Home Secretary should clear the issue up one way or the other. I tabled a question on the subject and asked—so far as I was able, because of restrictions at the Table Office—

"if the late Mr. Harry Newton was given any sums of public money."

The answer that I received yesterday from the Home Secretary was:

"I understand that certain allegations have been made about the existence of links between Mr. Newton, the security service and special branches. It is not the practice to comment on allegations of this nature."

Why not? Mr. Newton is dead. Let us have the facts and get the matter cleared up once and for all. If he was planted as a spy in an organisation such as CND, we should be told why that action was taken. If Conservative Members are concerned for civil liberties, they will share my sentiments on matters such as that.

It may interest the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths), who acts for the Police Federation, to recall the story in The Observer a week last Sunday in which it was stated that a former editor of the CND journal had been interviewed about leading people in CND. The Home Secretary reminded us today that CND is a lawful organisation and we know it is not illegal, even under the present Government, to campaign for unilateral nuclear disarmament. I could not get much joy in response to a question that I asked the Home Secretary on the subject. The right hon. and learned Gentleman responded to my question about the editor of the CND journal:

"I am assured by the commissioner that no inquiries have been initiated by the Metropolitan police special branch outside the terms of those guidelines."—[Official Report, 11 March 1985; Vol. 77, c. 27-28.]

I quoted from the guidelines. If it is true, why on earth should the special branch ask a former editor of the CND journal questions about the people in CND, about their private lives and the leadership style of the general secretary? What on earth have such investigations got to do with national security? Conservative Members say that we are in a state of paranoia over these matters, but surely we have every reason to be concerned.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths: I will try to answer the hon. Gentleman's rhetorical question, which he prefaced by saying "If it is true". The reason why it might well be perfectly reasonable to interview the editor of the journal —or, indeed, the editor of Conservative Monthly News —is that any Soviet agent within this country who is worth his salt would try as hard as he could — perhaps he would fail—to penetrate organisations like the CND in order to achieve his own purpose. It must be right for the security service to keep an eye on that.

Mr. Winnick: I think that the hon. Gentleman, on reflection, will recognise what a feeble response that was. It is interesting to note that no allegation has been made that the editor of Conservative Monthly News, or whatever it is — it is not a journal that I read — has been interviewed in any way. What the hon. Gentleman is saying in effect is that it is perfectly all right for the police to interview people and probe into organisations. So where is the end of it, where is the limit?

Mr. Eldon Griffiths rose——

Mr. Winnick: No, I will not give way.

I believe that all these matters which my hon. Friends and myself have spoken about should give rise to concern about the way in which civil liberties in this country are being seriously infringed.

There is a reference in the Bill to safeguarding the economic well-being of the United Kingdom. I doubt whether leading companies in this country which invest abroad, undermining our manufacturing industry and creating a great deal of unemployment in our constituencies, are the object of any investigation by the security service or the special branch.

This Bill is hardly likely to meet our concern about civil liberties and the way the freedom of law-abiding people is being undermined as a result of the guidelines and the lack of concern on the part of the Home Secretary and other Ministers. Perhaps there are some people in security and in MI5 — I hope not many — whose belief in parliamentary democracy is not all that strong. Perhaps there are those who believe that this House is just a talking shop and that there is no reason why we should be debating security.

It is all the more necessary that the security service and all the rest have some parliamentary accountability. I do not question the need to safeguard genuine security but, to the extent that these political abuses occur and continue to occur, the security service will undoubtedly become the object of criticism and hostility. So, in its own interest there is a good case for some parliamentary accountability.

Civil liberties are one of the reasons for the existence of this House. First and foremost it is our job to ensure the freedom of our citizens. Tory Members speak a great deal about that but in practice they do not seem in any way concerned about the allegations that have been made concerning the security service and the special branch. As I see it, our job is at all times to safeguard civil liberties. If the civil liberties of the general secretary and the chairperson of CND, and of leading trade unionists, are being undermined by probing, telephone tapping and all the rest of it, we must try to rectify the situation. It is my view that the Bill before us today is a miserable substitute for the real protection of civil liberties.

Mr. D. E. Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): One of the most remarkable features of the debate has been that we have heard parts of the memoirs of at least three Cabinet Ministers. It is important for us to have those clear statements in the House of what goes on in the procedures of Government.

Surely the major problem that we have to face in the Bill is the expected failure of the Government to produce what they intended to produce, as set out in their White Paper. In paragraph 7 of the White Paper the Government say that their aim in introducing legislation is "to provide a clear statutory framework within which the interception of communications on public systems will be authorised and controlled in a manner commanding public confidence."

It is clear from what we have heard in the debate—I endorse everything that the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) has just said — that the Government have totally failed to produce legislation that provides anything like a clear statutory framework. I shall go into a little detail on some of the wording in a moment.

The Government have also failed to produce anything that can command public confidence. This has been admitted on the Conservative Benches. It is clear that the security services themselves are in a crisis of confidence. We have not seen—certainly not in recent years—such criticism of the security services from a broad spread of the media as we have seen in the past three or four weeks. When the Bill was originally published, most of the leading papers were extremely critical of its failure to produce the safeguards that it set out to produce. I endorse those criticisms of the contents of the Bill.

The Bill fails completely from its inception in dealing with the issues at stake. It is called the Interception of Communications Bill. In reality, as we have heard from many Opposition Members, only certain communications are covered. There is coverage of only one form of interception—in the telephone system. The broad area of invasion through bugging devices, directional microphones and all the other forms of surveillance is not covered.

There was a famous incident in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) at Talysarn when a whole community was bugged by the security services because a bug was placed in the telephone kiosk. It was only through people in the community surveying the activity of the security services that the bug was discovered. No explanation, adequate or otherwise, has been forthcoming from the chief constable of north Wales or the Home Secretary about the intention of that bugging. That incident gave rise to a popular song in the Welsh language, which I shall not quote tonight.

Such incidents show the way in which the community has been sensitised to the surveillance upon it. Such sensitising of the community to surveillance, as in the famous Talysarn incident, has happened throughout Britain in recent weeks, as the "20:20 Vision" programme, on which I congratulate the producers and all those who appeared on it, reminded us. It reminded us of the reality of control of dissent in our society. The Bill is part of the control of dissent. It deals with a limited attempt to intervene with a small aspect of the communications network, but by doing that and not dealing within a statutory framework with the rest of the surveillance of communications it fails to put the surveillance of communications on a democratic basis. There is no new accountability in the form of surveillance.

In clause 2(2) we are given the three reasons for the issue of a warrant for surveillance by the Secretary of State. They are the interests of national security, preventing or detecting serious crime, and safeguarding the economic well-being of the United Kingdom. Nowhere in the Bill or the debate have we had a definition of what those terms mean. At the end of some of the longer Bills that we have discussed, detailed schedules have contained definitions of precisely what the wording meant.

There has been no attempt in the Bill or the White Paper to define exactly what the interests of national security are. However, in the White Paper there have been some attempts in paragraphs 20 and 21 to define what serious offences are. As we have already heard from successive Home Secretaries, national security is defined by each Home Secretary. The right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) said that it should be for the Home Secretary of the day to produce a definition of subversion. In my 11 years in the House, the category of subversion has been extended gradually.

There is no definition of serious crime or of national security in the Bill. However, paragraph 20 of the White Paper says:

"Interception will be authorised only if the offence is one for which a person with no previous criminal record could reasonably be expected to be sentenced to three years' imprisonment; or is an offence of lesser gravity in which either a large number of people is involved, or there is good reason to apprehend the use of violence, or in which the financial rewards of success are very large."

In regard to a serious offence and the involvement of large numbers of people, I want to compare the form of words used with what is in the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. It categorises criminal offences into offences involving arrests with a warrant, arrests without a warrant, which are arrestable offences, and serious arrestable offences. The gravest of these is a "serious arrestable offence" which includes offences which cause "serious harm to the security of the State or to public order". In the context of the White Paper and the Bill, will serious offences include the same kinds of serious offences as are defined in that section of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act? If so, and if the involvement of a large number of people in an offence of lesser gravity is a category which would authorise interception, any mass demonstration organised by anyone in the United Kingdom becomes immediately a subject of surveillance.

I go further. In one of his most revealing answers, the Secretary of State for Defence, who has made many revealing answers in the House not so much by what he has said but by the style in which he has said it, told those of us who questioned him about the successful battle of Molesworth that the reason that the police, the military police and the Royal Engineers were used against the peace movement was to anticipate and prevent mass civil disobedience.

No doubt it is part of the Government's strategy in preventing dissent to prevent those who disagree with their policies from gathering together and organising themselves in dissent. As we have seen throughout the mining dispute, demonstrations, picketing and the movement of demonstrators and trade unionists were all subject to various forms of surveillance. At the beginning of the dispute in south Wales there was a celebrated case in which buses which had been hired by the National Union of Mineworkers were followed. This could have happened only as a result of the tapping of telephones of private bus operators in south Wales. All forms of demonstration against the Government could be categorised as serious offences which would be subject to surveillance.

Another category concerns me. There has been reference in the debate to warrants issued by the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs. We have heard a little about warrants issued by the Home Secretary. Under the Bill, a warrant can be issued on grounds of national security in support of the Government's defence and foreign policies. We should be told more about the use of warrants in this category. As the Bill proceeds, we shall ask further questions on that. Does it refer merely to warrants issued by the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary in respect of the activities of MI6, or are we talking of the use of warrants against people who do not support the Government's defence and foreign policies? It is important for us to understand what that category is. Here again, the self-definition of national security by the state is being broadened in a way that undermines democracy.

The Bill does not cover the reality of the surveillance that is going on. It pretends to give us a structure of accountability, whereas in reality it gives us no such structure. This has been true of the history of the argument about telecommunications surveillance in Britain. We have always been given inadequate figures. For example, last year 354 warrants were issued by the Home Secretary. We are never told how many of these warrants apply to individuals and how many to organisations.

Clearly the House would accept that paramilitary organisations dedicated to political violence should have blanket surveillance. However, there is no argument for a blanket warrant for surveillance of people who are members of legal, democratic organisations whose objectives are open and whose activities and forms of action are open just because certain individuals in the organisation are members of political parties that are apparently subversive.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): If these organisations are known to have as members activists who regularly and constantly break the law, should they not be under some surveillance?

Mr. Thomas: I do not know what organisations the hon. Gentleman is referring to. Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting, as I think that he is, that CND is an organisation that is subversive because it dissents from the Government's defence policy? That is the kind of thinking that is motivating Conservative Members and many people in the security service.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest) rose——

Mr. Thomas: I shall not give way, as I must finish my speech.

We have to face up to a Government who are increasingly intent on targeting various forms of dissent. For some reason, the Communist party, which is a democratic party, is regarded as a subversive organisation. In the case of my friend John Cox, a vice-president of the CND and a long-time activist in the peace movement in Wales, his membership of the Communist party is apparently, according to Cathy Massiter in the "20:20 Vision" programme, sufficient reason for the Home Secretary to grant a warrant to have his phone tapped.

It is important that we should know what categories of people and organisations the Home Secretary is prepared to allow to be used in this way. If the practice that is being made legitimate in this Bill is the practice of tapping the telephone of a person such as John Cox, democratic politics in Britain are being undermined by the Government's activities.

9.32 pm

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): As chairman of the parliamentary home affairs group, I wish to make it clear that we accept the need for interception of telephone calls and mail. Attempts from Conservative Benches to smear the Labour party and pretend that it is anti-police do not deserve serious treatment.

While we acknowledge the need for a Bill, this Bill does not do the job that it should set out to do. There are not the safeguards that the Home Secretary pretended. For example, with the proposed tribunal, who says that it is only five lawyers who have the wit and the wisdom to do the job? Why does the commissioner have to be appointed by the Prime Minister and report to the Prime Minister alone? If the Government are allegedly going down the road of more open government, why can they not go a step further and acknowledge the strength of the case for a special Select Committee, in line with that which oversees the work of the Ombudsman, to oversee the work of the commissioner proposed in the Bill?

I must explain to Conservative Members that one does not have to be paranoid to believe that it is possible for MI5 and the special branch—out of enthusiasm or something worse—to make mistakes and to step over the limit. In a constituency adjoining my own, there was the case involving Mrs. Madeline Haigh who wrote a letter to the newspapers protesting about the plan to bring in cruise missiles. As a result, flat-footed special branch officers came to crawl all over her house, play around with her telephone and knock on her door. The chief constable made a misstatement to the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Fowler) but, when the complaint was persisted with, he acknowledged that the officers had gone over the top.

In the film "MI5's Official Secrets" it was alleged that the application for the tap on the telephone of Mr. John Cox, the vice-president of CND, gave the reason that Mr. Cox was a long-term member of the Communist party and prominent in CND, and that it was desired to investigate his contacts and activities in order to ascertain whether the Communist party was manipulating CND in a clandestine manner.

The Home Secretary has assured us more than once, at the Dispatch Box and in evidence to the Home Affairs Select Committee, that mere membership of a lawful organisation that opposes the views of the current Government is not enough to justify him in signing a warrant for interference with telephone or written communications. I do not doubt that Government Members accept that view. In that case, why did the Home Secretary, in August 1983, allegedly authorise the tap on the telephone of Mr. John Cox?

Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones (Lord Commissioner to the Treasury): Because he was a Communist.

Mr. Corbett: The hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways. The Home Secretary has told us that mere membership of a lawful organisation is not enough to justify surveillance. Moreover, even if someone is suspected of being a subversive — if that is what membership of the Communist party means—there is the other test to be applied before the Home Secretary should sign the warrant.

According to the allegations in the film, the information collected as a result of the signing of the warrant was passed to the DS19 unit in the Ministry of Defence, which has been set up to counter the activities of CND. For the first time, a Government stand charged with misusing the security services for purely party political ends. The Government would do well to lay that allegation to rest. If it is untrue, it will cost the Government nothing to say so. My right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) made the point that, had he been Prime Minister, he would have jumped very smartly on the setting up of such a political unit in one of the great Departments of State.

One does not have to be paranoid to believe that things can go wrong. Little has been said about the interception of mail. I wish briefly to refer to some of the allegations. We know that, in London, intercepted mail goes to Union house at St. Martin's-le-Grand. Last year, CND had planned to hold a demonstration in London in June. They contracted with the Post Office beforehand to distribute some 76,000 items of mail to CND members. The Post Office agreed to a final delivery date of 31 May, but CND later received 100 letters from members complaining about the late arrival of mail. In some areas, the mail was not received until, on average, 21 June—more than a fortnight after the demonstration. We cannot dismiss all these people as mad—there are more than 100 of them. We should know because hon. Members get more mail than many people, that it is extremely rare to get a damaged piece of mail, but more than 100 members of CND did.

A standard letter to a national council member of CND in Northumberland, postmarked 14 September 1984, was received unsealed and with the flap open. A second letter, posted by the social services department in Bradford on 13 September 1984 was received torn open and unsealed. A letter to another national council member, who happens to be a general practitioner in Gloucester, was posted on 21 August 1984. It was the campaign newsletter mailing and it was received slit down one side, although the contents were intact. Another GP in Nottingham received a letter which was slit down the side. A second letter from an hon. Member was received on 8 September 1984, torn and readdressed from Huddersfield post office. It is no good saying these things cannot happen or that all the people involved are liars or worse. Because people in MI5 and the special branch can get over-enthusiastic, we ought to tread carefully when laying down a lawful basis for interception.

Group secretaries of CND in Salford and Manchester have reported:

"for the fourth time in one month packages from CND have been ripped open by the time they reach us".

An organiser of Christian CND in London received on 23 November 1984 a National Westminster bank statement which bore a post office damage label and had been resealed at the back of the envelope. When the recipient queried that with the bank, the manager said that the statement was sent out in good order.

Earlier today, my right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees), a former Home Secretary, said outside the House that when he was Home Secretary he did not authorise telephone taps on the headquarters of the Fire Brigades Union during its dispute. I accept what he says, but people working in those headquarters believe that they have evidence of their telephone being tapped. One alleged in the "20:20 Vision" film that, on picking up the receiver to make a telephone call, played back into his ear was a conversation that he had had on that telephone a little earlier. Why should my right hon. Friend lie? Something is going on behind the Home Secretary. Some in the security services are acting without his consent.

Tim and Bridie Wallis live near Molesworth and object to the Government's nuclear defence policy. They have a perfect right to object to it. As the Home Secretary has said several times, there is nothing illegal about that. On 31 January, someone dialled the Wallises' home number. After obtaining first the engaged tone and then the unobtainable tone—that would not happen now after privatisation—the caller was finally connected to an answerphone which said:

"This is Tim and Bridie Wallis's number. We are out at the moment. Please leave your name, address and phone number and we will ring you back".

Asked to leave his address on the answerphone? He rang the Wallises' number twice more during a period of five days and each time got the answerphone. The voice on the answerphone was described as male, with an Americanised accent. The caller did not know Tim Wallis well, but knew that he spoke with an American accent. He therefore assumed that it was Tim's voice on the machine. The Wallises report that the telephone regularly rings once or twice and then stops before they can answer it.

I could give a list of people who have lawfully monitored cruise missile exercises around Greenham common but have found telephones out of order when they go to make a second or subsequent telephone call. We accept the need for surveillance—unfortunately—but this House must meet the genuine complaints of those engaged in perfectly lawful activities.

9.45 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): A meeting was held in the county building at Linlithgow yesterday, sponsored by West Lothian district council, in which the National Coal Board, the NUM, NACODS and Lothian regional council members took part. I was asked a specific question about a specific statement that appeared in a well researched article by Nick Davies in The Observer on Sunday. It stated:

"the new direction of F Branch has forced MI5 officers to twist the definition of subversion in order to justify the new choice of targets"— in a manner that directly concerns a number of my constituents, not only in the mining industry.

"The most common practice is to charge it a non-subversive group by finding one subversive individual within it and using him as a pretext to study the organisation itself. The Scottish NUM, for example, which does not qualify as subversive, has been targeted via its president, Mick McGahey, who qualifies because of his membership of the Communist Party."

I want to know—not necessarily in the reply tonight, but in a letter—whether Nick Davies is telling the truth or whether he has misunderstood the position. Many of my constituents are anxious to know the answer.

We will deal with many of Mr. Davies' other statements in Committee—for example, whether there are burglars of A1(A) or locksmiths and carpenters of A1(D). The difficulty is that there is a calm assumption that British intelligence can ignore the criminal law, and that is one of the central issues of the present controversy. It is no wonder that sensible people have become disturbed about the activities of British intelligence.

What exactly are the true responsibilities of MI5 and how does it set about fulfilling them? There is no statute to define the role of MI5; there is no statute even to register its existence. Its only constitution is a six-paragraph directive, referred to by the Home Secretary in his opening speech, secretly issued 33 years ago by the then Home Secretary, Sir David Maxwell Fyfe. That memorandum forms the minimum framework of rules, regulations and supervision. Such a code, if it were ever effective, has faded into a hazy twilight under the strain of increasing

[Mr. Tam Dalyell]

Government demands for information about new targets —demands that many MI5 personnel, not necessarily all, given the sort of people that they often are, have been all too eager to comply with.

It is all very well for the Home Secretary to say in his opening statement that he and the Prime Minister are satisfied, that they take seriously the continuing duties, and various other anodyne phrases. We must ask whether they are in control. What is going on behind their backs —even if we assume that they do not know about it? MI5 has shifted since 1970 from being essentially a counter-espionage organisation, aimed at coping with the schemes of foreign powers, to a domestic surveillance organisation. I am told that MI5 now has 7,000 employees. If this is true, what in heaven's name does MI5 find all these folk to do with their time? Techniques and operations which had been acceptable when used against some supposedly "bona fide" enemy run a coach and horses through MI5's own directive and the laws of the land when they are turned on domestic targets such as the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament or the National Union of Mineworkers.

The time for all hon. Members is limited, Mr. Speaker. Therefore, I should like simply to make one point at some length. It is to back up the argument of my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) who said that there should be a good communications engineer on the tribunal. It is not sufficient for the tribunal to consist only of lawyers. There must be somebody on the tribunal who knows something about solid state physics.

During the 1960s, when the current network of electronic exchanges was being designed, the security forces insisted upon the incorporation of a facility known as TKO—for trunk offering. The technical details of this are in the public domain. I refer to the Post Office Electrical Engineering Journal 1971, which is familiar to my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding).

TKO works as follows. When one dials a trunk number —for example, 01 837 1234, the telephone number of The Times—the "0" gets one a trunk line at the exchange. This dispatches one's call onward through the network, tagged "1x837 1234". The "x" is one of four priority codes: call box, private phone, operator, or TKO. Thirdly, on receipt of a TKO tagged call the receiving exchange connects the caller into the addressed line without disturbing it. In other words, if the telephone is on the hook, one hears nothing. If it is in use, the person can hear them but they cannot hear him.

Since TKO is accomplished by means of solid state switching at the exchange, the only way to be sure that a telephone is clean is to check the appropriate board at the exchange with a tool known as a logic analyser. Even this does not guarantee that one's number will not receive a TKO a few seconds later. In particular, the patent machines sold to detect tapping by measuring line impedance are completely useless against TKO. I was foolish enought to invest in one. An authorised TKO is carried out using a monitor phone which looks a bit like a tape recorder with a numerical keypad on it. The operator thereof merely taps out the desired number and listens or records as desired.

More than 1,000 monitor phones are currently in use. Authorised users include, of course, GCHQ, the police and the security services and also such seemingly innocuous bodies as the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise. In addition, all exchanges have a monitor facility built into general equipment. This is routinely used by operator supervisors and maintenance engineers who may often informally supply intercepts to local end users.

Worst of all, because of the huge number of British Telecom technical employees and staff in supplier firms who must have access to the basic telephone system specification, and because of the article I have already mentioned in the Post Office Electrical Engineering Journal, there are at least 100,000 people in Britain with the knowledge and expertise to construct an unauthorised monitor phone.

The principal use of these is in hacking, or gaining unauthorised access to computer data, in particular in order to break into somebody's mailbox in Telecom gold. The hacker does a TKO on the victim, not on the gold, and then records the victim's log on code next time he accesses his mailbox. That is the technical position. I shall not go on about it other than to say that there must be people on the tribunal who are capable of looking at the mechanics of what is being done. Lawyers, although they are necessary, could be simply putty in the hands of those who want to get away with things that they should not be getting away with.

My interest in this matter has been aroused particularly by the case of the late Hilda Murrell on which I spoke during the debate on the Consolidated Fund. It is important for Ministers to understand that suspicions have arisen in the minds of many hon. Members who have been in the House for 20 years or more, which would not have arisen before, because of the complete breakdown of consensus politics. Those of us who would have accepted a ministerial word—Conservative or Labour—as a man's bond in previous Parliaments can, because of recent events, no longer do so. That is the breakdown in political trust which is afflicting Britain. Therefore, we may be forgiven for being far more suspicious of Ministers than we would have been previously.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): The debate has been in some ways wide of the mark when one considers the Bill. I make no excuse for some of my opening remarks. There are two major reasons why speeches have not been directed straight at the Bill, both of which I understand. First, there has been the Bridge report and the recent public comment in the media, both on television and in newspapers, on surveillance and Britain's security service in relation to the Bill. Secondly—the Minister accepted this in his opening speech—the omission of other types of surveillance from clause 1 means that this is a narrow Bill. Recent events in the media suggest that the Government have sought to whitewash the interception of communications, and I share that view.

The Government asked Lord Bridge to do in five days what it would have taken any Select Committee or other group of hon. Members weeks and weeks to do—to look into the allegations made in a television programme, stretching back over 14 years, on how telephone calls are intercepted and how people are surveyed. Many suspicions have been brought to fruition in a programme that was temporarily withdrawn from the television screens of the British people.

No individual can sort and obtain from the Home Office and security service all the documents which could be of assistance in determining whether the issue of a warrant was justified. That would be impossible for anybody to undertake in five days.

Lord Bridge's final comment—that he was satisfied after a full examination of all the relevant documents that no warrant for interception was issued in contravention of the appropriate criteria—must leave every right hon. and hon. Member with many question marks in their minds. Questions will remain about the contents of that programme and whether there were official phone taps.

I can honestly and earnestly believe why the Home Secretary would refrain from commenting in the House on many matters in relation to major crimes such as drug pushing or many issues that would undermine the national interest and why the Bill will not open the door for those involved in such crimes to check what is happening. But I cannot for the life of me understand why the Home Secretary has not commented seriously today on the allegations that were made in that television programme in relation to matters which I think all hon. Members will agree pose no threat to national security. Yet nothing has been said. We have only two paragraphs in the Bridge report, which was passed from the Prime Minister's office to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition.

My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) mentioned that public comment is being made about the demise of our security service. He pointed out that many others also believe that in the past 14 years this country has changed from surveying foreign powers and their involvement in Britain to surveying members of the public.

It has been alleged—I accept it—that Jack Jones and Lord Scanlon, a member of the other place—were put under public surveillance in 1972——

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Interception of Communications Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Garel-Jones.]

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

Mr. Barron: I repeat that Mr. Jack Jones, who was then general secretary of the Transport and General Workers Union—a much honoured man, who since retirement has fought on behalf of the pensioners and of their rights — and Lord Scanlon were put under surveillance by MI5 in 1972 by the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), who was then Prime Minister.

In the 1980s, MI5 began to survey the peace movement. No one with any sense would say that CND could be described as a threat to national security or that, for example, the chairperson of Christian CND, who works at CND headquarters, is any sort of subversive. Yet allegations have been made daily on television and in the press about how people have been surveyed in one form or another.

On 10 March, an article appeared in The Observer, in which Mr. Nick Davies commented in great detail on MI5. As his article is important to the Bill and is relevant to what many other hon. Members have said, I shall quote it. He says:

"As the line between security and politics became more blurred"—

in that 14-year period—

"F Branch grew and took on new responsibilities. The old simplicity of studying the Communist Party and overtly fascist groups was replaced by a complex array of targets, reflected in the branch's current structure.

The old targets—the Communist party and the Communist front organisations such as the World Peace Council—occupy two sub-sections, F2(C) and F2(D). Trade unions are studied by F2(N) with its increased staff. Teachers, students, pacifists and MPs"—

I understand that to mean Members of Parliament—

"are to be the job of F2(R) which has recently completed special projects on journalists and lawyers".

If what Mr. Nick Davies and many other well-respected commentators have said about the past 14 years is true, we must ensure that all hon. Members and all members of the public are protected from such activities by strict guidelines and by a measure of accountability.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) read out a list of items from Exchange and Mart. That publication comes out weekly and such items are commonly available for people to buy. The items demonstrate that surveillance and tapping can be carried out not only by those involved in the security network, such as members of MI5, but by citizens or Members of Parliament who want to pry into their neighbours' affairs or into, perhaps, what is going on in the adjoining office in this House.

The Bill and clause 1 fall far short of giving any security to people. I should have liked the Bill to be far wider. Many people have discussed controls. In 1970, a committee on privacy under the chairmanship of Sir Kenneth Younger was set up to consider whether legislation was need to further protect citizens, commerce and industry against intrusions into privacy. The committee recommended that the unlawful use of technical device for surreptitious surveillance should be a criminal offence. Clause 1 should be extended to include that.

The Law Commission on breach of confidence recommended that a civil course of action should be available to any individual whose personal privacy had been invaded by the use of the surveillance device. That should also be in the Bill. We should have a far more comprehensive Bill. Hon. Members should be in a better position to take wiser decisions about surveillance and the use of the security forces.

I do not know how hon. Members can interpret exactly what is meant by the three paragraphs in clause 2(2). One of them relates to national security. The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) talked about terrorism. No hon. Member would in any way weaken the resolve of the security forces or any organ of the Government to stop and stamp out terrorism and the awful scenes that have for a long time resulted from it. The second paragraph relates to serious crime. No one would wish to claim that people involved in serious crime or in bringing hard drugs, such as heroin and cocaine, into the country, which lead to the death of those who have been led mistakenly to use them, should not be under surveillance. All hon. Members will agree that constant surveillance is necessary, and that when they are found to be guilty of such terrible crimes, people should be brought to justice.

[Mr. Barron]

The third paragraph relates to economic well-being. We must ask what that means now, what it will mean when and if the Bill in its present form becomes law, and how Governments will interpret it in future. It is clear from the allegations made by the media during the past two or three weeks that we must question exactly what "economic well-being" means. It has been alleged that the telephones of Mr. Arthur Scargill and Mr. Mick McGahey were tapped in the late 1970s, presumably because of what happened in 1972 or 1974. Was that because that was against the economic well-being of the country? At that time I was a working miner, and I can assure the House that I did not think so. Those actions gave me a decent wage for what all hon. Members believe to be a dark, grimy and dangerous job. The national interest was well served in recognising what the miners wanted and in giving it to them.

It is alleged that in 1978, not under the present Government, Mr. Fred Harraway, the chief shop steward of Ford at Dagenham had his phone tapped because people wanted to know what his bottom line was in the Ford pay dispute. That would have interested everyone, but was the tapping for the well-being of the country? I would be worried if that were described as in the national interest or as looking after the economic well-being of the United Kingdom. I would find it difficult to support any Administration that was prepared to put to the test the rights of British people to their freedom to decide the price of their labour.

If those allegations are true, we must ask what clause 2 is about, even though the Bill represents only a small part of surveillance. I am not happy with these bland statements about economic well-being and national security. We must have more debates about them, and that is one reason why I shall vote against Second Reading.

Another reason why I will vote against it is clause 3——

Mr. Hickmet: Of course, clause 2(2)(c) would allow the surveillance of meetings between, for example, the leadership of the NUM and Colonel Gaddafi in Libya, would it not?

Mr. Barron: We could discuss the economic well-being of this country and the £19·1 million a year trade surplus that Britain has with Libya. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to take me down that path, he should apply for an Adjournment debate on it, and I shall take 15 minutes of his time to talk about Britain and Libya, whether in relation to the NUM or McAlpine or other people involved with the Conservative party and Libya for many years.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): I was on the telephone tonight to Mrs. McGahey to inquire about and send good wishes to Mick McGahey after the serious attack upon him, and no doubt, because of that sort of attitude, we were being monitored.

Mr. Barron: I hope that Mick McGahey recovers well from that attack. We read in the media about supposedly sniggering remarks made about Mrs. McGahey's telephone conversations with her friends when people were trying to find out where Mick McGahey was at any one time. If that happened, it was an infringement of the civil liberties of an individual. I hope that all right hon. and hon. Members will stand up and say that our civil liberties should not be ignored. They must be protected at all times within certain parameters. I have described some people in this country whose civil liberties I would not protect, but the areas must be clearly defined.

Clause 3 deals with the scope of the warrant. This is obviously the area where the Home Secretary needs some flexibility and some control, if that is not too harsh a word for some hon. Members. We must have clearly defined areas where people can and cannot go. If there is to be any accountability, whether to a commissioner or to a tribunal, this is an important clause. Clause 3(1)(a) talks about "such communications as are sent to or from one or more addresses specified in the warrant."

Paragraph (i) talks about

"one particular person specified or described in the warrant", and paragraph (ii) talks about

"one particular set of premises so specified or described."

Those provisions are tightly drawn, and many people here would say, "We have some control because a Home Secretary can say what the security services can intercept." But subsection (b) talks about "such other communications (if any) as it is necessary to intercept in order to intercept communications falling within paragraph (a) above."

It is a catch-all phrase. In effect it means that we can move away from those three specific areas to widen the scope of warrants. I hope that in Committee the House will give serious consideration to clause 3 and decide that the provisions of paragraph 1*(b)* should not be enacted.

I deal next with clause 7. I am sorry that the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) is no longer present. He spoke earlier wearing what he described as work wear—the black waistcoat, the black jacket and the pin-striped trousers that are worn at the Temple. He spoke of the five members of the tribunal being selected from barristers, advocates or solicitors of not less than 10 years standing. We have already suggested the possibility of a trade union official or other people in society who could adequately sit on the tribunal. The hon. and learned Member for Burton said that the five members should be chosen from this famous closed shop which has existed in Britain for many years—as I understand it, the only one that is not under attack from Government legislation. The hon. Gentleman suggested that these members should be selected not from among those with parliamentary responsibility but from members of the senate of the inns of court and the bar. It might be more relevant if they were selected from the bar golfing society, which I understand is very good just now at picking judges. The president or the secretary of the bar golfing society might be in a better position to select members to sit on the tribunal.

I believe, as I understand my party believes, that the five people of the tribunal should be selected more widely than has been suggested. The tribunal will have a difficult but important job to do if civil liberties, about which hon. Members speak frequently, are to be protected. I believe that these five people should have a wider background than the law. They should be the standard bearers. We would entrust them with a great deal of responsibility for the individual liberties of us all, be it Members of Parliament allegedly under surveillance by MI5 or F branch, or members of CND, trade unionists or any other group in society allegedly under surveillance.

Clause 8 states that the commissioner would be responsible for reporting to the Prime Minister and issuing an annual report to Parliament. It also states that the annual report will have to be vetted, and certain matters omitted for reasons of security. I understand and accept that it is not possible to place before Parliament everything that has happened in a 12-month period. However, in the protection of the civil liberty of every citizen, I suggest that the parliamentary accountability of a commissioner should go wider than the office of the Prime Minister. This accountability should be similar to that of all right hon. and hon. Members who serve on Select Committees and make submissions in confidence which they request should not be for publication. In Committee, I hope that an amendment will be tabled requiring that the annual report of the commissioner be placed before a Select Committee of the House and be subject to questions. This would meet the allegation made in the programme "20:20 Vision" that the Secretary of State was using material gained in a subversive manner from the headquarters of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmement.

By acting in that way, it would not be possible for the Prime Minister of the day to be accused of political bias when considering those annual reports. Discussing the matter in confidence, a Select Committee could ensure that those involved in our security services did not go beyond the guidelines laid down by Parliament to protect the rights of the individual.

I shall vote against the Bill at this stage, not because I do not want satisfactory security for the nation and its citizens but to ensure that their rights and freedoms are upheld. If the Bill is read a Second time, I hope that in Committee hon. Members of all parties will joint to amend the measure to ensure that the rights of individuals are fully protected.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): The hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) concentrated on the question of safeguards and scrutiny. Our aim must be to ensure that the Bill provides the right safeguards against unreasonable telephone intervention and the right form of scrutiny to discover whether there has been improper interception of communications.

With that in mind, I welcome this opportunity to consider legislation designed to set acceptable limits on the interception of telephone conversations. For many years we have read in the press, and in the debate we have been told, stories — many of them anecdotes, often unsubstantiated — about alleged unlawful telephone tapping.

Over the years, on a few occasions, people have told me that they either worked for or had in the past been employed by MI5. I have not believed any of them. I doubted whether they would have been working for MI5 had they been prepared to give that information.

However, we have recently—this has been the value of the "20 : 20 Vision" programme — had what can fairly be described as being in the category of evidence which has concentrated our attention on the real issues behind our scrutiny of the Bill. That has been the value of Miss Massiter's revelations.

If they be true I know not. I do not have the advantage which, for example, the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) has of having known someone who was named in that programme as having been a spy for MI5. Nor do I have the advantage or otherwise of knowing whether Miss Massiter was speaking the truth. However, the issues raised by the programme were sufficiently serious and were put objectively enough to call for close attention.

I welcome not only the Bill but the opportunity it gives for the House to consider the whole issue, although I do not welcome all of its provisions. I welcome, too, the fact that the Government have decided to accept the judgment in the Malone case to the extent of incorporating the terms of article 8 of the European convention on human rights in the measure.

We must, however, bear in mind—I am surprised that this has not been pointed out in the debate—that article 8 is now of some antiquity, having been drafted and agreed to in the immediate nervousness of the years shortly after the last war. If one reads that article with care now, one wonders whether it needs some redrafting and tightening, whether it is not too broad and whether, unfortunately, that breadth is not reflected in the Bill.

The Bill arrives in the context of a wealth of criticism of the diffuse state of the law on surveillance and privacy. We have had a number of reports that have severely criticised the state of the law, or in some cases the lack of any law on the subject. If one looks, for example, at the Philips Royal Commission on criminal procedure, one notes in paragraph 3.57 a recommendation that is not included in this Bill and which in my opinion should have been. It is this:

> "We therefore recommend that the use of surveillance devices by the police (including the interception of letters and telephone communications) should be regulated by statute. The specific practices subject to regulation should be set out in secondary legislation to enable new techniques to be incorporated as they are developed".

That recommendation, not incorporated in this Bill, goes very much beyond telephone tapping and interception of the mail. It deals with all surveillance devices.

We know of the Younger committee on privacy, which recommended that there should be a right of action in the civil courts over unwanted telephone tapping and also the use of surveillance devices.

The Home Secretary, in answer to an intervention of mine which I feel would perhaps have come rather better from the Tory Back Benches in the circumstances, said that the Government intend, as I understand it, to introduce legislation following the recommendation of the Law Commission on breach of confidence. I hope that we shall hear more about that from the Minister of State when he winds up, because it seems to me that that undertaking, welcome though it is, goes only so far and not far enough in adopting the many recommendations in at least the three reports I have mentioned, which deal with the whole question of the interception of communications of all sorts and interference with privacy. And, of course, a much more modern concern has arisen — the possible intervention in communications which are sent by electronic means, by computer.

I agree with what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) about the way in which the scrutinising of telephone tapping should take place. Unless we hear something much more convincing from the Home Secretary, given that the reports to which I have referred were prepared some years ago, the House can only deplore the failure to provide a package of legislation dealing with the whole question of privacy and surveillance.

The Malone case gave rise to this Bill, but although the Government appear to be seeking to provide an answer to the complaint which was found justified in that case and although I accept, of course, that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary believes that the Bill provides an answer to that, I wish to draw the attention of the House to clause 9.

Mr. Malone was charged with a criminal offence of dishonesty. During the course of the case his counsel was cross-examining a policeman and, as counsel sometimes do, he asked to see the policeman's notebook. In that notebook there was a cryptic reference which did not make any sense in the context of the evidence which the police officer had been giving. After some thought, counsel rightly tumbled to the fact that it was a reference to the tapping of Mr. Malone's telephone. It was that discovery by counsel that led to the case going through the British courts and ending up in the European Court of Human Rights.

Under clause 9 of the Bill, counsel for Mr. Malone, who cross-examined the police officer and obtained an admission from him that Mr. Malone's telephone had been tapped, would no longer be able to ask those questions. It is not entirely clear that that is the case, because a person who cannot be asked questions of that sort in court includes any person holding office under the Crown.

As the Home Secretary knows, one could fill volumes of legal textbooks with arguments, judgments and speeches in the House of Lords, in its judicial capacity, which have dealt with whether a policeman holds office under the Crown. However, that begs the question, because whether or not counsel could ask the sort of question that was asked in the Malone case of a police officer, there is a wealth of cases in which, under the Bill, it would not be possible to conduct such cross-examination —for example, prosecutions by the Inland Revenue or, perhaps more in context, prosecutions by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise, for there is no doubt that Customs and Excise officers are persons holding office under the Crown.

Therefore, it seems to me that the goal which was the aim of the legislation in principle, and which led to the legislation being introduced, is missed by a mile because of the provisions of clause 9. I hope that we shall receive an undertaking that the Government will look with great care once again at clause 9 so that the legislation, if enacted—perhaps one should realistically say, "when enacted"—includes clear provisions that will ensure that if a situation similar to the Malone case arises in court, counsel will not be stopped by an artifice from pursuing the matter.

Another matter to which I should like to refer is the definition of "serious crime" in the Bill. Under its provisions, the Secretary of State can issue a warrant if he considers it necessary.

"for the purpose of preventing or detecting serious crime".

Many hon. Members were most grateful to the Home Secretary for accepting so many interventions in his opening speech, which enabled the debate to get off on a useful basis, and to a constructive start in which all the questions were raised. During an intervention of mine, I asked whether "serious crime" would be defined, and referred to the Police and Criminal Evidence Act, in which the term "serious arrestable offence" is defined. The Home Secretary's answer appeared to be that we could not put that definition in the Bill because "serious arrestable offence" is not the same as "serious crime". At last we have managed to persuade the Government, as many of us tried to do throughout the debates on the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill, that the term "serious arrestable offence" includes many trivial non-serious offences that happen to be arrestable. I see that the Home Secretary is shaking his head. Perhaps he will agree with this at least. It is important that some effort should be made to define "serious crime" in the context of this Bill so that parameters are set whereby the Secretary of State knows what "serious crime" is before he considers the issue of a warrant.

Something that has not been mentioned during the debate, but which is of extreme importance, is schedule 2. It is substituted for section 45 of the Telecommunications Act 1984. It deals with the position when a person who is engaged in the running of a public telecommunications system — an employee of British Telecom or Mercury for example — intentionally discloses to someone either the contents of a telephone call or information concerning the use made of a telephone. We all know in the House that industrial espionage that involves serious intervention with personal privacy is becoming almost endemic in certain parts of industry. Yet when we look at schedule 2, containing the new section 45(4) of the 1984 Act, we find that a BT or Mercury employee who, for example, gives to an industrial spy details of all the telephone numbers rung up by a particular person, say the managing director or chairman of a public company, will be subject, even on conviction on indictment, only to a fine. An unduly lenient view seems to have been taken of that.

The Government should reconsider the penalties. It is unacceptable that an employee of British Telecom, for example, should be subject only to a fine in those circumstances. The stakes are so high in industrial espionage that those who persuade the employee to give the details either of the conversations or of the general nature of calls made by a particular person will not be put off by the prospect of a fine. It is unrealistic.

In regard to the powers of the tribunal, it will be able to investigate complaints but it will not inform a complainant whether surveillance is being carried out unless the tribunal decides that the procedure for authorising and renewing warrants has not been complied with. That is what it amounts to. The powers of the tribunal are virtually purely procedural.

The problem arises because the test that the Secretary of State has to apply before authorising an interception is wholly subjective. The tribunal will have to decide whether the Secretary of State in good faith considered that the warrant was necessary. If it decides that the Home Secretary in good faith considered that the warrant was necessary, that will be the end of the matter for the tribunal. That is what clause 2 says. That provision requires major amendment so that the tribunal will be able to scrutinise not whether the Home Secretary considered in good faith that the interception was necessary, but whether the interception really was necessary. Such an amendment would make the tribunal far more effective because it would be able to decide on the merits of the case.

In regard to the procedural provisions and the question of judicial review of the tribunal, the tribunal can make its own rules. That is what the Bill says. It is unlikely, having regard to the nature of the tribunal, that it will provide rules which conform to the rules of natural justice. Indeed, the essence of the secrecy which underpins the tribunal is that it will have to defy the rules of natural justice. Also, the individual or company feeling aggrieved by possible unlawful interception of communications will not be able to apply for judicial review of the tribunal's conduct or the way in which the tribunal approached the case, even on the ground of legal procedures.

The rules of natural justice, therefore, are not applicable to the tribunal—a most unusual situation in the context of the legal philosophy and jurisprudence of the country. Over recent years, the borders of administrative law and judicial review have been extended most helpfully on occasions by the Court of Appeal; that has been confirmed by the House of Lords in its judicial capacity. The provisions of the Bill in relation to judicial review and administrative law show a surprising, unattractive and even painful regression to those of us who wish to see the law continuing to develop in that sphere.

I invite the Government to consider carefully the whole procedure and structure of the tribunal in order to provide something, whether a tribunal of this sort, a special Committee of the House or whatever, which will ensure that at the very least the rules of natural justice—the most basic of legal rules—can be complied with.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): The passion shown by Labour Members tonight is not a passion about the Bill, which is a pathetic, futile measure, but about the freedom of the individual and his rights and liberties, and in particular the right to privacy. I find it extraordinary that Conservative Members, who have demonstrated such passion in favour of the right to have one's teeth rot, or the right to go headfirst through a windscreen, or the right to have one's head bashed in because one does not want to wear a crash helmet, have not shown more passion on a subject that is of vital importance — the right to privacy and freedom, and the civil rights of individuals.

The origins of the Bill show how pathetic it is. It was forced on the Government by the Malone case, yet closes up the loophole shown by that case so that it could not happen again. It pretends to conform to European practice, but does not do so. Having foisted this farce on us, the Government have taken the credit, and said, "Aren't we magnanimous in providing regulations for phone tapping?"

I speak about the measure from an ordinary, common-sense point of view. I know that in some political circles it is a demonstration of virility to have one's phone tapped. Indeed, when I learned that phone tapping improves the phone service and gets rid of the normal crackle, I almost wanted my phone tapped and wondered whether appeals to the tribunal will come from people who find that they are not getting the normal crackling service from BT, but a good service, which shows that the phone is being tapped.

The unfortunate thing about this Bill is that it tackles only a small part of the problem, and that inadequately. It leaves aside bugging, electronic eavesdropping, and all the devices about which we have heard. Essentially, it is setting out to regulate canal traffic in the age of the high speed train and the motorway. It deals with one, unimportant, part of the problem. The Bill should regulate the use of devices overall and provide for a right to privacy.

Secondly, the Bill covers only a small part of interception—the monitoring of transatlantic calls and of overseas telegrams, the activities of Menwirth hill in monitoring calls in this country. I see from the 1980 figures of the number of people involved in tapping in MI5 that the Ebury bridge office, which I gather is known as Tinkerbell because of its activities in tapping phone calls, has 140 staff. However, in that year, there were 440 interceptions. What rate of productivity is that in the new Britain? They cannot all be listening to the interminable conversations of Mrs. McGahey over the telephone.

The Bill does not even regulate many of the manifestations. It does not regulate what is regulated elsewhere in Europe—the provision to the police and the security services of listings of telephone calls made. The customer finds it impossible to get out of BT a list of the calls that he has made, but such information will be freely available, to the security services, with the intrusion of liberty that is implied in that.

The Bill fails to deal with the problems. It is a buggers' charter because it pretends that the whole situation can be regulated and gives an appearance of confidence and respectability. It claims that all is well, and that the Government are tackling the problem without controlling it. However, the fundamental problem is the nature of the security services, particularly MI5. One has to talk about it on the basis of the hints and leaks in the programme last week because we do not have the information. We need more information about what is going on.

I remember that in New Zealand, the security service was listed in every telephone book. One could ring up and turn in one's friends for fun and profit, and that might be appropriate. On one occasion, I rang the head of the security service and invited him to be on television. He said, "Yes, marvellous, I would love to be on television." He came round. We could do with that degree of openness in our security service, especially when we read of allegations that the cost of security amounts to £1 billion per annum. What are we getting for that expenditure and how many are employed in the service?

It appears from "20:20 Vision" that the service is getting out of control in certain crucial respects. It seems that it is overstepping the limits within which it should operated. That must be so, in the light of recent problems. If those in the service are to fulfil the role that the Secretary of State has prescribed for them, they must be paragons of virtue, fellows of All Souls and men of the highest intellect and integrity, if not High Court judges. But we know that that is not always their nature. For example, we have the extraordinary Bettaney case. Bettaney was recruited for lunatic Right-wing politics at Oxford. Presumably he could not become a Conservative Back Bencher, so he became a member of the security service. He worked in one ot the most sensitive parts of MI5 when he was arrested for drunkenness. It is reported in The Sunday Times—it must be true if it is in The Sunday Times—that on one occasion he ran down the street shouting, "I am a spy, I am a spy." Two weeks later he was accused of fare-dodging on British Rail. That was one of the paragons of virtue who was upholding the delicate balance between the freedom of the individual and the efficiency of the service.

That cannot be right. The service is secret and because of that it develops its own attitudes, mentalities and systems and proceeds to function in its own way. The Home Secretary assures us that the allegations against the service are not correct, but how does he know that that is so? How does he know that MI5 is not making unauthorised taps? Why was Lord Bridge not asked to inquire into that?

If the service functions in the way that a priori reasoning would lead one to assume, it must be difficult to control. It must be impossible to tell whether it is functioning in an unauthorised fashion. The allegations made in "20:20 Vision" need specifically to be confirmed or denied. The programme presented a horrifying picture of a service that was overstepping the limits of its responsibility. It has been tapping those who are Communists who are now in CND and those who were Communists many years ago, who are active in trade unions and the National Council for Civil Liberties.

Most of the allegations of tapping had surfaced before the programme in the form of complaints by the individuals concerned. It is only now that they have been confirmed by the programme. The Home Secretary owes it to us—"20:20 Vision" coincided with the Bill—to tell us whether the allegations are correct. Until he gives us a positive assurance that they have been inquired into and that they are correct or incorrect, his word on other parts of the Bill must be suspect.

The allegations of tapping have a ring of truth, and Miss Massiter was convincing. The allegations tied in so well with the evidence that had come to the surface previously that they had every sign of truth. They present the picture of a service which is exceeding its powers and acting out of control. That is dangerous because the political climate that is developing is such as to encourage the service to function in that way and to behave accordingly. It is true that there were excesses under the previous Labour Government, to our shame, but that Government consisted of solid men and Ministers who were trusted as men of integrity — for example, my right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leed's South (Mr. Rees) and prickly individualists who were concerned for civil liberties. How much more dangerous is the situation under a Government with an overwhelming majority? That is in itself an incentive to cut corners, to relax the strict rules and to use power.

We have a Prime Minister who believes that she alone, and those who think like her, have all the answers and the key to truth. She has turned the Punch slogan "That's the way to do it" into a system of government and believes that those who oppose her are not so much misguided as sinister. She wants to work only with those who are "One of us" and believes that there is an enemy within. If such a climate is being set at the top, it is inevitable that the security service, which is difficult to control because it is closed and secretive, will overstep acceptable limits.

Such a danger will not be controlled by the Bill. Moreover, it will be worsened by the bitterness, confrontational politics and ideological tone that has crept into politics under the Government. Confrontation permeates everything where before there was harmony and trust. We have the very reverse of St. Francisism. The atmosphere of bitterness and antagonism has permeated the police, as can be seen from the treatment of the miners' strike. It is permeating the press and must permeate the security service. That alone can explain the aberrations that we saw in the "20:20 Vision" film.

Do we really need our security service? Is it worth £1 billion, or one tenth of the tax revenue from North sea oil? I know that it is conventional to say that we need it as a manifestation of our being a great power. It is one of those delusions of grandeur from which we suffer. Even if we need it for state security, to combat terrorism and certain extreme forms of crime, it must be admitted that the abuses of the service endanger those very ends. The entire system of interception and bugging thus becomes odious in the public eye.

Once MI5 extends its brief to domestic politics and taps the phones of members of CND, trade unionists and members of the National Council for Civil Liberties, Friends of the Earth and Shelter, and it passes information about the political background of CND on to the DS19 section in the Ministry of Defence, to be spread thence to the Daily Mail and the Daily Express, thus speaking to the people, we are on extremely dangerous ground. It is dangerous because the system comes into disrepute.

In a modern pluralistic society, we are all dissenters. Whether it is on the bomb, the environment, fluoridation, women's rights, animal rights or Welsh nationalism, most people are rebels in some way. They can feel threatened by a service that is extending itself. The danger is that our political debate and system is coarsened. The rights of one are the rights of all. The threat to the privacy of one's telephonic communications or civil rights is a threat to the privacy and rights of all. That is what this debate is about and why there is such passion on this side of the House. Because we are all dissenters and rebels, the Bill and the system leave a nasty taste in the mouth.

Interception of Communications Bill

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): Unauthorised phone tapping is causing considerable and far-reaching concern. It stretches even to the racing pages of a national newspaper, which earlier this week expressed fears that conversations between trainers and owners were being overheard to obtain racing tips. When it reaches that extent, it is a sure bet that something is wrong.

However, the matter is much more serious than that. Tapping is in widespread use against individuals and organisations. The report by Lord Bridge is a whitewash. The investigation was conducted at great speed for the convenience of the Government. It was instigated in response to the "20:20 Vision" revelations, and has been used by the Government as a smokescreen for this debate. Lord Bridge did not cover unauthorised operations, such as breaches of existing guidelines, surveillance of people not engaged in subversive activity or the planting of bugs by illegal break-ins. The report must be cleared out of the way before we turn to the important issues.

Many individuals have been the victims of tapping. A letter in The Guardian on 2 March, from Dr. Joe Collier, stated:

"To your list of categories subject to telephone surveillance . . . I would like to add editors of medical journals. It is a most unnerving feeling to hear one's conversation played back during a phone call."

Dr. Collier is a correspondent with the Drug and Therapeutics Bulletin. The Times of 26 February lists many individuals who have been subject to tapping—trade unionists, the Left, the National Council for Civil Liberties, crusading journalists—not the hacks—CND and even the media itself. The article ends by saying that MI5 now vets all graduates applying for political posts with the BBC.

The Secretary of State for Employment said that he opposed the tapping of phones of union leaders in any circumstances other than when they were in contact with an enemy power. Does the Home Secretary agree with that? It is not the criterion now operating.

The "Panorama" programme on 2 March 1981, which is still relevant, was called "The Right to Privacy—the Need to Know." It was about a woman who was on record falsely as having links with terrorist organisations. In that programme Mr. Harold Salisbury was interviewed. He was the former Chief Constable of the North and East Riding of Yorkshire. The record of the programme states:

"Interviewer: Who lays down the policy for what the Special Branch had to do. Was that laid down by you as Chief Constable?

Salisbury: No, no, no, no. These chaps used to go to instructions sessions with the actual security services.

Interviewer: In London, with MI5?

Salisbury: Well, yes.

Interviewer: Which groups would be in the files here?

Salisbury: Obviously anyone who shows an affinity towards Communism—That's commonsense—the IRA, the PLO and I would say anyone who's decrying marriage, family life, trying to break that up, pushing drugs or advocating the acceptance of certain drugs, homosexuality, indiscipline in schools, weak penalties for anti-social crimes, pushing that sort of thing. Oh, a whole gamut of things like that that could be pecking away at the foundations of our society and weakening it.

Interviewer: And do you regard these people as subversives?

Salisbury: Well, in a word, yes.

That is what he said — "pecking away at the foundations." That is a disgraceful way to operate.

Yet that has great similarity with the definitions that currently operate in the security services. These definitions are important. They regulate the operations of the security service. In July 1984 I asked for a definition of "subversive". The definition that I was given was:

"Those which threaten the safety or well-being of the State, and which are intended to undermine or overthrow Parliamentary democracy by political, industrial or violent means."—[Official Report, 3 July 1984, Vol 63, c. 85.]

That definition was given 10 years ago by a junior Minister in a throw-away sentence during a long speech in the other place. It did not come to light until 10 years later when I asked for a definition. It led me to ask the Government what they meant and this is the Written Answer that the Secretary of State for the Home Department gave:

"The word bears its ordinary meaning of injure, or wear out, secretly, insidiously or imperceptibly."—[Official Report, 26 June 1984; Vol. 62, c. 378.]

I thought that was what the Labour party was trying to do in order to get rid of the Tories at the next general election. That answer was immensely complacent, arrogant, or both, because I found that it came from The Shorter Oxford Dictionary and that that definition was first used in 1569. This definition of "subversion" replaced the definition of Lord Denning. His definition was not perfect, but it is better than the current definition. He said that subversives are those "who contemplate the overthrow of Government by unlawful means".

That means those who contravene the law, not those who the Government or the security services think might have contravened the law.

I raised this matter in a parliamentary question about lawful activity not being regarded as subversive and undermining the state. In his written answer the Secretary of State said:

"Tactics which are not themselves unlawful could be used with the aim of subverting our democratic system of government."—[Official Report, 11 July 1984; Vol. 63 c. 481.]

That is a blank cheque that allows the state to act against any person who is acting legally. The definition can be extended indefinitely to cover virtually anybody. But the position is worse than that. There is the "Police War Duties Manual", of 1965, marked "Restricted". It is still in force, although it has probably been updated. It states that the police can take

"special measures to maintain internal security, with particular reference to the detention or restriction of movement of potentially subversive people."

That is an immensely wide definition. Who, I ask the Secretary of State, are to be defined as potentially subversive? It destroys the protestations of the Secretary of State in his speech that control is provided by means of these definitions. The Maxwell Fyfe definitions which govern the security service are not perfect and need to be tightened up, but I shall leave that point for Committee.

This definition is being applied not only to telephone but to computer interceptions. I asked a question recently about whether the Home Secretary can intercept computer data. First of all he appeared to say no, but on closer reading the answer revealed that his power covers any form of communications in the postal and public telecommunications system. Computers operate between each other by phone links. That, too, gives the Home Secretary a wide new area of operation. He can tap into computer data.

[Mr. Harry Cohen]

The Data Protection Act 1984 is no safeguard. It is full of holes. The security services are exempt from it under section 27. The registrar, the ombudsman for data protection, is unaware of secret service activity, according to a parliamentary answer. The Home Secretary does not know whether any of his Cabinet colleagues have signed exemption certificates. Once a certificate has been signed by a Minister, MI5 does not have to renew that certificate. There is no obligation on the Home Secretary to review the security, accuracy or relevance of the data that is stored on the systems.

MI5 has a massive computer system. In Computing of 5 March 1982, it was reported that:

"A top secret computer system capable of carrying a detailed file on every adult in the country has been set up clandestinely by the MI5 security service. It has been installed since 1978 at a cost of £20 million and has been developed despite growing fears over data protection and privacy . . . The computers—dual ICL 2980s"— they have probably been updated now—

"were ordered under the counter and paid for without informing Parliament."

The article continued:

"Investigations by Computing and the New Statesman have revealed that an MoD building in Mayfair's Mount Row is the centre of the system."

It is no wonder that the Lindop committee said that there is no assurance that there is any healthy or constructive criticism and debate which ensures that the security services do not stray beyond their allotted functions. That is an understatement.

An immense range of new technology is available for the surveillance of individuals. The security services have two approaches to that. They can block it, like stopping patents. About 800 patents every year are referred to the Ministry of Defence and about one seventh of those are stopped or restricted. Or they can use it themselves. For example, BT is introducing its customised telephone bills, which will show the date of every call, who made it and who received it and the cost in terms of time used. Five hundred lines can be monitored for £3,250. What could MI5 monitor on an annual budget of £160 million and the security services as a whole with £1 billion? They are not properly accountable.

Against that, we have this puny ineffective Bill, forced on the Government by the European Court. The Home Secretary has made great play of the role of the tribunal, but there is a great danger that it will be composed of placemen, amenable to the Government of the day. The legal editor of The Guardian said:

"The tribunal is there to ensure procedural correctness in certain forms of interception: it cannot judge the merits of the decision to target persons or organisations. It may inspect the Home Secretary's signature, but it cannot look over his shoulder."

It is beyond legal scrutiny. It is not permitted to give reasons for its decision and it has the power to grant compensation if the information which was gained by authorised methods is misused to the detriment of the person tapped. The tribunal will not be a watchdog, as the Secretary of State described it, but a toothless poodle. It will not be satisfactory to those who are denied their rights. They will be resentful because they will be without recourse to justice.

The security services must be properly reined in to stop unauthorised tapping and bugging. The New Statesman even reported that there would be a burglary department. Politicians, especially Conservative ones, have abused the system, as we know, for example, with the vendetta of the Secretary of State for Defence against CND, for his own reasons. We must move towards a more independent review of the security services and accountability. We could start by asking more parliamentary questions and giving them a wider berth. A Select Committee has also a role to play.

More generally, the Government should be much more open. That should be recognised as being in the national interest. We should take steps to curtail the self-perpetuating ever-expanding spy industry. It should not be allowed. The Royal Commission on criminal procedure mentioned the German model, which also could be adopted.

The editor of The Guardian said of the Bill:

"This curious measure purports to impose legal controls on mail and telephone interception, but its true purpose and effect will be to remove them entirely from any scrutiny by the courts. It is a law, in other words, to place State surveillance above the law."

That is said of a measure from a party which claims to be against the power of the state over individuals. The Bill further institutionalises the Government's hypocrisy in this matter.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): The Bill in its present form does nothing to re-establish the delicate balance between the needs of the security services and the democratic rights of the British people. If the debate has revealed anything, it is the Conservative party's lack of understanding of the democratic traditions and rights which have been jealously guarded in the House. It also shows how the Government underestimate the effect of their present way of handling the security services on the morale of those services. The Opposition believe that security services are necessary, but if they are to operate within the law and be given the support of Parliament they also need to operate within clear guidelines. The Bill, in its present form, does not provide those clear guidelines.

Under the Government we have seen persistent attempts to get their policies through regardless of the rights of minorities and the democratic traditions of the House. When we hear them turn arguments about normal political conflict into words of the "enemy within" or, more recently, according to Mr. Ian MacGregor, of "making people who have been insubordinate pay", we recognise that what in the past was regarded as normal political conflict has been turned into a form of internal subversion which is alien to the Government.

The Bill would have prevented the Malone case—many of my right hon. and hon. Friends have made that point—and must be amended. The Bill as it stands would have meant that Mr. Malone could not have gone to the Strasbourg court, which would not then have leaned on the British Government to introduce this legislation. The Bill sets up a toothless tribunal of lawyers, which will not allay the fears that have risen as a result of the "20:20 Vision" programme and from other factors.

I have a specific question for the Minister. My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) asked for an independent inquiry into the allegations made by that programme and others. There are many reasons for wanting the inquiry, not least in justice to the relatives and friends of Mr. Harry Newton. Many people have seen the complaints of his family and friends that after his death he was unfairly named by Miss Massiter in the television programme. If that is correct, we should be able to say so. It is wrong to leave this slur, if it is a slur, on that man's name after his death.

I understand that today Mr. Ken Gill, the general secretary of AUEW/TASS, was visited by two men from Scotland Yard, I am told on the instructions of the Director of Public Prosecutions. The senior officer was a Chief Superintendent Bates. Mr. Gill was questioned about the alleged break-in referred to in the "20:20 Vision" programme and was asked whether he had known about it. His response was to say that, if he had known about it, he would have reported it. I want to know from the Minister whether the Government are carrying out further inquiries into the allegations in the "20:20 Vision" programme. If not, what was the purpose of that visit to Mr. Gill? If they are carrying out inquiries, what sort of report will be presented to the House in due course?

The Home Secretary must answer another question, which he avoided earlier when it was asked by one of my hon. Friends. If people who tap telephones are to give evidence to the tribunal, will they be protected from prosecution under the Official Secrets Act? There should be a fairly clear and simple answer to that. The Secretary of State was wrong to say, as I thought he did this afternoon—I shall check Hansard to make sure—that the tribunal can examine the Home Secretary's reasons for authorising a warrant. Clause 2(2) provides:

> "The Secretary of State shall not issue a warrant under this section unless he considers that the warrant is necessary."

The words "unless he considers" give him the responsibility for judgment, and that matter is not covered effectively in the schedule. He will have to amend the Bill if he is to stick by the words that he used in opening the debate.

The Government have made a piecemeal approach to the problem, which does not relate only to the interception of mail and the tapping of telephones. As we heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam), who made a helpful speech, and my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), both of whom have detailed knowledge of the technology behind the methods that we are examining, we should be concerned about the much wider area of surreptitious surveillance. There are electronic telescopes and lasers that pick up vibrations. In addition, there is electronic eavesdropping. Only a few weeks ago on 14 February, the BBC's "Tomorrow's World" programme showed a way in which, with about £100 worth of equipment and relatively limited electronic knowledge, one could eavesdrop on a computer terminal several floors up in an office block from a vehicle outside. Technology has been moving fast for several years.

That brings me to another important point. It is no good relying only on the methods that we have used in the past. If we consider what other countries are doing, what we have learnt from our experiences of recent years, and changing technology, we should recognise that there is a need for change in the way that we control our security services and deal with telephone tapping, postal interceptions and surveillance generally. My right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton read out advertisements from Exchange and Mart for the sort of equipment that can be bought over the counter. I understand that in a shop in Tottenham one can buy the equipment that is used by MI5. If the position is becoming so stupid, we must examine it in more detail than we have done for some time.

Opposition Members—some Conservative Members tried to deny it—have said that we recognise the need for surveillance. No one has said anything different, and I certainly did not during my time as Opposition spokesman for Northern Ireland. What is crucial is to keep such surveillance under the control of the democratic system and, as far as possible, to keep it within the confines of the law. One area where tapping, interception and surveillance are extremely important is terrorism. That has been mentioned several times during the debate. A year or two ago, in conversation with the senior police officer in west Germany who was responsible for capturing the Baader Meinhof group, I was told of the difficulties that the police had experienced in capturing that group and staying within the constitutional law which contains regulations on the rights of the privacy of the individual. The police tracked down the group to a café where it held its meetings and planned its bombings and killings. They then planted a bug in one table of the café and one of their men activated the bug at the appropriate time, but to do that, at one stage they went outside the law.

The Opposition say that such an activity is undesirable and above all that it is wholly unacceptable if it is not under the control of the democratic procedures of Parliament or some suitable organisation of a similar type.

From the recent tracking of the arms cache of the Provisional IRA in Buckinghamshire, we know of another example where surveillance was appropriate. It is also appropriate in certain crimes, of which drug trafficking is one. Another area is espionage. After that, it is hard to justify some of the areas that have been suggested as appropriate for surveillance.

I am dubious, as are a number of my hon. Friends, about such phrases as subversion, economic well-being, national security and serious crime. If we are to write these into the laws of the land, we had better be clear what we are writing in and give them careful consideration.

Subversion in particular worries me a great deal. While I appreciate that it is not included in the three areas referred to in the Bill, what worries me is that subversion has been used by a number of people on a number of occasions as a reason for surveillance. Subversion means to try to overthrow a Government, but there is nothing wrong with trying to overthrow a Government as long as one does it within the law.

This brings us to the important point of keeping within the law. Although I do not usually find myself in agreement with Lord Denning, I hope that in Committee we will be able to consider in much greater depth his interpretation that subversion should mean only attempts to overthrow the Government by illegal means—in other words, that a criminal offence must be planned or committed. If we do not do that, we will slip into the area of political crimes.

We have difficulty in legislation of this type, because we recognise that we are dealing with an area which is strictly neither within the remit of the criminal law nor within the remit of the political. It overlaps the two areas. That is one reason that some countries, which we should examine, have gone down the road of having both judicial and ministerial warrants. There may be a lot to be said for that. If one does not want to go down that road, there is a case for arguing whether one should have judicial warrants or ministerial warrants. One recognises the legal aspect of the problem; the other recognises the political aspect.

It troubles me considerably when, together with the Prevention of Terrorism Act 1974 we put on the statute book legislation which is answerable no longer to a court of law but to Ministers. It is a dangerous road to go down unless we consider the implications carefully. There need to be checks before the act of interception—that is the issue of warrants—and accountability, and checks after the act of interception.

That brings me to another point with which a number of my hon. Friends have dealt fully, the question of a Select Committee. I have felt for a long time that a Select Committee of the House to oversee the security services might be a useful way of considering the problem afresh, keeping it under permanent review, and not demoralising the security forces by the suggestions made by Conservative Members—that we pretend that nothing has happened and that serious allegations have not been made on television programmes. To try to push this under the carpet does no good to the morale of the security forces, and it certainly does no good to the concept of the democratic liberties of the House.

The Victorians of all people would have been ashamed of the Conservative party and the way in which it tries to avoid the question of civil liberties and democratic rights. They would not have ducked these issues. It is significant that it was under a Conservative Government in the last century that committees of inquiry were held in the House to investigate the police. They do not talk about doing that now; that would be disruptive. In many respects, the Victorians looked after our democratic traditions much better than the present Government have ever thought of doing.

In that way, the Conservatives have betrayed and undermined the traditions of Parliament and in the same way, if they are not careful, they will betray and undermine the security services, because without effective democratic control, those services will get out of control, and any security officer worth his salt in a democratic society will not want such a situation to develop.

We shall seek to make this a much better Bill in Committee. If we do not succeed there, when we return to government we shall put the security services under effective and proper democratic control.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Waddington): The House was fortunate indeed to hear today two former Home Secretaries, one of whom later became Prime Minister, speak on these important matters. How different was the tone of their speeches—they being people who had to carry responsibility for these issues—from the warlike offering of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) and the effort of the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), who also did not have to carry the onerous responsibilities in this sphere.

The right hon. Member for Chesterfield seemed to suggest that there was some difficulty—at least, he found it difficult—in saying what was and what was not parliamentary democracy. I found that frightening. He was followed by my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Terlezki), who knows well what is and what is not parliamentary democracy, and the vast majority of hon. Members have no difficulty in knowing what it is.

The right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) put matters into perspective when he said that the Bill was an improvement, but not a solution. Everything came back to the integrity of the Home Secretary, he said, and he thought that there was no reason to doubt that. The Bill would produce some element of safeguard, he added.

The right hon. Member for Gorton went wide of the Bill. We do not resent that, because many hon. Members did the same. He dealt with the "20:20 Vision" programme and with the conduct of the operations of MI5. One must contrast his treatment of the allegations in the film—"I am not making allegations," he said, but it sounded precious like it—with the speech of the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees), which was a masterpiece of moderation, and we recall what he said about allegations concerning a person named Tommy Roberts.

Mr. Michael Forsyth (Stirling): Is my hon. and learned Friend aware that the researcher for the "20:20 Vision" programme, Mr. Gerry Gable, was a Communist party candidate in 1962, that he has a criminal record for breaking and entering while impersonating a GPO officer, and that his counsel claimed in his defence that he was hoping to obtain material which might be useful to the special branch? Given that that man was responsible for the programme, does my hon. and learned Friend think that we can place any credibility in it?

Mr. Waddington: It is not my job tonight to say whether the allegations in the programme were correct —[HON. MEMBERS: "Why not?"] I will come to that shortly, and there is an obvious reason for that. The House has heard what my hon. Friend said.

Mr. Corbett: Is the Minister aware that the smear allegations of the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) are 20 years late and of course are lapsed under the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act? Will he reflect on the point that perhaps what his hon. Friend is more concerned about is that that senior and experienced journalist was responsible for the programme "Maggie's Militant Tendency", which linked Tory party candidates and Members with the National Front?

Mr. Waddington: Really, I cannot get involved in these matters. The House has now heard a little more about the background of the Bill which it did not know before. As the debate has gone so wide, I must, as a matter of courtesy, deal with some of these matters outside the Bill as such.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw) asked about a new head of MI5. There is to be a new head and he is to be somebody from outside. It is not customary to name the director general of MI5 and I shall not breach that practice tonight. It is interesting that he was selected two months ago, so his appointment has nothing whatsoever to do with these matters which have causes so much excitement in the past few weeks.

The right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth said that there ought to be somebody to which or some way in which an employee of MI5 can complain. The main thing surely is that the management should be effective and that the Home Secretary and the director general should take a keen interest in the morale of the employees and ensure that it remains high. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary mentioned earlier this afternoon the keen interest he has in these matters and his determination to play his part in that regard.

The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) talked about a visit by the police to the home of Mr. Ken Gill. I did not quite understand what, if anything, the hon. Gentleman was complaining about. It would seem to me that the police were quite obviously carrying out an investigation to see whether a criminal offence had been committed, as alleged by other persons.

It is important to make absolutely clear what we are and what we are not doing in the Bill and how inappropriate —one might say cynical—is the Opposition amendment when it refers to vague and sweeping criteria and to "interception on an unacceptably wide basis".

Mr. Barron: It seemed earlier that the Minister would comment on many of the things that were said in the programme in which Mr. Ken Gill was mentioned. I should like the hon. and learned Gentleman to address himself to the question that I put to him during the debate and which I repeat now. Presumably, from what he says, what was said in the "20:20 Vision" programme was not true, so why does he not comment on it? Why does he not tell us what allegations were made against Mr. Ken Gill? Why does he not comment on the allegations that Christian CND, CND itself and many other organisations have been infiltrated? Many hon. Members on both sides of the House would agree that this would not be against the national interest.

Mr. Waddington: The hon. Gentleman will remember that I did not say that I would comment on the allegations in the film; I said that I would explain why I would not deal with them. I shall do that now out of courtesy to the hon. Gentleman and to the hon. Members for Birmingham Erdington (Mr. Corbett) and Hammersmith, all of whom mentioned this matter.

We would do well to remember that a Home Secretary has never said whether or not in a particular case interception ever took place — for obvious reasons. Home Secretaries and Prime Ministers have never answered questions about the operation of our security service. A moment of thought would tell all hon. Members why that is so. A cascade of questions about a variety of matters would eventually give clues about how, why and in what circumstances certain operations were carried out.

The right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth said in 1978:

"I shall adhere to the normal practice of not commenting on security matters."—[Official Report, 29 June 1978; Vol. 952, c. 631.]

He was right then, and I am right now, to say that that is the practice and will remain the practice.

Since 1979 we have not departed from the practices of previous Governments. We are not seeking new powers now. We are seeking to put in statute form the very powers that the Opposition operated when they were in power.

The complaint of the right hon. Member for Gorton is no more than that every word in the 1980 White Paper explaining why an application on behalf of the security service for a warrant is not spelt out. We have made clear that we have operated and shall continue to operate in line with the criteria laid down over the years. The powers in the Bill are not new. What are new are the safeguards surrounding the use of the powers. What are new are the procedures whereby a person who has been the subject of interception, which has not been properly authorised, may obtain redress.

The Bill detracts not at all from the individual's existing rights. On the contrary, it extends those rights. The Opposition amendment says that the Bill provides "insufficient safeguards for those adversely affected by unlawful interception."

That is downright cheek coming from an Opposition who, when in government, did nothing about that. They certainly cannot say that the European court had not by then given its judgment, because that part of the Opposition amendment has nothing to do with authorised interception. They are saying that we are not putting in this Bill sufficient safeguards against unlawful interception. That is cheek from an Opposition who throughout the years that they had Government responsibilities did precisely nothing in that area.

Clause 1 makes unlawful interception a criminal offence. Unlike the Labour Government, we are strengthening the safeguards against unlawful interception. We are making it a serious criminal offence. No Government of which Opposition right hon. and hon. Members were members did that.

Everyone, apart from the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo), accepts the need for a power of interception to deal with those who prey on our society and who are out to destroy it. It would be ridiculous——

Mr. Mikardo: The Minister must not say that. I spent a substantial part of my speech saying that I accepted the need for interception to deal with enemies of the state and with criminals.

Mr. Waddington: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for intervening. I had to leave the Chamber while he was speaking, and I obviously misread the notes given to me. I would not have made that allegation if I had understood the way in which he put the matter. I shall read carefully in Hansard tomorrow what the hon. Gentleman said. [Interruption.] I do not know what Opposition Members are getting so steamed up about. I have been on the Front Bench since half past 3. I have had to leave from time to time. When I leave, I have friends who are kind enough to make notes of what has happened, and I do them the courtesy of reading what is said. Unfortunately, perhaps my glasses were not working as well as they used to, and I shall have to have another eye test.

So I can start again and, with due courtesy to the hon. Gentleman, say that everyone would concede the need for a power of interception——

Mr. Mikardo: I accept the Minister's apology.

Mr. Waddington: —to deal with those who would prey on our society and are out to destroy it. It would be quite ridiculous if serious criminals could use the phone to plot their crimes secure in the knowledge that no one could find out what they were up to. It is our job, therefore, to ensure that the powers to intercept are adequate to meet the need, but it is also our job to ensure that the system commands the confidence of the great mass of law-abiding citizens who want their privacy adequately safeguarded, but certainly do not want the security service and the police hobbled and hamstrung in their efforts to root out the few evildoers in our midst.

[Mr. Waddington]

I therefore heartily agree with all that has been said by many hon. Members on both sides of the House about the need for a balanced approach. That is what we are out to achieve in the Bill. The people expect—and they will continue to get—a balanced approach. The need to safeguard the privacy of communications in the public system is balanced with the need to protect the interests of society as a whole.

I do not pretend that it is easy to get the balance right. I am sure that wise members of Opposition parties realise how easily we could, in our anxiety to be more open in these matters, do great damage to the country. While debating interception, and, indeed, the wider question of the operations of the security service, we would all do well to remember what my noble Friend Lord Home of the Hirsel, with all his wisdom and experience, said during the debate on the Telecommunications Bill in the House of Lords on 19 March 1984, which was referred to by several other hon. Members. He said:

"I have in my time known two Governments virtually wreck their secret services by attempts at open government and we cannot afford anything like that in this country."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 19 March 1984; Vol 449, c. 1036.]

Therefore, we know that the operation that we are carrying out involves a delicate balance. It involves no undue intrusion into the privacy of individual citizens, but sufficient powers in the hands of our security services, the police and so on, so that they can carry out their duties properly.

Some hon. Members have expressed regret that we are not taking the opportunity to deal with the whole question of surveillance in the Bill. That was the theme of more than one hon. Member's speech, such as that of the hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam)——

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This concerns the reference that the Minister made to a Member of another place. My understanding was that it is not in order to quote such a person unless he is a Minister. Is that the case, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that the Minister was quoting from the last Session, not from the current Session. That is in order.

Mr. Waddington: The hon. Member for Blaydon suggested that we should have dealt with the whole question of surveillance, but I remind the House that what he said was in marked contrast to what was said by the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South who thought that, although we should deal with the question of surveillance, that would be properly the subject of another Bill.

There is a special case for dealing with the interception of communications passing through public communications systems, because somebody has committed such a communication to a carrier over which he has no control and is entitled to believe that, except for good reason, his privacy will be safeguarded. Furthermore, legislation on surveillance would pose many far more difficult problems. I doubt very much whether there is yet a consensus in the House about how we should deal with those matters.

Mr. McWilliam rose——

Mr. Waddington: I must get on.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) complained that we were not implementing the recommendation of the Royal Commission on criminal procedure to the effect that police surveillance should be regulated by statute. In my view, magistrates should not be expected to form judgments about what are essentially operational matters for the police, but that is not the important thing. Certainly my view is not important. It must not be forgotten that the Government have already taken some very important steps in surveillance outside the range of interception.

This Government first published the guidelines on police surveillance. This is relevant to the speech of the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas). Those guidelines have now been strengthened. They contain more detailed and rigorous procedures than were in the 1977 guidelines. For instance, the chief constable's personal authority is required in more circumstances. Secondly, the House has heard today that the Law Commission's proposals on breach of confidence are to be implemented, which means that where a person acquires information about another by the use of a device for surreptitious surveillance and then divulges it the other person may have a right of action against that person. This seems a sensible approach—not control over the act of surveillance itself but regulation of the use of the product of surveillance. The hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) cannot have been in the House when my right hon. and learned Friend announced his decision in that regard, so an important part of the hon. Member's speech was misconceived.

To deal briefly with some of the matters raised on clause 2, I was asked about the power to intercept in the interests of national security. I remind the House that that phrase has appeared in numerous statutes brought in by Governments of different political persuasions. It has never been further defined. Hon. Members can find all the guidance that they could possibly need in the White Paper and the other documents which have been referred to. There is power to issue a warrant for the purpose of preventing or detecting serious crime.

In answer to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy, a "serious arrestable offence" as defined in the Police and Criminal Evidence Act can be less serious than a serious crime as defined in the White Paper. That is because section 116 defines as serious an offence which has led to "serious financial loss to any person."

If we substituted the definition that is in the Police and Criminal Evidence Act we would be weakening rather than strengthening the controls on tapping.

Then there is the power to intercept to safeguard the economic well-being of the United Kingdom. Once again there seems to have been a number of misconceptions among the Opposition. The right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South said that he had never excercised the power. I remind him that this part of the Bill is all about acts and intentions of people abroad, and I can assure him, as he would be assured by many of his right hon. Friends, that this power has been exercised for a long time.

I stress again, in view of what was said by the hon. Member for Rother Valley, that this power has nothing to do with Fred Harraway, wage bargaining and disputes that have taken place here, there and somewhere else. An economic well-being warrant can only be issued to acquire information relating to the acts or intentions of persons outside the British Isles. The information sought must be about overseas matters, so an economic well-being warrant can be issued only to ascertain the intention of a person outside the country. The power cannot be used to obtain information about any sort of trivial money matter either, because the Secretary of State has to be satisfied that the phone tapping is necessary to safeguard our economic well-being. It must be necessary not just to check up on people but to protect our economy at the international level. The House will have noted that the phrase "economic well-being" is the phrase used in article 8 of the convention, but, as the House has seen, we have introduced a qualification that does not appear in the convention by limiting the use of the warrant to acquire information about acts or persons overseas.

The hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) said that the Government's object was to appoint to the tribunal policemen who are amenable to the Government of the day. That was outrageous. The hon. Member cannot have read the Bill, because the method of appointment to the tribunal is almost the same as the method of appointment of the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration. The tribunal will be entirely independent of Government. Its purpose is not just to check the paperwork. It will inquire whether the Home Secretary has properly authorised interception in a particular case.

In answer to the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery and the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan), I point out that the powers of the tribunal are analogous to those of the High Court hearing an application for judicial review. Has the Home Secretary exercised his administrative discretion reasonably, bearing in mind the criteria? He cannot have done so if he has not observed the criteria.

I was asked about compensation for those who were found to be the subject of phone tapping that had not been properly authorised. It was said that we had not dealt with article 13 of the convention, which demands that there should be redress when the convention is violated. We have met article 13 by providing for compensation. [Interruption.] I know that it is late for the right hon. Member for Gorton, who is yawning, but he has a great deal to learn. I hope that he does so before the Committee, or we shall have to waste many hours educating him, because he clearly does not yet understand the Bill.

One cannot have a person going to the tribunal to find out whether his phone is being tapped. One cannot have a crook, for example, going to the tribunal to ask whether his phone is being tapped, and therefore there must be special rules of procedure. Because we must have those special rules of procedure, there is a tribunal. Unfortunately, we cannot leave this matter to the ordinary courts.

I have been asked what would happen if a person were to go to the tribunal to complain of an irregularity. It has been suggested that, on the face of it, he would be guilty of an offence under the Official Secrets Act as a result of mentioning such matters to the tribunal. That is the most arrant nonsense. If that argument is right, the Member who talked the nonsense is saying that no person who is an employee of any of the relevant organisations should go to the police to complain about the fact that an offence has been committed because by doing so he will be guilty of an offence himself and will find himself in a lock-up instead of the chap against whom he is complaining.

This is a good Bill and I think that we shall have an interesting time in Committee trying to make it better. We shall have a job to make it better, because it is an extremely good Bill. We should remember the heavy responsibility that we are bearing. It is unpleasant for Ministers to have to tell hon. Members that we must adhere to the convention that allegations of tapping are not either confirmed or denied. It is not pleasant to have to refuse to answer questions about security matters. It is easy for irresponsible journalists to have a field day printing the invention or the truth, or the fact or the fabrication, which is fed to them without regard to the national interest. The majority of hon. Members know how vital to the national interest is the security service and how essential, although distasteful, is the interception power for security reasons and in the fight against crime.

The time has come when we should spell out in our law precisely what powers lie in the hands of the Secretary of State. The time has come when there should be an independent tribunal to which the citizen can complain and a statutory commissioner to carry on the work of the monitor and keep under continuing review the manner in which the Secretary of State exercises his powers. That is what the Bill is about. It preserves necessary powers which were exercised by the Labour Government not so long ago. It is a Bill which provides new safeguards for the individual, and I commend it to the House.

Immobilisation of Vehicles

12.11 am

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): I beg to move,

That the draft Immobilisation of Vehicles illegally parked (London Boroughs of Westminster, and Kensington and Chelsea) (Continuation) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 25th February, be approved.

The effect of the order will be to continue the use of wheel clamps by the Metropolitan police in central London for a further two years from this May. This extension is sought at the time when the whole question of parking in London and the metropolitan areas is under review. Powers for the police to wheel-clamp illegally parked vehicles in designated areas, initially on an experimental basis, were approved by the House in the Transport Act 1982. Parts of Westminster and Kensington and Chelsea were subsequently designated by order as the experimental area where the police could use clamps for a period of two years from May 1983. The aim was to deter illegal parking and imrove traffic flows in an area of central London suffering from severe problems of illegal parking. We made it clear that the results of the experiment would be carefully monitored. A report by the Transport and Road Research Laboratory evaluating the first six months' experience of clamping was published by the Department in October 1984. The report provides a comprehensive description of the effects of clamping, and I am grateful to the laboratory for its work.

The report shows that the main change in parking habits after clamping began was that vehicles were left on yellow lines for shorter periods. Although the actual number of illegal parking acts remained about the same, the number of vehicles parked on yellow lines at any one time fell by about 30 per cent. in the middle of the day, and the time they were parked at the kerbside was reduced by 40 per cent. The amount of illegal parking in residents' bays in the experimental area was reduced by about 30 per cent. There was little change in parking at meters.

Traffic speeds in the experimental area were higher in the period after clamping. Despite increases in the volume of traffic compared with control areas nearby. The reduction in journey times associated with reduced parking on the street was estimated at between 8 and 14 per cent., implying an annual saving in motorists' costs of between £9 million and £15 million at 1979 prices. There was also a saving of £2 million to £3 million on fuel and wear and tear on vehicles. The TRRL report concluded that in the first six months clamping improved compliance with existing parking regulations, probably because of the visual impact of the clamp and its consequent deterrent effect upon other drivers.

Following publication of the TRRL report, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State consulted widely on the findings. The response showed general support for the experiment and for continuing the scheme in central London for at least a further period—for example, to establish how long-lasting the effects will be. A total of 34 responses were received from official organisations, private firms and individuals. Of these, 26 were in favour of wheel clamps being continued, at least for a further period; five were against wheel clamps and three commented neutrally.

The main points made in favour of clamping in response to my right hon. Friend's consultations were the welcome reduction in illegal parking; the improved traffic flow and safety; the easing of problems for delivery drivers; and the much improved conditions in residents' parking bays. The main points made against clamping by the five who were against it were that it was a deterrent to shoppers and damaged trade; that it impeded essential trades—for example, service engineers; that it continued obstructive parking, particularly when there were delays in declamping; that it would damage the relations between the police and the public; and that it over-penalised minor offences.

Mr. Jerry Wiggin (Weston-super-Mare): Is my hon. Friend aware that Westminster city council admits that in a great part of its area there is a substantial lack of residents' parking? When she has made the clamping scheme work, will she attend to the problems of providing off-street parking space and diverting some of the money from parking meters into providing it? It is about 25 years overdue.

Mrs. Chalker: My hon. Friend anticipates at least some of what I shall say. The problems of parking in central London are not restricted to Westminster. I hope that they will be tackled on an even wider basis, beyond the work already being done by Westminster city council.

The TRRL research could not cover the extent to which the successful results of the experiment would persist in the longer term. That was a point taken up by several of those who wrote in response to our consultations. The Automobile Association, for example, recognised the apparent benefits to traffic movement but considered that the period over which the benefits had been assessed was too short to be reasonably certain that they would be maintained.

Powers to clamp vehicles should not be sought lightly. When we have discussed this previously, I have told the House that we must be clear about what we are doing. That is why we entered into such a large amount of research.

We have concluded that a two-year extension of the present order would be justified to enable the effects of clamping in the present area to be further assessed. We shall use the extended period which the order affords to monitor the situation further, again with the help of the TRRL.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Will my hon. Friend take special note of the diplomats who continue to abuse the parking system throughout Westminster, and whose cars, I understand are not clamped now, and will not be tomorrow.

Mrs. Chalker: My hon. Friend may remember that when clamping began we changed registrations for diplomats to X and D registrations. We reduced the number of those persons who, by virtue of their diplomatic status, could avoid clamping. The problem has not been cut out altogether, but it has been reduced. No doubt we shall do better as time continues. If the experiment were extended further, that would also help. We reduced by 16 per cent. the number of vehicles exempted from clamping. The vehicles that are receiving X registration plates are eligible for wheel clamping. In the last quarter of 1984, 40 such vehicles were clamped. Action has been taken. It may not satisfy hon. Members yet, but other plans in the revision of the Vienna convention may come into effect.

We also intend to use the two-year period to continue to review possible ways of improving mobility and parking arrangements in central London. My right hon. Friend and I are keen to try to improve conditions, not just for motorists, but to make London more accessible to all road users, residents and businesses. More generally, we want to see all our cities working efficiently. Traffic is their life blood and if their arteries become clogged, the cities do not function.

We need to devise better arrangements for the future — more positive arrangements than merely punishing those who flout the rules. We want to see the capital city thriving. Improved mobility and legal parking are essential to this. That takes up the point of my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin).

The Select Committee recently reported on road safety. One of its recommendations was that central and local Government should consider more positive action to enable motorists to park legally. That is something we are keen to do. Indeed, as we said in our 1983 White Paper on Policy for Roads in England:

> "Improved enforcement must be accompanied by a sustained and imaginative examination of the scope for providing improved parking facilities to meet the needs of road users".

On-street parking is largely a matter for local authorities, while for off-street both the private sector and local authorities have a part to play.

When my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell), the then Secretary of State for Transport, asked Parliament to approve the clamping powers in 1982, he asked the Greater London council to review the supply of parking in central London, and the GLC passed the request on to the inner London boroughs. Westminster city council responded by instigating a detailed street-by-street review of yellow lines in its area. As a result it has identified nearly 1,400 extra on-street spaces which can be created by converting yellow line to parking bays. Westminster council is now embarking on a further survey to establish the scope for increasing parking spaces still further by means of minor highway alterations or by converting parallel-to-the-kerb parking to diagonal parking where that can safely be done. A new 360-space car park has recently opened at Cambridge Circus, and Westminster council has plans to increase off-street parking further.

Not long ago I had discussions with the London local authority associations—the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, the GLC, the London Boroughs Association and the Association of Local Authorities. The meeting was at their request, to consider a range of parking and enforcement issues. I am to meet them again shortly to consider with them how best we can rationalise the use of road and pavement space. But all the associations urged that meanwhile the wheel clamps experiment should be continued since it has shown real benefits in reducing illegal parking and improving traffic flow. The fears expressed by some hon. Members during the passage of the clamping powers in 1982—for example, about likely damage to the relations between the police and the public —have, I am pleased to say, proved largely groundless. To a great extent, this reflects the careful and sensitive way in which the police have exercised their clamping powers.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mrs. Chalker: I shall give way in one second. Wheel clamping has on the whole been accepted. I know that there are exceptions and that hon. Members have stories brought to them from time to time, but on the whole, the way in which the matter has been handled has not been as fearful as some hon. Members anticipated.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Will my hon. Friend tell me why on earth, when she has given such an excellent report of how the experiment is working, objections to it are small, and it has undoubtedly helped in the area where we are during the week, she is continuing it only in time and not in space? Why does she not extend it to the rest of London?

Mrs. Chalker: I was extremely tempted to extend the scheme more widely. However, I have discovered that caution can sometimes be a good friend when deciding on fairly large changes in parking, as we are envisaging for London. I certainly wish to improve the position for motorists and all those who seek access. We have sought a further experiment. It is up to other local authorities to apply to the Secretary of State if they wish the area to be extended to include their areas. We would not be unwilling to do that. However, we are keen to ensure that the whole of parking for the future is examined thoroughly now, which is why we are extending the experiment for a further two years. It will not prevent us from taking other steps in the meantime, if local authorities wish those steps to be taken.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): My hon. Friend mentioned the relationship with the police. Will she examine the gap that can arise between the time that a person has gone to the police pound and paid his fine and the time that the clamp is taken off? I have heard reports from my area of people having to wait for four hours to be declamped. That does nothing to help the police, and it does not remove the vehicle which should not be there. I believe that that area should be examined closely.

Mrs. Chalker: I am sure that my hon. Friend is right to say that there are what I would call exceptions. The period of four hours is certainly an exception. In general, I should be surprised if the majority of motorists had to wait for more than an hour. I have had reports of two-hour waits at very busy times. But in considering the entire parking problem in London, and the relationship between clamping vehicles that are illegally parked but not obstructing traffic and having to tow away vehicles that are obstructing traffic, the Home Office and my Department will be taking into account the way in which the teams are working and the manpower that they need to operate the system.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): If I understand the law correctly, the Secretary of State can extend the area at the request of the authority concerned. Has the Department of Transport received such requests either from the Greater London council or from any other local authority?

Mrs. Chalker: There have been no formal requests to extend the area from any local authorities. There was some discussion at one of my many meetings about parking with a metropolitan area in the north, but that was not followed up with a formal request.

Many people had fears about clamping at the beginning, and I understood those fears. But what has happened is that central London residents—as my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Mrs. Kellett-Bowman) said—have been able, for the first time in several years, to park in the spaces set aside for residents in London. A private survey carried out after the first five months of the experiment showed that the majority of motorists in London believed that wheel clamps were not only desirable but a necessity. That finding shows the distance that we have come since the scheme started.

Dr. Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead): Are the fines sufficiently large to enable the police to speed up the removal of vehicles? The basis of the problem is the removal of the vehicle, not just the clamping of it.

Mrs. Chalker: I am well aware of my hon. Friend's anxiety. The police are considering ways of speeding both operations, as I told my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery). We accept that clamping is a drastic measure — just as towing away is a drastic measure—and that once people have paid their fines, they want to get their cars back. But what has appeared from the first two years of the experiment is that the law-abiding motorist is helped to get about more easily, because the anti-social minority who flout parking regulations are deterred by this measure.

One thing that follows on what my hon. Friend the Member for Windsor and Maidenhead (Dr. Glyn) said is that the Government intend that clamping should pay for itself, as other things should pay for themselves. The present declamping fee of £19·50 is based on an estimate of costs that was made before the start of the experiment in 1983. We have reviewed the charge in the light of operational experience as well as the charge for vehicle removal. It is likely that the charge for clamping will have to be increased from £19·50 to £25 and the removal charge by a broadly proportional amount. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will be consulting on the new charges proposed. The fee to be charged is not part of the order, and will be covered by a subsequent order coming before the House.

If the House and the other place approve the order, the traffic authorities will be able to apply to my right hon. Friend for the use of the wheel clamps to be extended by order to other areas. As I said to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), we have not received a formal request for the use of clamps outside London. Should any come to me, I shall consider such requests on their merits in the light of the traffic and the parking situation in the areas concerned.

The continuation of the powers for another two years will help us to assess the true value of wheel clamps. It will also enable us to try to find better methods of enforcement, better ways to help motorists and other road users to go where they need to and better ways to make sure that they pay for the space that they use when they get there.

In the meantime, we have to continue to give the police the tools to enforce the law. We have found that clamping is of assistance. I am sure that it will continue to be so, and I ask the House to approve the order.

Mr. Roger Stott (Wigan): I shall not detain the House for long. Indeed, I reminded the Minister a little earlier this evening that I was the author of the amendment on wheel clamps that she approved in 1982. The hon. Lady will remember that she and I were members of the Committee which considered the Transport Bill in 1982 and debated the problems of illegal parking in the capital. It was clear that the fines being imposed were no deterrent at all to people who left their cars hanging round Chelsea, Westminster and elsewhere. Therefore, it was important that we considered alternative methods at that time.

I considered in some detail the experiences that were gained in the United States when the method of wheel clamping was first introduced. As a result of that, in 1982 I tabled an amendment to the Transport Bill in Committee. I asked the hon. Lady, who was the Minister in the Department of Transport at that time, whether she would consider favourably the possibility of an experiment on a limited basis over a limited geographic area of the capital for two years to wheel-clamp the cars of motorists who parked illegally. I am grateful to the Minister that she has taken that on board.

It was paradoxical that the two people who were pushing for the measure, apart from the residents of London in the affected areas, were Sir Kenneth Newman, the chief of the Metropolitan police, and my comrade, Mr. Dave Wetzel, chairman of the Greater London Council transportation committee. With a combination of forces like that, I suspect that the case is irresistible. Sir Kenneth Newman and Dave Wetzel pressed me to table the amendment in Committee for all the reasons that the Minister has enumerated. Both they and I felt that this would be one of the most effective deterrents to illegal parking in the centre of the capital.

I recall that the hon. Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Griffiths), who frequently tilts at conventional windmills, disapproved of the idea and voted against it. If he has an opportunity to speak in this debate, he may say that he intends to oppose it tonight. For my part, and that of my hon. Friends — [HON. MEMBERS: "Where are they?"] — who are elsewhere in the building, we shall not press the matter to a Division because the experiment has been successful in helping to deter illegal parking in the capital city.

The Minister pointed out that there had been a 30 per cent. reduction in illegal parking in the area covered by the order. The result, as she pointed out, had been a better running speed and flow of traffic through those areas. It was clear that fines alone were no deterrent to some people.

I am not sure whether, and if so how many, Conservative Members travel by tube. Those who do will be familiar with an LRT advertisement which depicts a tube train with a wheel clamp attached to it, with the slogan below, "That'll be the day." Of course, tube trains will not be clamped, but that advertisement gets the message across to people who park illegally, who do not consider the people who live in the areas where they leave their cars, and who are rich enough, having parked illegally, to pay the fines.

The clamping experiment has been successful and the Opposition will not oppose its reintroduction for a further two years. I hope that at the end of that period the Minister will evaluate the statistical evidence and make clamping a permanent feature of our capital city. Tonight we — the Government and the Opposition — are showing that we are determined to deal with those who flout the law and park illegally.

In two years from now, when the experiment has run for four years, Parliament should make this a permanent feature of our means of handling illegal parking. At that time we may be in power and a Labour Minister of Transport will take that step.

It may also be possible to extend clamping to areas outside London. The Minister said that other authorities had not made such a proposal to her. However, if it became a permanent feature of our way of life in London, authorities outside the capital might wish to follow suit.

As I said, the experiment has proved successful and has done what it was intended to do. It has done what I intended my amendment to do. I am grateful that the Minister accepted my amendment on that occasion and that this legislation was enacted. I assure her of our total support tonight for its continuation.

Mr. Peter Griffiths (Portsmouth, North): I did not like the idea of wheel clamping when the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) first raised it some years ago. I did not like it when the Minister introduced the order two years ago and I have heard, read and seen absolutely nothing in the intervening period to make me change my mind.

I do not argue that wheel clamping is not effective. The same arguments used to be put forward for public hangings, which were very effective — not that I am saying that my hon. Friend is suggesting that for illegal parking — but the idea that if the punishment is draconian enough it will be effective cannot be sustained when one is looking for ways of enforcing the law as fairly as possible as between individuals, while at the same time impinging as little as possible on their normal activities. We should ensure that if they break the law they accept their punishment, but we should not make a disaster out of what is a misdemeanour.

We are talking about parking on a yellow line, staying a little too long on a parking meter or nipping into a shop to get a packet of cigarettes and leaving the car in a bay that is reserved for residents. I do not condone any of these things and I do not do any of them, although I keep my car in Chelsea. However, I understand that there may well be many occasions when a law-abiding motorist is kept longer than he expected waiting to pay for goods in a shop or to pick up a passenger at a station and does not get back to the meter before his time expires; or he may be driving round waiting to pick up his wife with all the shopping or to collect his children from school. I stay in Sloane Square right opposite a school which is a great source of parking problems. Should a man leave small children wandering about the school because he cannot wait on a double yellow line?

There are reasons for these misdemeanours. There is no criminal intent. They are caused by the normal everyday decisions that motorists have to take.

If the culprits were subject to an equal penalty, I would not be delaying the House tonight, but the penalty is not equal as between individuals. In the first place, the time it takes to get a car unclamped varies enormously, and it also varies greatly in its importance to the individual concerned. One person may simply have been doing some shopping and is going home, and it is inconvenient to have to wait. The Minister says it will be perhaps only two hours, not four, but two hours can cause great inconvenience. There are people who have urgent appointments, or have to meet other forms of transport, or have business to do. For them this punishment is far more serious. It is the unfairness in this to which I strongly object.

There is also the problem of the cost. If one overstays one's time on a meter and a traffic warden discovers it and puts a sticker on the windscreen, the fixed penalty has to be paid within a certain time. There is time to ensure that sufficient funds are available. It is true that the cost of paying the fine and having the vehicle unclamped is not enormous by present-day standards, but many people are running motor cars on a shoestring, on a tight budget, because they need their cars for domestic or business purposes. The burden of the cost varies enormously as between individuals—the wealthy to whom it is just a nuisance and others who find it a grave burden.

I therefore suggest to my hon. Friend that she has introduced a system which is inherently unfair and will only be made more unfair if she increases the charges as she has suggested. If this scheme is so good and so popular, why has no other London authority suggested taking it up? The scheme is imposed from above. It has not been requested by local authorities. It has certainly not been requested by motorists. Motorists feel that they are a type of game for which there is no close season. They believe that the Department of Transport should ease the lot of those who are using all transport systems, including the motor car, for which they pay a great deal. Wheel clamping is no way to improve the system within acceptable cost limits.

If we vote tonight, I shall vote against the order. If we do not vote, I shall vote against the order when it comes before the House next time to express my disapproval.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I think that the hon. Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Griffiths) is in the minority — but we shall see. The reason why he is in the minority is that he starts from the wrong premise. There is a fairness in the system. It is that any motorist with a private motor vehicle who goes into the two boroughs in the heart of our capital city knows that he is at risk if he breaks the parking laws. He can be dealt with in a variety of ways. We are discussing one of those ways.

The hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott), who introduced an amendment in the last Session of Parliament, acted on the presumption that we needed a bigger deterrent. I share that view. I am sure that we need a bigger deterrent elsewhere, and not just in the two boroughs.

Before I came to the House I travelled on most days from Blackfriars bridge to the Temple where I worked. Almost every day a large car committed a parking offence and collected a ticket. It was there nearly every day, and nearly every day it was given a ticket. The driver collected ticket after ticket presumably because the driver could afford to pay for it.

The hon. Member for Portsmouth, North argues that the law is unfair because some can afford to pay and others cannot. The validity of the order is, with some exceptions, that it provides the only deterrent for those who can afford to pay. The risk of being caught committing some offence is great, as the hon. Member for Wigan said, but the time lag is such that an offender may never be brought to court. A foreign registered car will never be prosecuted—I do not intend to discuss diplomatic cars. Nuisances must be dealt with. People with money can get away with it.

For people who live in rural areas a car is essential, particularly if they have to travel to London. But they know the rules. People can park outside tube stations and use the underground system. Public transport is no that bad in London. It has improved and it is not too expensive. There are many solutions. One does not have to bring a car into central London and risk having to overstay a parking period.

The law has four ways of dealing with parking motorists who clog up our capital city, causing a fundamental nuisance. The first is to put a ticket on their windscreen. That is often ineffectual and often ignored. The second is to tow the vehicle away. That is considerably more inconvenient, but it does not always work. I recollect being with a cousin of mine whose vehicle was towed away when it was parked on a yellow line, although the yellow line was covered in snow. She went to collect it from the Willow walk pound just down the road from where I live to find that somebody else had collected it and driven it away, so that that is not a flawless system.

There are two other ways of immobilising vehicles. The wheel clamp is one, and there is the way that we know slightly better in my borough south of the river, which is that one removes the tyres or wheels altogether. That certainly immobilises the vehicle, and it costs more than £19·50 or the proposed £25 to mobilise it again. It teaches people that they should not park in certain places there. However, that is not the authorised way. There is now an authorised way, and there is no evidence that it is being shown to be ineffectual. Indeed, the very nature of its threat and the inconvenience to busy business men and women or others who have plenty of money and fast cars, of having to wait three hours is probably the worst penalty that they can be expected to pay.

Earlier this evening I was at a meeting in Battersea town hall with the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) on the subject of trunking. There was a mass audience representing people of all political views, and none, who had gathered together to protest against the Government's plans, if the Local Government Bill goes through, to trunk many of London's roads. They protest for the same reason that they would support the order. The increased growth of private traffic in the middle of London, not just in Kensington and Chelsea and Westminster boroughs, is a thorough nuisance to most people who are trying to go about their daily business. The range of people who are inconvenienced is enormous, but I should like to single out just one category. The old find parking in places where it is unauthorised and goes beyond the time limits, as well as parking on pavements, a blessed nuisance. Everything that can be done to make sure that the laws on parking are strictly enforced is worth while.

I have only two criticisms of the Government. The first is that after two years we should have more evidence than the six months' worth before the House. That is a bit inadequate given the resource and research facilities that are available. The second is that it is a bit of a lame step forward after a two-year experimental period in one area to be thinking only of continuing the same experiment in the same limited area. I have no doubt that if one took a random opinion poll or sample of residents in many of the central London boroughs one would find them all to be in favour.

I am in favour. On behalf of the Liberal party, I say that my party is in favour. We should go on to extend the provisions in the continuation order. I hope that the Minister will ensure that her Department assesses effectively the advantages of extending it, in consultation with the local authorities and the police. If it can be seen to reduce the nuisance caused by private traffic, particularly in our capital city, an extension of the order will be a great blessing to many people.

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): The hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) hinted that he would like to see a rash of wheel clamps extending throughout the country. However, it is unlikely that most authorities outside London would wish to see them, because essentially the problem that wheel clamps are there to deal with is a London problem. The problem is not so much, as he suggested, one of the lack of deterrent posed by inadequate fines for parking tickets, as the fact that in London, in contrast with every other part of the country, half the fines that have been imposed for illegal parking have never been paid. It is easy to get away without paying for a parking ticket in Greater London.

Let us look at the rest of the country. The 1982 figures for Derbyshire show that of the 22,000 parking tickets that were issued, 19,000 were paid. In Devon and Cornwall, of the 50,000 issued, 39,000 were paid. Even in Greater Manchester, over two thirds of the total issued were paid. So it is essentially a Greater London problem, where there is massive flouting of the parking regulations, because people think that they will be able to get away with it.

As my hon. Friend the Minister of State said, it is a massive deterrent to see wheel clamps affixed to the wheels of offending vehicles. But the extent of that activity has been relatively small. When reporting on the experiment, the GLC pointed out that about 170 wheel clamps per day were affixed to vehicles by only seven teams using a stock of 300 clamps. In other words, one clamp was being affixed about every half hour, which does not seem to be enormously aggressive activity.

The chances of an illegal parker receiving a fixed penalty notice is about 1 : 50. The chances of getting away with it are much greater. The chances of being towed away are about 1 : 1,100 and the chances of actually being clamped are only 1 : 1,800. I wonder how many people realise that. The fact that even a small number of vehicles is seen to be clamped is a great deterrent and has produced a considerable reduction in the length of time for which people park illegally.

There is the unsatisfactory aspect to which my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Griffiths) referred, that the practice of clamping is totally haphazard. One may be unfortunate enough to have one's vehicle clamped, but one is more likely to get away with it. When the teams are in action they may clamp one vehicle in five in a street. That is what causes the breakdown in relations between the police and the public. The public see a small minority of cars, perhaps including their own, being clamped, but they also see the vast majority getting away with illegal parking. There is a need to enforce the law fairly.

When I was a member of the Select Committee on Transport we conducted an inquiry into transport in London four years ago. Mr. Alan Greengross, who was then leader of the planning and communications policy committee of the GLC, pointed to the way in which clamps are used in the United States where they are attached to vehicles for which there are outstanding parking fines for five or perhaps even 10 occasions on which parking tickets have been ignored. We might consider that in this country.

Obviously there would be problems. There would have to be notification of parking tickets not having been paid either to the driver and vehicle licensing centre or to the Metropolitan police. With modern methods of communication and computerisation it should be possible for teams, when they see an illegally parked vehicle, to be able to have access to a central record to discover whether there were outstanding fines in respect of that vehicle. They should go specifically for the people we really want to get at, not the one-time offenders, but those who regularly and persistently ignore the law and then do not pay the fine. If only one driver in 1,800 is to have his vehicle clamped, it should happen to those who deserve it rather than to those who are just unfortunate.

I am glad to hear that my hon. Friend wishes to develop better arrangements for parking in Greater London because many people who park in the capital find the present system incomprehensible. Few know exactly what a single or a double yellow line means. In the evening the law is ignored completely. People park wherever they can. If they were to obey the law, the west end would be crammed with cars driving round with nowhere to park.

On the whole I agree that this is an experiment with which we should persist. We need to find out more, but it should be developed in such a way that it is fairer and meets the criticisms of my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North, and also becomes more affective. If we were to use modern methods, we should be able to bring in much more money from fines, and pay for the increased costs that a more highly developed system would bring.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Continuation orders are not automatic, and I found it surprising that The Standard and The Times said that Parliament had agreed to a further two year extension of this order. That was ill-announced.

I accept that a large number of cars come into London every day, and that the residents in London, of whom I am not one, find it difficult to park at certain parts of the day. I am concerned that some of these cars that are illegally parked in residents' parking bays or on yellow lines may not be moved for many hours. The wheel clamp, or the Denver boot, as it is called more colloquially, merely creates an additional and more permanent obstruction. I accept that it is a deterrent in the long run, but in the short term, when a car has the yellow clamp on it, it is left there. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister is careful in all that she does in motoring matters. I would have thought that more police vehicles immediately towing away these vehicles to the pound was the quickest way to deal with the serious problem. I am not surprised that there is a shortage of clamps, because they are all being used.

I have an office just outside the House, near Westminster abbey, and I see the clamp unit vehicle leaving every morning; no doubt, when it comes back, it is empty. There is a time lag once the vehicle has the clamp fixed to it. I am afraid that my father has been subjected to the Denver clamp, and it took him four hours to get it off. He was going to Harley street for an urgent appointment with a surgeon, and he had to park quickly. When he came back, the boot was on. He accepts that he had parked in the wrong place, but four hours seems rather a long time, and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be speeding up operations through the radio-control system so that in all cases the declamper machine can be brought out as quickly as possible.

I welcome the use of the clamp to force payment of unpaid fines, which can remain outstanding for many months, and sometimes years. This is more of a deterrent than the use of the clamp in illegal parking.

My hon. Friend tried to answer me about the number of diplomats who are trying to claim immunity and therefore would not be subject to the Denver boot. I am reassured that those cars with an X on their registration will be clamped, but those with a D on will not. The Metropolitan police statistics for the number of parking fines in London is incredibly high, particularly for some embassies. It would be unfair for me to name them, but we know who the offenders are. If they park in the wrong place, they should expect to be prosecuted.

I am also concerned about the foreign registration cars that tend to park all over the place. As has already been said in this important debate, those cars are escaping the Denver boot because it does not seem worth while prosecuting them. If they have parked in the wrong place, I hope that they will now be prosecuted.

It is unfair that if I go into Fulham to park I shall not be liable to a clamp, whereas if I go into Kensington and Chelsea or Westminster, I shall. This seems to be the wrong discrimination. If clamping is good enough for one part of central London, it is good enough for any other.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will consider the alternative systems that are available to deter motorists from being antisocial and parking in the wrong area in the first place. Publicity should be given to the offenders and the Government should show through the deterrent that they mean business. Those who live in London, or many of them, pay for residents' parking in the area in which they reside and they should be allowed so to park. That means that we must support the order. However, as a person who believes in the freedom of the individual, I take that view with great reluctance. I see the order as yet another intrusion into our democratic rights. Notwithstanding those comments, the order needs the support of the House, as we want visitors to come to the city. I urge those who travel by motor car to London to park fairly and reasonably and to bear in mind that those who live in London have priority over those who come to the capital to shop, deal or conduct their business.

1.6 am

Mr. Roger Moate (Faversham): Like my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Griffiths), I spoke against the implementation of wheel clamping two years ago. Like him also, I have seen nothing to change my views about the undesirability of the measure. There were not enough of us at the Report stage on the previous occasion to make it worth while forcing a vote and I feel that the same situation applies this evening.

I feel still that there is something peculiarly offensive about the sight of a wheel clamp on a vehicle. It is a rather unpleasant sign of authoritarianism. Having seen the devices clamped on cars over the past two years, my heart goes out to the owners of the vehicles which have been clamped. They pay a disproportionate penalty for the offence that they have undoubtedly committed. The cost and inconvenience is far too great when set against the offence and disproportionate to the alternative penalty of a parking ticket.

My hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) spoke of a 1:1,800 chance of being clamped. Despite what the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) said, it is not just or fair that the chances of being clamped or ticketed are so varied. We are talking of a lottery. So much depends on the arbitrary decision, instinct or view of the clamping unit and not on the decision of the courts.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The hon. Gentleman must accept that everyone runs the same statistical risk of his car being clamped. That is the principle of fairness. Everyone knows that he is at risk and everyone runs the same risk. The fact that the decision is arbitrary does not change that premise.

Mr. Moate: I recall that the Romans had a system of encouraging their troops which involved killing one man in 10 to encourage the others. That might be the hon. Gentleman's system of justice but it is not mine.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): Does my hon. Friend agree that if motorists park according to the parking regulations, or if they use public transport, the odds on them being clamped are nil? We do not want wheel clamping to take place.

Mr. Moate: I do not think that anyone is arguing against the proposition that those who disobey the parking regulations should be penalised.

Mr. Hanley: Who is my hon. Friend defending?

Mr. Moate: I think that I and a number of others are seeking to defend a large proportion of the population.

Mr. Hanley: Lawbreakers?

Mr. Moate: The problems of diplomats ignoring the parking laws, unpaid parking tickets and illegal parking are still with us and will not be resolved by the clamp. We have probably reached the limit of its effectiveness, as there is a limit to the manpower and resources that can be devoted to it, especially if its use is extended to other boroughs. We should not attach too much importance to it. If I am right, and it does not produce much more benefit, that strengthens my assertion that we have introduced an objectionable instrument that penalises motorists out of all proportion to the benefits.

I am not surprised that we are faced with the extension order. From the beginning, all the publicity and propaganda from the Ministry and the police suggested that the clamp was so beneficial that the order would have to be renewed. I am deeply sceptical of some of the statistics, and of the benefits that we are supposed to have gained. I am disappointed that this rather objectionable instrument is to continue as, I imagine, a permanent feature of the London scene. I accept that, but wish to record my regret.

1.12 am

Mrs. Chalker: With the leave of the House, I should like to reply to the debate.

I apologise to the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott). It was remiss of me not to remind the House that his encouragement on this issue three years ago made us consider this possible answer to the problem. I accepted his amendment. If he and I agree, let alone "Yours for Socialism, Dave" and the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, something must have happened. What happened was that parking conditions in central London had become intolerable, especially for residents.

My hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Griffiths) has not understood how vehicles are clamped if he believes that it results from staying a little too long on a parking meter. Motorists are allowed to stay on a parking meter for as long as they pay or for the unexpired time on arrival. Two hours must elapse after expiry of the meter time before clamping can take place. On a two-hour meter, parking can be up to four hours, and on a four-hour meter up to six hours, before clamping is permitted. That is not staying a little too long.

A delivery vehicle, or someone who has literally stopped for a couple of minutes and whose parking is commented on by the traffic warden standing by the vehicle, will not be clamped. Vehicles are clamped only when they stay on a yellow line for a long time, but not when they are causing an obstruction. If they are causing an obstruction, the police will tow them away for the safety of traffic and pedestrians. The clamp deters a more serious parking offence.

My hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) mentioned the operational aspects of clamping. In the past two years, some 77,000 vehicles have been clamped. That works out at about 700 a week. The rate of clamping depends partly on the number of staff deployed, the number of clamps available and how teams work. We have been at pains to ensure that clamping is used where it is effective. If there are obstructions, removal teams are employed.

In this modern day and age, when a great deal of new technology is coming into this area, some vehicles have such sophisticated locking and immobilisation systems that they cannot be towed or driven away by police—they can only be clamped for a continuing offence. Therefore, some vehicles — although not causing an obstruction, as everything possible will be done to remove them — simply cannot be moved without the owners releasing the immobilisation devices. So the only way in which these owners can be deterred is by the use of the clamp.

The matter of diplomats has been mentioned by my hon. Friends. Hon. Members know that the clamping of diplomatic vehicles initially ceased after a few weeks and we worked out a system with the X and D registrations. Few people have D plates on their private vehicles. The number has gone right down. That is why the X plates mean that a vehicle parking in the wrong place can be clamped. Some 900 diplomatic vehicles being eligible for clamping may have cheered some of the lesser mortals whose vehicles have been clamped. They felt that exemption for the diplomatic corps was unfair.

Following the events at the Libyan People's Bureau in St. James's Square last year, the Government instituted a full review of the Vienna convention, its operation and its enforceability. That review will take parking matters into account, among other matters. It is hoped, as a result of the review, to tighten measures to deal with parking offences. I anticipate an outcome fairly shortly.

A number of hon. Members have mentioned fixed penalty notices. This might be a good opportunity to remind the House of legislation that this House and another place passed in 1982, which has not come fully into effect but will assist the parking problems from which many people in London suffer.

It is perfectly true that in 1982, in the Metropolitan police area, more than 2·75 million fixed penalty notices for parking were issued, of which about half were paid in the six months statutory period. Others were paid subsequently, but nothing like the 50 per cent. outstanding at the end of the six months. It is the substantial number of people who commit parking offences and then ignore the fixed penalty notices that annoy hon. Members. It is deplorable. That is why we legislated in 1982 for a change in the fixed penalty system. We have now done the necessary preparatory work, which is nearly completed, both with the police and the courts. I am sorry that it has taken some time, but it was necessary that we should be ready for the changes to be implemented in 1986. Under the new system, unpaid fixed penalties will be enforced as fines with a 50 per cent. surcharge. That will greatly assist enforcement, encouraging people to pay fixed penalty notices.

I believe that that, plus the steps we are trying to take with persistent offenders, will lead to an improved position beyond the clamping that we are discussing tonight. It is fair to say that many persistent offenders have had their vehicles clamped, but the police are continuing their efforts to find new ways of identifying those vehicles, including the use of microcomputers. I do not believe that it would be right for the police to concentrate exclusively on such motorists. Resources need to be deployed where traffic conditions are worst. Where clamping will be most beneficial it should be utilised. I take up the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North, that in some places there is as yet no clamping because they are not covered by the order while in others the team may not arrive while somebody is having a very quite and wicked half hour on the yellow line. That, I am afraid, is the luck of the draw, in one sense, because the police must concentrate their efforts upon those areas that are most congested by the illegal use of space.

The police are seeking to identify the persistent offenders. They are aided by the much higher statistical probability that the persistent offender will be clamped. For example, when 127 vehicles were clamped on one day, 45 of those vehicles had five or more unpaid fixed penalties, while 18 had 20 or more unpaid fixed penalties. Therefore, we are getting not only to the persistent offender but also to the persistent non-payer. That is exactly what, year in, year out, the House has asked should be done about parking in London, and at long last we are beginning to do it.

I know that many people would like the declamping fee to be paid at the same time as the fixed penalty. The police encourage them to do so. When the Bill was going through Parliament in 1982 the hon. Member for Wigan fought very hard for motorists to have the right to a court hearing. My hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North has fought for it, too. That right is retained, which I believe is correct, and the police cannot compel motorists to pay up. However, I assure hon. Members that the message is getting well and truly through.

It appears from all that has been said in this debate and from the comments of Londoners and those who are affected that my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham (Mr. Moate) is not judging this experiment as many Londoners who are affected by the failure to act have judged it. Of course, the Government will use modern methods and whatever is at our disposal to deal with the irritating problem of either parking in the wrong place or overstaying time on a meter. I do not believe that the £25 penalty, if that is finally agreed to following the consultations which the Home Secretary will carry out, will be seen as a disproportionate penalty for those who put their vehicles in parking bays and outstay their right to be there or who put their vehicles into parking bays provided for residents and thus deny to those residents the ability to park their cars.

A whole range of measures is needed to improve the flow of traffic and the ability of motorists to get about London. That means that more off-street parking is required and also a more sensible use of road space. The Government are dedicated to getting the balance right. The extension of clamping for two more years is but one weapon in our armoury in the battle of trying to keep London on the move and giving people the opportunity to park legally at parking meters, which is all that motorists in general ask to do.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Immobilisation of Vehicles Illegally Parked (London Boroughs of Westminster, and Kensington and Chelsea) (Continuation) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 25th February, be approved.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

(1) if proceedings on any Motion which may be tabled in the name of the Prime Minister relating to European Community Proposals for the 1985-86 Common Agricultural Policy Prices have not been previously disposed of, Mr. Speaker shall at Seven o'clock put the Question on any Amendment which may have been moved and shall then put forthwith the Main Question or the Main Question as amended; and

(2) any Motion in the name of Mr. Neil Kinnock or Mr. David Steel, relating to National Health Service or National Health Service (Scotland), may be proceeded with, though opposed, until Twelve o'clock, and, if proceedings on those Motions have not been previously disposed of, Mr. Speaker shall at that hour put forthwith any Questions already proposed from the Chair and on such of those Motions as may then be moved.—[Mr. Garel-Jones.]

Textile and Clothing Industry

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Garel-Jones.]

1.24 am

Sir John Farr (Harborough): I want to raise tonight the subject of the future of the textile and clothing industry. It is a big subject and about half a million jobs are at stake. It is difficult to encompass it satisfactorily in a half hour's debate.

I have to raise four important points that concern members of the industry. Two of them relate to small irritations with the Government. The first is in relation to the British Overseas Trade Board grant scheme. As my hon. Friend will know, a consultation document was published in December 1984. All I am asking my hon. Friend in the limited time available is that he should look at the BOTB consultation document again. Already the pound has fallen markedly against the dollar since December last year. At its earlier level of a few months ago it was estimated that by 1987 there would be the equivalent of a 15·5 per cent. cut in the help to British exporters who participate in overseas trade fairs and exhibitions.

The second small irritation with the Government is in relation to the clothing and footwear equipment scheme —Cloft. It is a year now since the Cloft proposals were put forward by the Government. As my hon. Friend well knows, Cloft involves the provision by Her Majesty's Government of about £20 million to help modernise our textile and clothing industries. Unfortunately, that scheme has fallen foul of EEC rules and regulations. As a result, after 12 months, no progress has been made with Cloft. The industry is becoming disillusioned, particularly when it is well known by hon. Members that some of the continental countries, particularly France and Germany, have key schemes of undercover support which improperly channel many millions of pounds into the support of their home industries. Will my hon. Friend use his best offices to get Cloft off the ground? The sum of £20 million has already been earmarked for the essential re-equipment of some small firms, and so on. Please will he get a move on with that?

The main purpose of my debate tonight is the fear—I use that word advisedly—of the textile and clothing industry about the implications of the Silberston report. It is a real worry to the industry. It is worried lest the Government should seek to form any policy based on any part of the Silberston recommendations. They are frequently based on speculation rather than on firm evidence. Professor Silberston seems to be unaware of the consequences if some of his recommendations are adopted.

For instance, one of the failings of the report concerns prices, inasmuch as the report's assumptions are based on inadequate evidence and solely on the situation in Hong Kong which is a unique case in the textile and clothing trade. The report fails to take sufficient account of the large job loss that would result from a fall in our industry's profitability. The Silberston report mentions a figure of between 10,000 and 48,000 jobs lost if its recommendations are put into effect. Expert sources in the trade calculate that the loss could be as high as 150,000 jobs.

The report is based on the Cambridge model forecast which is produced by a model of an unconvincing nature, and important technical questions remain unanswered. The significance of the barriers to United Kingdom exports is greatly underestimated. There is a genuine risk to our industries of diversion of trade if the European Community relaxes its MFA restraints and other countries retain theirs. That risk is much greater than Professor Silberston assumes.

The report gives insufficient importance to the significance of China and its ability enormously to increase its textile and clothing exports. It fails to recognise that the use of article 19 of GATT to deal with destructive imports, as is recommended, is unlikely to be effective and would have dangerous implications for the whole trading framework. It is also felt that, if the MFA were abandoned, the poorer developing countries would lose out to the benefit of the newly industrialised countries, especially to China. The report's sectoral analysis is too brief and generalised to justify any policy recommendation which can be associated with it.

Professor Silberston points out that there would be a large fall in the industry's profitability if the MFA were abandoned without recognising the devastating effect it would have on employment. The report's treatment of what would happen if the EC abandoned regulation of import growth, but the United States continued it, is trivial and frivolous in the extreme. For instance, it gives only a sketchy account of barriers to United Kingdom textile exports, despite that being one of its main remits from the Government. The report does not measure up to the complexities of the textile and clothing industries, and cannot possibly provide a basis for the formulation of responsible Government policies.

Hand in hand with that goes the renewal of the MFA. About the only conclusion of Silberston with which a sensible person can agree is the recommendation to renew the MFA in 1986, although it then erroneously suggests that the MFA should be phased out shortly after it is renewed. It is the opinion of employers and employees in the textile and clothing industry that there is a strong case for the renewal of a vigorous and effective MFA when the present one runs out.

The MFA has been criticised, but it has encouraged firms to continue to improve their competitiveness. It has not prevented losses in jobs and capacity, but has kept them to a more manageable scale. It has preserved order in world textile trade—without it there would be chaos—and it has helped the development process of some of the least development countries by putting limits on the access to the European market of more competitive countries, such as Hong Kong, Korea and China. Some of the industrialised countries most critical of the MFA themselves limit their textile and clothing imports far more severely than anything done by the EC, under the MFA.

Contrary to what people have said, the MFA has not been used by the EC as a piece of blind protectionism. It has allowed EC import volume from MFA countries to grow by 16 per cent. between 1977 and 1983 at a time when volume demand increased by only 2·5 per cent. It is essential that the MFA is renewed. Moreover, the Government must have a vigorous and firm attitude in negotiating on behalf of Britain and its EC partners.

The textile and clothing industry makes a major contribution to the United Kingdom economy. Its sales of more than £10 billion represent a value added of more than £3·6 billion. That is larger than the value added of the motor vehicle industry, more than half as much again than that of the aerospace industry, and more than three times that of computers. That major contribution to the economy would be undermined by an unrestrained growth of imports from low-wage and state-trading companies, and would be socially intolerable. It would increase the existing pressures on employment in some exposed areas of the United Kingdom where textiles and clothing provide half a million direct jobs. Those vulnerable areas are the north-west, Yorkshire, Scotland, Northern Ireland and inner city areas apart from the midlands.

In conclusion, I shall mention briefly two documents that I received today. The first is from a small employer in Leicester, who applauds the fact that this debate is taking place, although it is late at night. He says that he hopes the Government recognise,

"the thin line that now exists between survival and closure. Most employers try desperately hard, with little reward (pay below their own knitters!) to keep jobs going, but how can we compete with low-wage workers in the East?"

That happens even with MFA 3.

The second document is a report from the Manpower Services Commission entitled "Labour Market Trends Midland Region 1985—1987", which states:

"Low cost imports continue to be a problem and although the Multi Fibre Arrangement . . . controls the level of imports from third world countries, there is still an agreement that most countries can increase imports by a certain percentage each year. The MFA is due for re-negotiation in 1986 and unless our negotiators are very firm on imports from these countries the market could become inundated with imports at prices impossible to match in this country. In view of the tremendous efforts which have been made by our textile/clothing firms to modernise their production methods to become competitive, this would be a disaster. This sector, being labour-intensive, has been one of the success stories in terms of employment creation in 1984."

My hon. Friend the Minister has not seen that MSC report. Indeed, I had not seen it until a few moments ago. With those few words, I look forward to my hon. Friend's reply.

1.38 am

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): The hon. Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) kindly allowed me to have a couple of minutes in this debate to support him, in the hope that the Minister will reply in a way that will help the hosiery and knitwear industry of Great Britain, bearing in mind the terrific battering that it has taken for several years. Jobs have been lost by the thousand.

The Government must support a renewal of the multi-fibre arrangement, and we would welcome an improvement in the present circumstances of the MFA. I know that the Minister is especially interested in industry and jobs, with special reference to the knitwear and hosiery industry. It is important that the right thing should be said from the Treasury Bench so that we may know that the Government will fight all the way to retain the MFA agreement and improve upon it if possible. If we do not get what we are asking for, there will be massive dumping on our shores at the expense of this first-class industry and the first-class work people and management within it. We need the support of this Government so that information can be fed into and out of Parliament.

I hope that we shall have a good response from the Minister.

1.40 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary for Trade and Industry (Mr. David Trippier): May I begin by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) on his initiative in raising this important subject. I should like to take this opportunity of thanking my hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) for the kind things that they have said about me.

I want to assure my hon. Friend that the Government are well aware of the significant contribution that the textile, knitting and clothing industry makes to the national economy. Despite the problems that it has faced over the last few years, it is still very important. It employs 500,000 people, which is 2 per cent. of total employment in the United Kingdom economy, and more than 10 per cent. of the United Kingdom's manufacturing employment. If we take the clothing and knitting industry, it still supplies about 63 per cent. of the home market for garments despite the intense competition provided by developed and developing countries alike.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): Is my hon. Friend aware that there has been a takeover bid for Tootal, which is a large textile employer? It employs over 8,500 people in this country, including the Osman factory in my constituency. The takeover bid has come from an overseas firm, which has given no assurances as to the future job prospects of employees in this country. Is the Minister aware of this, and will he satisfy himself as to whether there are reasons for it being referred to the Office of Fair Trading?

Mr. Trippier: I am aware of the issue. The Director General of the Office of Fair Trading, I understand, has discussed the bid with both parties and will be advising my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State shortly. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) will understand that I am not able to anticipate the advice at this stage.

I can assure my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough that the Government expect these industries to which I have referred to continue to play an important part in the economy of the country. In saying this, however, I do not wish to minimise the difficulties that they have had to face during the recession. Many companies have had to make hard and sometimes painful decisions to rationalise and retrench in order to remain in business and to remain competitive. But there are encouraging trends, and profitability is improving. A survey of the nine biggest British companies in this sector shows that their combined profits have almost tripled since 1981, admittedly from a low base. In the clothing industry, after very sharp falls experienced in 1980 and 1981, production has grown steadily in each of the last three years. The turnround in textiles and knitting took place more recently, and increases in output since then have been rather more modest than for clothing.

Despite fierce international competition, the industry needs to try to maintain its position at home and to strengthen its position overseas. Its future lies first and foremost in its own hands. The Government can certainly assist, and are assisting, in such areas as advisory services for good design and helping to spread awareness of its importance. Marketing skills are also important. Similarly, the decisions on whether to invest in new machinery and the extent to which firms carry out research and development must in the final analysis rest with the individual firms.

The Government can help, however, to ensure that the climate in which United Kingdom industry operates is as favourable as possible. I believe that our economic strategy is of central importance—the drop in inflation, the cut in the national insurance surcharge, and the growth in productivity have assisted the industry. During 1983-84, firms in the United Kingdom textile and clothing industry were paid or offered about £66 million under regional or general assistance schemes operated by my Department and the Northern Ireland Department of Economic Development.

Hon. Members referred to the multi-fibre arrangement. In recent months, the Government have been considering what regime should replace the present MFA when it expires in 1986. To assist us in reaching a decision, the Minister for Trade, the Minister for State, Department of Trade and Industry and I have been holding a series of consultative meetings with interested parties. We had a useful meeting with the three major organisations representing the textile and clothing industries — the British Textile Confederation, the British Clothing Industry Association and the Knitting Industries' Federation. We have also seen representatives of consumer organisations, trade unions, retailers and importers, and further meetings are still to be held.

My Department commissioned the report from Professor Silberston because, with the MFA expiring next year, we wanted an independent assessment of the way in which it has affected not merely the textile and clothing industries but the economy as a whole. We asked Professor Silberston to look at two aspects in particular. The first was to consider the effects on United Kingdom exports of textiles and clothing of trade barriers maintained in other world markets. The second was to consider the effects of restraining imports of low-cost textiles into the United Kingdom, including the effects of the industries themselves, on other industries, and on the consumer.

The report is, of course, Professor Silberston's responsibility. The Government do not need or intend to adopt or reject the report as a whole. We must make some judgments on the costs and benefits of the MFA, and the report is a useful input. It is clear that the industry and the trade unions have been critical of Professor Silberston's analysis, while others have questioned whether he goes far enough. We shall consider it in the light of all the views expressed, including those that have been expressed tonight.

Professor Silberston concluded that restrictions on imports of low-cost textiles and clothing raised their average prices to the British shopper by about 5 per cent. The textile and clothing industry has made it clear that it does not accept that figure. The consumers' organisations have stated that they regard it as too low, especially for children's clothes. Rightly or wrongly, however, Professor Silberston calculates that the MFA costs the British consumer about £450 million a year. Strikingly, he finds that much of the benefit from the highest prices accrues to foreign suppliers and estimates that at least half of the cost to British customers is lost abroad in this way, while the rest remains to benefit British producers. Those are only some of Professor Silberston's main conclusions and, as I said, we have received a number of comments and criticisms about them.

[Mr. Trippier]

In considering what should succeed the current MFA, there are, therefore, many considerations for the Government to take into account. The world trading system based on GATT is extremely important to us as a nation depending so much on trade, and we are committed to its strengthening in the future. For that reason, we very much favour the proposal for a new GATT round to build on its successes and to take them further forward. We must also take into account the commitments made by this and other Governments to make all possible progress towards a worldwide open trading system. We attach great importance to those commitments.

I appreciate my hon. Friend's disappointment about the Cloft scheme, and I share that disappointment. I also understand his disappointment with the decision on the British Overseas Trade Board budget.

I should like to say a few words about the recent negative decision given by the European Commission to our proposed Cloft scheme for investment assistance to small firms in these industries.

The aim of the proposed scheme, which was announced by the Secretary of State during last year's Budget debate, was to encourage small firms in the clothing, footwear, knitting and textile industry to invest in the latest equipment. We considered that although modest in terms of its overall budget, which was £20 million over three to four years, the Cloft scheme, by providing grants of 20 per cent. towards the cost of high technology equipment, would in fact have provided a substantial incentive to firms to invest in such equipment, both in their own interest and to the benefit of the economy at large.

Unfortunately for us, the European Commission, which has the responsibility for enforcing those provisions of the treaty of Rome which governs state aids, has recently been taking an increasingly restrictive line on the provision of such aids in relation to the textile and clothing industries.

We none the less considered as a Government that the Cloft proposals were sufficiently tightly drawn and selective as to prove unobjectionable. In the event, as the House knows, this was not acceptable.

Basing themselves on the improvement in the industry's economic position throughout Europe, the Commission further tightened its attitude towards sectoral aid schemes. It rejected a Belgian scheme in September, and now it has rejected ours. The full text of the Commission's decision has become available to the Department of Trade and Industry only in the last few days. A copy was placed in the Library on 6 March. We are currently studying the detail and propose to have discussions very soon with representatives of the industries concerned to consider where we go from here.

Obviously, the industry is as dismayed as we are at the Commission's rejection of Cloft. It considers the Commission's decision to be particularly inequitable in view of the large amounts of sectoral aid given to the clothing and textile industry in other member states, and my hon. Friend referred to those. We share this view and, even in advance of receipt of the full text of the decision, we have conveyed these sentiments to the Commission in forceful terms and have equally forcefully expressed the hope that the Commission will in future apply its more stringent policy without exception. I am pleased to be able to report that the Commission has not only confirmed that this is its intention but has also indicated that it proposes to take an equally firm line with Spain and Portugal when they become members of the Community.

I should like to assure my hon. Friend that I have taken into account all that he has said. This has been a very useful debate on an important industry, and I am grateful to him for providing me with the opportunity to reply to it. I am very conscious of the importance attached by the industry to the question of the successor regime to the current multi-fibre arrangement. I have listened with great attention to the points made this evening by my hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Ashfield, and I can assure the House that the interests of our textile and clothing industry will be taken fully into account in considering our policy in this very important area.

Question put and agreed to.

LERWICK HARBOUR ORDER CONFIRMATION BILL

Considered; to be read the Third time.

Oral Answers to Questions

SCOTLAND

East Fife Regional Road

1. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he intends to take to expedite progress on the construction of the East Fife regional road; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Ancram: Every effort is being made to complete the East Fife regional road as quickly as possible. A contract for phase 2 has just been awarded and, provided funds are available, the remaining two phases will start as soon as the necessary statutory procedures are completed.

Mr. Hamilton: "Provided funds are available" is an ominous phrase. Will stages 3 and 4 be combined in one contract? How many objections are outstanding? What efforts is the Department making to satisfy those objections to avoid the possibility of holding a public inquiry, which will delay the project?

Mr. Ancram: Whether the two phases can go together depends partly on the availability of resources and partly on the statutory procedures being completed in both cases. There are seven unresolved objections to the draft road orders which were published last April. We are preparing draft compulsory purchase orders, which we hope will be published in the summer. If objections to those orders are lodged and not withdrawn, a public inquiry will obviously be required. As usual, my Department is making every effort to ensure that if the objections are resolvable without an inquiry, that will be done.

Mr. Hirst: Does my hon. Friend find it a curious contradiction that the Labour party in Fife should be in favour of a road which relieves local communities of traffic, whereas the labour party in Edinburgh is blindly and dogmatically opposed to the western relief road, which would bring considerable benefit to the whole of the western sector in Edinburgh?

Mr. Ancram: Obviously I cannot comment on the Edinburgh relief road. I am sure that the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) is aware that there has been a great deal of expenditure on roads in Fife. In the five years up to March 1984, £16·4 million was spent on trunk roads and £21 million was spent on local roads.

Mr. Gourlay: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that regional grants are a major attraction for industries coming to Fife? In view of the abolition of regional development grant assistance to Fife, will the hon. Gentleman do everything possible to expedite the construction of the East Fife regional road? Assuming that there are no objections to and no public inquiry into the compulsory purchase orders, will the hon. Gentleman assure us that the Department will take every opportunity to expedite the construction of the road?

Mr. Ancram: I hope that the hon. Gentleman is aware from what I have said that my Department and I regard this as an important road. Subject to the procedures being completed and to the availability of resources, the road will be completed as soon as possible.

Glenochil Young Offenders Centre

2. Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the future of the Glenochil young offenders centre.

Mr. Ancram: I have no plans at present to change the regimes of the young offenders institution and detention centre at Glenochil. However, the best use of all penal establishments is kept under regular review.

Mr. Maclennan: Has the Under-Secretary of State noticed that during the 12 years before 1981 there were no deaths at the Glenochil complex, but that since then there have been six deaths? Does that not suggest that, under this Government, shocks may be not only sharp and short, but terminal?

Mr. Ancram: I am surprised at the hon. Gentleman's comment, because I believe that he was a member of the Labour Administration between 1974 and 1979. I must say to the hon. Gentleman, if he does not know already, that the regime at the Glenochil detention centre has not changed since 1960. It was acceptable then and, in our view, it is still acceptable. Of course, I am concerned about any deaths at penal establishments, and especially the six deaths at Glenochil since 1976. As we know, they are the subject of inquiry and cannot be commented upon. None of the first five deaths was attributed to the management or regime at Glenochil by the fatal accident inquiry.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: What is the percentage success rate of those who come out of Glenochil and do not return to the recesses of the Scottish penal system? Does my hon. Friend envisage an improvement in those figures in the future?

Mr. Ancram: For obvious reasons, the success figures are not recorded centrally. The whole House must understand that young offenders' institutions and detention centres exist to provide an opportunity for a change of attitude in the persons who are there. Whether they are changed depends on the company that they keep afterwards and their character.

Mr. O'Neill: Does the Minister agree that the statement that was made yesterday by his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General for Scotland is helpful, in so far as it goes, in changing sentencing policy? Many of us have asked for that, because the change that has taken place in the public's attitude as a result of the inquiries shows that there is nothing fundamentally wrong with the regime. The problem is that in many instances the wrong people are being sent to the institution. Secondly, the information that the Minister gave me yesterday and his response to the last question show that he is completely incapable of justifying the efficacy of the short, sharp shock treatment on any statistical evidence. If he cannot provide that evidence, he should take steps to end that form of treatment.

Mr. Ancram: On the latter part of the hon. Gentleman's question, Her Majesty's Inspector of Prisons described the regime as "positive and purposeful." I endorse that. I thank the hon. Gentleman for what he said about the regime.

The announcement made yesterday by my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General for Scotland was, I believe, logical. If we are to have a system that relies on the short, sharp, shock, plainly the shock element is diminished by someone returning for a second time. That can have a disruptive influence on the good work of the institution. I thank the hon. Gentleman for the welcome that he gave to the decision that we announced.

Elderly Persons (Problems)

3. Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will cause a survey to be conducted about the problems of elderly mentally confused people in Scotland and thereafter publish his findings.

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. George Younger): The needs of this group have not substantially changed since the Timbury report on services for the elderly with mental disability was published, and I see no need at present for a further survey.

Mr. MacKenzie: Does the Secretary of State accept that the problem of senile dementia in Scotland is growing, and that all those old people and their families are in "a Catch 22 situation"? They cannot be taken into old folks' homes because they are too confused, and they cannot go into hospitals because there are insufficient beds. Will he ensure that more beds are made available for people in that condition, and will he provide them as fast as he can?

Mr. Younger: I well appreciate the right hon. Gentleman's anxiety about this matter, which worries every Member of Parliament. We have made considerable progress recently towards implementing the recommendations of the Timbury report. It recommended that by 1991 we should have 7,200 hospital beds for that group of patients. We have 5,000 now, and by 1987 there should be 6,000. We are well on the way to implementing the recommendations. I shall do what I can to ensure that the health boards maintain their priorities in this important matter.

Mrs. McCurley: Will my right hon. Friend encourage the development of private nursing home accommodation for the frail, the confused and the elderly? Will he also ensure that the nursing home regulations, which are in some doubt at the moment, are tightened up?

Mr. Younger: I well appreciate what my hon. Friend says. I, of course, encourage private provision, provided that it is up to acceptable standards, and we shall do all that we can to ensure that it is. As I have said, we continually impress on the health boards the need to put Health Service provision at the top of their priority lists.

Mr. Foulkes: Does the Secretary of State welcome the setting up of Scottish Action on Dementia? Will he take up with the chairman of the Ayrshire and Arran health board the shortfall in places to deal with dementia so that we see some action towards the aims and objectives of the Timbury report in the area which he and I represent?

Mr. Younger: Yes, Sir. I agree with the hon. Gentleman about that. We have had a long-standing shortage of this accommodation in the part of the country that we represent. The health board has the matter at the top of its priorities, and I hope that it will be able to take good action soon.

Sir Hector Monro: Will my right hon. Friend do all that he can to maintain capital expenditure on improving hospitals for the mentally ill, especially for the young mentally ill, so that they can be treated as near to their homes as possible?

Mr. Younger: I agree with the aims that my hon. Friend has outlined. I am glad to say that the programme for capital building in hospitals has been kept at a steady, high level during the past few years. I hope that we can keep it that way.

Mr. Ewing: Will the Secretary of State reject the poor house mentality of the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley)? Will he tell the House how many of the 5,000 beds that are now available for the treatment of senile dementia were planned by this Conservative Administration, and how many were planned by the Labour Government? When will the Government be in a position to tell us about some new building programme to relieve this serious problem?

Mr. Younger: If the hon. Gentleman wants figures for the dates when the various parts if the programme were put into effect, I shall gladly answer a question if he tables one.

The hon. Gentleman did not strengthen his case by his wholly unwarranted interpretation of the question by my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley), which bore no resemblance to what she asked. My hon. Friend expressed the hope that the private sector could also help to deal with these people who need help. If the hon. Gentleman cannot welcome that, he is not worthy of the Front Bench.

Scottish Trades Union Congress

4. Mr. James Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the general secretary of the Scottish Trades Union Congress; and what matters were discussed.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Allan Stewart): My right hon. Friend and I meet the STUC from time to time to discuss a wide range of issues. My right hon. Friend last met the STUC on 25 January, when the coal dispute was discussed. The general secretary was not present on that occasion. I met representatives of the STUC most recently on 1 February to discuss education and training matters.

Mr. Hamilton: Will the hon. Gentleman and his right hon. Friend again seek a meeting with the general secretary of the STUC to discuss the intolerable unemployment situation? Will they also discuss the rating revaluation that is taking place, which will have an adverse effect on businesses and further aggravate unemployment? Will they also discuss——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Two questions are enough.

Mr. Hamilton: Will they also discuss the teachers' pay claim——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is being a bit greedy.

Mr. Stewart: I cannot promise the hon. Gentleman that my right hon. Friend will have a meeting with such a prolonged agenda. My right hon. Friend is always willing to meet the general secretary of the STUC, when it is appropriate. I must point out that manufacturing industry benefits from the revaluation in Scotland. In relation to the hon. Gentleman's point about unemployment, I hope that the STUC will compare Britain's performance with that of the United States. During the past decade, employment in the United States increased by 18·5 million and real weekly earnings fell. During the same period the United Kingdom lost more than 1 million jobs and real weekly earnings rose by 19 per cent. There is a lesson for trade unions in that.

Mr. Malone: When my hon. Friend next meets representatives of the STUC, will he remind them of the productivity deal that was entered into about a year ago at British Shipbuilders, which has resulted in efficiency in some Scottish yards being increased by 25 to 30 per cent.? Will he encourage the STUC to adopt similar practices in other industries, because that is the real way to protect jobs?

Mr. Stewart: My hon. Friend is right. The real way to protect jobs is to improve productivity and to meet customers' needs. The recent orders, such as the outstanding order won by Govan Shipbuilders, are a tribute to the responsiveness of many trade unionists to the needs of a competitive economy.

Mr. Buchan: If the Minister does not propose to meet the STUC early to discuss the mining dispute, and especially the behaviour of Mr. Wheeler of the NCB, will he meet instead the two chief constables who have called for an end to this action? Is it not disgraceful that they find the upholding of law and order on the beat infinitely more progressive than do their masters at the Scottish Office?

Mr. Stewart: There were 900 convictions during the coal strike and fewer than 200 dismissals. The board has considered each case on its merits. I deplore the personal attacks on Mr. Wheeler by Opposition Members. It is about the only thing that unites them on the coal strike.

Mr. Bill Walker: When my hon. Friend next meets the general secretary of the STUC, will he bring to his attention the lessons that came out of the coal strike, especially with regard to trade union and non-trade union workers who worked together to protect their jobs in their industries? Will he especially draw attention to the fact that at Ravenscraig and elsewhere productivity increased?

Mr. Stewart: Yes, Sir. The country owes an enormous debt to the miners who continued to work, despite violence and intimidation, throughout the strike. I join my hon. Friend in praising the efforts of the management and work force at Ravenscraig to keep it going, despite the coal strike and what the STUC said about it on several occasions.

Mr. Home Robertson: Has the Minister seen representations that have been made by the STUC about the provocative and vindictive attitude of the National Coal Board's management in Scotland? Is he aware that 17 of my constituents were tried for what even the police described as minor picket line offences, but they have now been sacked by my constituent, Mr. Albert Wheeler? Is that in accordance with Government policy?

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Gentleman seems to have a wide variety of constituents. I simply point out that any miner who has been sacked and who feels aggrieved can have recourse to an industrial tribunal.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: Will my hon. Friend comment upon the TUC in Scotland mitigating the damage caused to the Scottish coal industry by the NUM, and also condemn the recent violence to the president of the Scottish NUM?

Mr. Stewart: I join my hon. Friend in condemning the recent violent attack on Mr. McGahey, who is a constituent of my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Ancram). I hope that the STUC and everyone else will now concentrate on rebuilding the coal industry, to create a competitive industry for the future.

Mr. Norman Hogg: Is the Minister aware that his view of Mr. Wheeler's attitude is very different from what has been widely reported in the press in recent weeks? Will he, as a matter of urgency, meet the STUC and Church leaders in Scotland, who are seeking an amnesty for those miners who have lost their jobs?

Mr. Stewart: The National Coal Board and the Government have made it clear that a total amnesty is out of the question. We must bear in mind the violence and intimidation that went on during the coal strike. That is what Opposition Members too quickly tend to forget.

Mr. Andy Stewart: Does my hon. Friend agree that miners, whether they work in Scotland, England or Wales, should be afforded the protection of the law and that those who break it should suffer the consequences?

Mr. Stewart: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. I repeat that the board has made it clear in Scotland, as in the rest of the country, that each case was considered on its merits.

Mr. Douglas: Will the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State reconsider what he said about the National Coal Board examining each case in Scotland on its merits? Mr. Wheeler is on record as saying that he will do no such thing. In his discussions with the STUC and the NUM in Scotland, will the Minister persuade the NCB to examine each case on its merits and to enter as expeditiously as possible into discussions with the NUM so that there may be a return to good industrial relations in Scotland, for the benefit of the mining industry and the Scottish economy?

Mr. Stewart: I have already said that the NCB has examined each case on its merits. I point out to the hon. Member that, although there were 900 convictions during the strike, there have been fewer than 200 dismissals.

Mr. Henderson: When my hon. Friend meets the STUC, will he put to it the view that strikes never do anybody any good? That was particularly marked during the recent coal strike, which has had disastrous consequences for the formerly economic Frances and Seafield collieries in Fife.

Mr. Stewart: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I believe that the Opposition are seeking to divert attention from the real issues that must be faced—the damage that has been done to the coal industry and the need for it to become efficient and competitive. If the industry can achieve those aims, it will have a very good future.

Mr. Martin: The Minister will no doubt know that the STUC is very concerned about the future of the British Rail works at Springburn, where about 1,500 men and women are employed. The proposal is that the work force should be reduced to 500. That means that no longer will there be any railway workshop capacity in Scotland, let alone at Springburn. Will the Minister give an assurance that he will fight for the retention of that workshop?

Mr. Stewart: The House knows of the hon. Gentleman's concern, which he has expressed on a number of occasions, about BREL at Springburn. However, that is a matter for British Rail. Because of changed circumstances, it has had to make this announcement.

Sir Hector Monro: Will my hon. Friend talk to the STUC about employment and confirm that last month there were 342,000 more people in work in the United Kingdom than there were 12 months ago? Is that increase reflected in Scotland?

Mr. Stewart: The short answer to my hon. Friend's question is yes. Total employment up to September 1984 was rising in Scotland, as it was rising in the United Kingdom. There are a number of particularly encouraging signs in the service, oil-related, electronics and manufacturing industries. The last CBI survey was much more encouraging about employment trends than has been the case for a number of years.

Mr. Dewar: Does the Minister accept that justice has to be seen to be done in the miners' dispute? It is no good the Minister saying that there has been an individual review, when many of us know that miners who were involved in very minor incidents, which sometimes resulted only in admonitions, have lost their jobs and been thrown out of the industry after many years of blameless service. Is the Minister aware that Mr. Wheeler has said that all those who have been dismissed are guilty of serious crimes against fellow workers or NCB property? Will he have discussions with the Solicitor-General for Scotland and confirm from his Department's prosecution records that that is just not true? In view of that, will the hon. Gentleman tell the NCB that it would be quite monstrous if there were not to be individual reviews based upon the circumstances of cases of the kind that have taken place in many other parts of the country? Will the Minister at least redeem himself by joining the Churches and the chief constables in making that point forcefully and removing what is rapidly becoming a public scandal about justice in Scotland?

Mr. Stewart: The reasons for the dismissals were set out very fully by Mr. Wheeler in his letter to The Scotsman of 12 March. The NCB completely repudiates the charges of petty vindictiveness that have been put to it. I repeat, if an individual feels that he has a grievance, he has, as has any other employee who has been dismissed, the right of appeal to an industrial tribunal.

Highlands and Islands (Policing)

5. Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received over the projected level of policing by the Northern Constabulary within the Highlands and Islands; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: I have had representations from hon. Members whose constituencies are in the northern police area and from many local organisations and individuals. I have also corresponded with the chairman of the joint police committee. The decision to reduce the police budget for 1985-86 was made by the joint police committee, and flowed from limitations placed by Highland regional council on its contribution to policing costs.

Mr. Kennedy: When will the Minister live up to his responsibility and stop trying to mislead the House on this issue? The limitations on the budget are a direct result of Scottish Office guidelines, and Highland regional council has budgeted within those guidelines. Is the Minister aware that the outcome is the proposed closure of 33 police stations in the Highlands and Islands, including 17 in my constituency? In view of that, does the Minister think that his is the party of law and order in the Highlands any more?

Mr. Ancram: Only one guideline has been given to the Highland regional council, and that requires it to make an overall reduction of 1 per cent. in its expenditure in real terms. I find its decision to reduce the contribution to policing costs by 6·5 per cent. surprising, but it is one that it is entitled to take. In view of the strictures that the hon. Gentleman made against me and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, I point out that were we to tell local authorities what to spend on individual services, we would rightly be accused of destroying the fundamental principle of local government, which is that councils are entitled to decide their own priorities.

Borders Region (Revaluation)

6. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received about the effects of the proposed rating revaluation on commercial ratepayers in the Borders region.

Mr. Ancram: I have received several representations to the effect that the values fixed for commercial property in the Borders are too high. Aggrieved ratepayers may appeal to the local valuation appeal committee or to the courts. In Scotland as a whole, I understand that the average multiplier for commercial property is slightly below that for all property. It follows that commercial subjects overall should, in the coming year, be paying a smaller proportion than in the past of the rate bill.

Mr. Kirkwood: Is the Under-Secretary of State aware that commercial ratepayers in the Borders region are finding it difficult to reconcile what the Secretary of State for Scotland said to me only last Thursday—that across the country commercial rates had fallen by 3·2 per cent. —with the fact that the regional assessor in the Borders claims that the increase has been 41 per cent., and that some of the increases are coming through at 160 per cent.? The hon. Gentleman knows the area as well as I do, and knows that commercial increases of that magnitude would require a far bigger upturn in economic activity than has taken place in the Borders area. Why has this happened? Can the Minister give us a promise of some relief for commercial ratepayers in the Borders area?

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman asked for an explanation why this has taken place, and until we see the full effects of revaluation it will not be possible to judge. It may be that in previous revaluations the valuations were set lower than the average. I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has already told the hon. Gentleman that revaluations are about gainers and losers, because they balance the rating burden. Within his area, it is worth noting that there are concerns that will benefit from revaluation.

Mr. Kirkwood: I have not found any.

Mr. Ancram: I suggest that the hon. Gentleman goes to the Edinburgh Wool Mill in Jedburgh, which will have a rate reduction of 20 per cent., or Moffat Woollens in Jedburgh, which will have a rate reduction of 25 per cent., or the Kelso ice rink, which he knows well, which will have a reduction of 10 per cent.

Mr. Forth: In view of the widespread concern expressed about commercial rates and——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is about commercial rates in the Borders area.

Mr. Forth: In view of the widespread concern expressed about commercial rates in the Borders, and the concern about domestic rates, as expressed by my father in Glasgow recently, will my hon. Friend take the lead in rating—[Interruption.]——

Mr. Speaker: Order. English Members have some rights as well.

Mr. Forth: Will my hon. Friend now take the lead in encouraging a thorough reform of the rating system in Scotland, to set a model for the rest of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Ancram: I am involved, as I think hon. Members know, in a Government review, with my English colleagues, of the system of local government finance. At this stage, obviously, I would not want to pre-empt the considerations within that review. I am concerned about the levels of valuation increases for commercial enterprises. If those who have received them think that they are unfair, they must realise that they have a right of appeal.

As to domestic ratepayers, of course we have given a large measure of relief to the domestic ratepayers. That was announced the other day.

Mr. Allen Adams: Will the Minister take a little trip to Inchinnan and speak to the former Conservative group leader of Paisley town council, one Mr. James Neal.—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is that in the Borders? [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] The hon. Gentleman must relate his question to the Borders.

Mr. Forth: Will my hon. Friend now take the lead in encouraging a thorough reform of the rating system in Scotland, to set a model for the rest of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Ancram: I am involved, as I think hon. Members know, in a Government review, with my English colleagues, of the system of local government finance. At this stage, obviously, I would not want to pre-empt the considerations within that review. I am concerned about the levels of valuation increases for commercial enterprises. If those who have received them think that they are unfair, they must realise that they have a right of appeal.

As to domestic ratepayers, of course we have given a large measure of relief to the domestic ratepayers. That was announced the other day.

Mr. Allen Adams: Will the Minister take a little trip to Inchinnan and speak to the former Conservative group leader of Paisley town council, one Mr. James Neal—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is that in the Borders? [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] I think that the hon. Gentleman must relate his question to the Borders.

Mr. Adams: It is wholly relevant to rating and to revaluation.

Mr. Speaker: The question concerns rating in the Borders.

Mr. Maclennan: Is the Minister aware that commercial ratepayers in the Borders are more sharply aware than anybody else in Scotland of the unfairness of the revaluation going ahead on the Scottish side of the Borders, while nothing is being done in England?

Mr. Ancram: I am sure that ratepayers in the Borders, commercial or otherwise, are as aware as anybody else that in Scotland, by statute, we have always had regular revaluations and, indeed, both sides of the House, if I may say so, have taken some pride in those revaluations, because we believe that over a period of time they ensure that there is fairness in the way that the rate burden is apportioned. I think that it is a matter for some surprise that the hon. Gentleman, who was a member of the Government who presided over a revaluation in Scotland in 1978 when none occurred in England, should take the line that he does now.

Mr. Craigen: Can the hard-pressed commercial ratepayers in the Borders give any credence to the rumour that the Prime Minister is well disposed to taking commercial and industrial rating out of the system altogether?

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman has heard what I have said about the review that is taking place. I am sure he will understand that I do not want to pre-empt the consideration of that review.

Teachers (Pay)

7. Mr. Robin Cook asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will meet the general secretary of the Educational Institute of Scotland to discuss teachers' pay.

11. Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what progress has been made in settling the teachers' pay dispute.

14. Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he is taking to find a fair solution to the teachers' dispute.

Mr. Younger: The general secretary of the Educational Institute of Scotland was present when I met representatives of the Scottish joint negotiating committee for teaching staff in school education, at their request, on 28 January and 15 February 1985. I have not been approached by him for a separate meeting.

Despite these meetings with me and clarification of my position in writing, the teachers' side of the Scottish joint negotiating committee for teaching staff in school education continues to oppose a review of pay and conditions of service within that committee. I wrote to the teachers' side on 28 February noting its decision with regret. I, of course, remain willing to meet it again if it wishes to revive the idea of such a review. Meanwhile, I am keeping in close touch with the Scottish Examination Board and with the education authorities in order to ensure that as much as possible is done to safeguard the interests of pupils affected by the present industrial action, especially those in examination years.

Mr. Cook: Will the Secretary of State accept that at a meeting of over 100 teachers in my constituency I was informed of a teacher who now qualifies for a rate rebate, of another who now moonlights driving a taxi and of a qualified science teacher who has left to go to work in a bank? Is he prepared to defend the level of professional pay that gives rise to those cases? Can he tell the House how he hopes to get the CSE assessments this year without the co-operation of teachers, or what he expects fourth year pupils to do next year when there are no standard grade materials for them? Does he not appreciate that all these problems would vanish overnight if he stopped running away from an outside opinion and accepted the reasonable, moderate, demand of teachers for an independent review of their pay?

Mr. Younger: Like many of us, the hon. Gentleman will have attended meetings at which people will have put statistics before him. He raises matters which are strongly felt, but they are best put in the normal negotiating process which was set up precisely to look at pay and conditions of service. Even at this stage I urge teachers to accept that that is the way to deal with what they see as great grievances which they want sorted out. I am in close consultation with the education authorities and the Scottish Examination Board to ensure that every possible step is taken to see that examinations go ahead and that pupils receive proper recognition for their work. I understand that some education authorities are now prepared to take action against teachers who refuse to carry out instructions on the preparation of pupils for external examinations.

Mrs. McCurley: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the refusal of teachers to negotiate means that they might be missing out on the kind of financial redistribution that has happened recently, which has helped the hard-pressed ratepayer?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate my hon. Friend's point, but I have confined myself in the teachers' dispute to encouraging teachers to use the machinery that was set up precisely for the purpose of looking into the sort of grievances that they have. I hope that they will do that.

Mr. Canavan: How can the Secretary of State possibly justify a situation in which a young person can spend three or four years studying hard at university, followed by another year at a college of education, only to find that a teacher is paid £138 a week less than a policeman? Will the right hon. Gentleman accept full responsibility for the current crisis in Scottish education and the chaos that exists in many Scottish schools? Does he appreciate that it is up to him to help find a solution by agreeing to the legitimate demand for an independent pay review?

Mr. Younger: The hon. Gentleman might find, if he really looks into the matter, that it is extraordinarily difficult to compare the totally different jobs of teachers and policemen. Everything to do with their conditions, times and type of work is utterly different. The crisis in the schools to which the hon. Gentleman refers is due to the fact that teachers have decided to use this sort of guerrilla action, to the great deterioration of the chances of their pupils, instead of using the machinery that was set up exactly for the purpose of trying to sort out their grievances.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Has my right hon. Friend noticed that teachers seldom go on strike on Mondays and Fridays? Apparently they get paid for two days' work on Mondays and Fridays, so that teachers who work only two days a week get paid for four days. Will he look into the matter because, if that is the case, it is a disgraceful state of affairs?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate the point that my hon. Friend makes. I understand that all sorts of variations on the tune can be played, including allowing for holidays and the like. However, none of that should blind us to the fact that the extreme action of taking labour away from the schools when children are facing examinations—perhaps their only chance of taking those examinations—is a most serious step to take and is quite unjustified by any grievances when machinery exists for dealing with such matters.

Mr. Wilson: Is it not a fact that the teachers do not believe that the Secretary of State has, or is prepared to find, the necessary resources to meet their claim under the negotiating procedure to which he has referred, particularly as he has turned down the request for an independent pay review? Is the right hon. Gentleman cramped by the effects of the Barnett formula? If so, will he ask the Treasury for more money so that the matter may be settled swiftly, in view of the harm that is being done to the education of many children?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate the point that the hon. Gentleman makes in the last part of that supplementary question, and I am sure that he will use all his influence, at least in his area, to persuade teachers that this is not the right way to pursue their concerns. I have made it clear in my offer to the teachers that if they will go into negotiations and produce a package which includes pay and conditions of service, I shall be prepared to receive and consider constructively such a package and, if it is attractive enough, do my best to find some resources to help. I have given that undertaking and I repeat it today.

Mr. Hirst: When my right hon. Friend meets the general secretary of the EIS, will he tell him that many people in my constituency find the tactics of the EIS in victimising pupils who happen to be represented in Parliament by Conservative Members absolutely unfair and disgraceful and very much at odds which the professional standing of teachers?

Mr. Younger: I absolutely agree with my hon. Friend. I have found that even people who are sympathetic to the teachers' cause and who think that the Government should have taken various steps to avoid the present state of affairs are incensed that they should be picked on because of the constituency in which they happen to live. What is happening is quite unjustified at a time when I have made a perfectly reasonable offer to the teachers, and, as every day passes, it is becoming more difficult to implement it.

Mr. Maxton: Does the Secretary of State know, as I do, senior teachers who live in Conservative-controlled district council areas, who are at the top of their salary scale in promoted posts and who will require a 3·5 per cent. increase in salary simply to pay the increase that is being demanded in rates? Does that not illustrate clearly the rightness and justice of the teachers' claim and also the absolute mess into which the Secretary of State has got on the rating system?

Mr. Younger: Neither of those things is indicated by what the hon. Gentleman has said. The issue we are concerned with here is that teachers feel that they have been badly treated and have grievances they want sorted out. There is no doubt about that. They have decided to take industrial action in the schools instead of using the machinery set up for the purpose of sorting out the problem. That is not justifiable and I hope it will stop.

Mr. Bruce: Will the Secretary of State acknowledge that his suggestion that he is prepared to make an offer to the teachers would have more credibility if he had not proposed a £64 million cash cut in next year's education budget? Will he now admit that that was a mistake and restore it? In those circumstances he might reasonably expect the teachers to respond. Will he further admit that finding £38 million for the ratepayers when there was so much protest but not being able to find money for the teachers was a rather cynical choice on his part?

Mr. Younger: Both those points are extremely poor. The first one—sorry, I have forgotten what the first one was——

Mr. Bruce: The first one was that the Secretary of State has cut next year's education budget by £64 million.

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman; I am sorry that it slipped my mind. The reduction in the education budget for several years was not as large as the reduction in the number of pupils. Therefore, the amount of money allocated per pupil is at its highest level ever. That should not be overlooked. In regard to the hon. Gentleman's general point, may I repeat that the teachers have a perfectly good way of dealing with their problem. It is getting more and more difficult every day to carry it out, if they come to it, but they have to produce a package of pay and conditions of service.

Mr. Malone: Is my right hon. Friend aware that between 1983 and 1984 in Scotland there was an 8 per cent. increase in funding for education per head of population? If that is compared with the figure for England, current spending per head in Scotland is 35 per cent. ahead of spending in England. Is that not a sign that my right hon. Friend is working very hard for education in Scotland?

Mr. Younger: I welcome my hon. Friend's efforts to put a bit more realism into the debate on education. The talk about cuts in education cannot be seen except against a background of large reductions in the number of pupils. The fact is that the Government have managed to find enough money to ensure that the amount per pupil has been increasing all the time. There is no excuse, therefore, for standards of education falling.

Mr. Tom Clarke: When the Secretary of State gives thought to the important matter of pay, will he bear in mind the widespread discontent among teachers, parents and pupils about the childminder exercise, whereby teachers are being asked to teach subjects about which they know very little and to deal with disciplines which do not relate to their background? Given the serious problem, will the Secretary of State discourage his hon. Friends from making the kind of negative and unhelpful comments that they have made in the House this afternoon?

Mr. Younger: I have not heard any negative and unhelpful comments from the Government side of the House. I appreciate that the teachers have strong views, which vary very much between different teachers, about the sort of duties that the hon. Gentleman has mentioned. It is not for me to make pronouncements about them in the House of Commons. It is for the teachers to negotiate with their employers in the joint negotiating committee. That is the place where they should be sorted out.

Mr. Dewar: The Secretary of State will be aware, of course, that the EIS national council is meeting on Monday. Does he agree that it is very important that everything should be done to persuade the EIS that negotiations would be worth while and would be approached in a reasonably flexible spirit by the Government? In view of that, can he confirm that on Channel 4 news, I think last night, in an interview the right hon. Gentleman said that the negotiations should be not just about pay but also about improved conditions of service? It is important to establish exactly what the right hon. Gentleman meant by that, because the inclusion of conditions has always been taken as meaning that there should be a deterioration in conditions in order to buy some increase on the pay side. If he genuinely means that he is prepared to look at improvements in conditions of service, will he underline that before Monday so that the EIS and other teachers are aware of it?

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, who has raised an important point. I certainly join him in hoping that if the EIS has a council meeting on Monday it will think very long and hard about the industrial action and about the suggestion that it should settle its problems in the joint negotiating committee.

On the deterioration in conditions, what I said during the Channel 4 programme was what I have been saying all along, namely that the package which I hope will come out of the negotiating committee should cover pay and conditions of service. Teachers have several times questioned whether that means a deterioration or an improvement in conditions. I do not put it as strongly as that. I put it in an extremely neutral sense. They must address themselves to conditions of service, and I do not want to pre-empt which way that goes. I would need to have a package which included both pay and conditions of service to justify any attempt to find money from other parts of my programme to fund the package.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Coal Industry

43. Mr. Canavan asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many people have been (a) arrested, (b) charged, (c) prosecuted and (d) convicted in Scotland as a result of incidents related to the miners' strike.

47. Mr. Hirst asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many people in Scotland have been successfully prosecuted for offences arising from the miners' strike.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland (Mr. Peter Fraser): As at 6 March 1985, 1,504 persons had been arrested, 1,483 persons had been charged by the police and proceedings have been instituted against 1,046 persons. Five hundred and eighty-three persons had been convicted as a result of incidents related to the miners' strike, but there are a number of cases still to come to trial.

Mr. Canavan: If the Crown Office is unwilling to drop all pending charges as a gesture of reconciliation, will the Solicitor-General at least instruct the procurators fiscal that there is no need to report to the National Coal Board every case involving a miner—otherwise, they are liable to be punished twice for the same alleged offence? Does the Solicitor-General agree with the chief constables of Central region and Fife that tension in the coalfields would be greatly reduced if Albert Wheeler was seen to be more willing to reinstate sacked miners?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The basis on which people have been charged in connection with offences arising out of the miners' strike is exactly the same basis on which charges are brought against other people in the courts for the whole range of criminal activities, quite regardless of the miners' strike. As far as I can ascertain, about 251 cases still have to be brought to the courts in Scotland. I hope that they will be dealt with during the next two or three months.

I must emphasise that the traditional role of the prosecutor in Scotland ends once a conviction or an aquittal is secured. It would be a wholly unacceptable departure from that role if I were to become involved in other matters subsequent to that, or, indeed, if my noble and learned friend the Lord Advocate were to do so.

Mr. Hirst: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that his answer confirms the highly disagreeable nature of the violence and intimidation that sustained the miners' strike in Scotland? Does he agree that the National Coal Board is right to refuse to grant an amnesty to those convicted properly in the courts of crimes of violence and destruction of property?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The matter of dismissal by the NCB is entirely a matter for the NCB. As my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, the Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart), has already said, if the dismissed miners take exception to that, they have another remedy available to them. From what I heard earlier, it would be quite wrong to trivialise some of the offences committed during the miners' strike or to pretend in any way that they were not serious. Rather surprisingly, unlike the Leader of the Opposition, some Scottish Members of Parliament seem to be under the misapprehension that there has been no violence and no serious offences arising out of the miners' strike.

Mr. Millan: Does the Solicitor-General for Scotland not realise that it is not so much what is happening in the courts that is causing widespread anxiety, as the action of the NCB in Scotland? Why do Ministers not stop being apologists for the NCB and make it clear that it would be in everyone's interest to reduce the tension, bitterness and resentment in the Scottish coalfields and the surrounding areas, and try to encourage people to live together again in a civilised manner at the end of this difficult dispute? Ministers have a responsibility, and we are asking them to exercise it.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: As the right hon. Gentleman fully appreciates, it has never been the role of the public prosecutor in Scotland to become involved beyond the stage of conviction or acquittal. The right hon. Gentleman, of all people, should appreciate that if the Government were to say at this stage that the 200-odd cases that are still to come to court should be withdrawn, we would be adopting a political stance as unacceptable as would have been an initial approach to the cases on a political basis.

Mr. Bill Walker: When we consider the cases that have come before the courts and been decided, and those that have still to come to court, must we not bear in mind the public's attitude to the many policemen who were badly injured in carrying out their duties? The public expect such matters to be dealt with properly.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Yes, indeed. A considerable number of police officers in Scotland were injured during the course of that unhappy industrial action. The offences have not been trivial. For instance, an iron bar was thrown through the window of a three-year-old child's bedroom and landed on the bed. Such matters are not to be swept aside and forgotten. [Interruption.] The courts should consider such cases and should consider the question of innocence or guilt, and it is for the courts—not for hon. Members—to impose the necessary fines or terms of imprisonment.

Mr. Strang: Does the Solicitor-General for Scotland recall the representations that he received from my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie), and the meeting that he had with the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Leith (Mr. Brown) and myself, about the position of Mr. David Hamilton, the chairman of the Lothian strike committee, who languished for nine weeks in jail and was then found not guilty? Will the Government recognise that the truth is that the NCB management in Scotland wishes to sack people because they were active in the strike and not because of anything else that they have done? That is why the Government and the NCB are isolated on this matter. When will there be some change in the situation?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I recall that meeting, at which I gave the hon. Gentleman an undertaking that the matter would be brought to court as quickly as possible, as indeed it was. I cannot see why the hon. Gentleman takes exception to that. Mr. Hamilton had the opportunity to be tried before a jury. He was acquitted. So far as I am concerned, the matter ends there.

Mr. Dewar: Will the Solicitor-General for Scotland accept that, sadly, he is misrepresenting the Opposition's case? Our case is that there are undoubtedly a number of people who, by any yardstick, have not been involved in serious crime, assaults on fellow workers or destruction of property, but who have been convicted on charges that have attracted only admonitions or small fines; and have been dismissed. Unless there is a proper review procedure based upon justice in individual cases, as there seems to be in other NCB areas, people in Scotland will retain the unpalatable and unacceptable impression that men have been sacked for who they are and not for what they have done.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: If anyone is seeking to misrepresent the situation, it is the hon. Gentleman. He knows perfectly well that I have neither responsibility for, nor any involvement with, the chairman of the NCB either on a national or a Scottish basis. My concern is the prosecution of crime in Scotland. If the hon. Gentleman has any complaint to make about any particular case, he should make it to me. So far as I am aware, no one has yet made such a complaint. If the hon. Gentleman is saying that we have been involved politically in the prosecution of those people, he has made an extremely serious allegation.

Mr. Dewar: That is not the point.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The hon. Gentleman says that that is not the point, but he has raised it with me this Question Time.

High Court Trials

44. Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland whether he can give an estimate as to the length of time on average it takes for cases, reported to him, the Lord Advocate, or to procurators fiscal (a) to be brought to the High Court and (b) to be conducted during 1984-85; and whether it is his policy to ensure that cases are heard as quickly as possible.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The Crown is required by statute to serve an indictment on accused persons who have been refused bail within 80 days of full committal, and to commence the trial within 110 days. There is limited provision for extension, but in 1983, which is the latest year for which figures are available, only six cases did not come to trial within 110 days.

The Crown endeavours to serve an indictment as early as possible, and in custody cases this is generally done within 70 days. In High Court cases where the accused is released on bail, the trial must be commenced within 12 months of first appearance of the accused on petition. No figures are available to indicate the length of time taken to conclude cases once the trial has commenced.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In view of the great increase in the number of drugs cases, will my hon. and learned Friend confirm that steps will be taken to ensure that reported cases are brought to trial as quickly as possible?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Yes, there is a tight statutory timetable to be adhered to. Possibly of greater importance and interest to my hon. Friend is the fact that my right hon. and noble Friend the Lord Advocate has decided that cases involving the supply of hard drugs in Scotland should generally be brought in the High Court to ensure that the full range of penalties is available to the court.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will understand that an English hon. Member comes into Scottish questions with some trepidation. You will also know that I have tabled Question No. 12 on forestry policy——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman's question was not reached. I cannot deal with that matter. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not ask his question now.

Mr. Carlisle: The point is whether forestry questions should be down for answer by the Secretary of State for Scotland, as they apply to the whole of the United Kingdom. That is unfortunate for hon. Members with English constituencies. Is it possible for the matter to be reviewed?

Mr. Wilson: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Hon. Members representing Scottish constituencies will have noticed the increasing number of English Members who have come to Scottish questions recently — [HON. MEMBERS: "Why not?"] — thus making it difficult for Scottish Members to monitor the work of the Secretary of State for Scotland, which covers some eight or nine Ministries. Taking forestry questions, which is a United Kingdom function, during Scottish questions is attracting even more English Members to Scottish questions. They are caught up in the magnificence of our proceedings and join in, thus making it more difficult for us to get a word in edgeways. If Scottish questions are to include other matters such as forestry, is it not desirable to have Scottish questions every three weeks, as used to be the case, rather than every four?

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop rose——

Mr. Forth rose——

Mr. Robert Hughes rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This takes up a lot of time.

Mr. Forth: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will you confirm that hon. Members who represent English constituencies are as entitled to attend Scottish questions as are Scottish Members to attend and participate in other Question Times?

Mr. Robert Hughes: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I draw your attention to the fact that Scottish questions overran the allotted time to 3.20 pm by a couple of minutes? I am not complaining about that——

Mr. Speaker: One minute.

Mr. Robert Hughes: One minute. Had the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) not immediately jumped up on a point of order, my question, No. 45, might have been called in injury time. As it has not been reached, may I give notice that I shall seek to raise the matter on the Adjournment at the earliest opportunity?

Mr. Ewing: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I understand and sympathise with the difficulties of the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle). Leaving out questions to the Solicitor-General for Scotland, Scottish Office Ministers answered 10 questions today.

When previously I raised with you the question about which hon. Members you allowed to catch your eye, you rightly told me that you attempted to call hon. Members with questions on the Order Paper and said that if the Opposition Front Bench did not take up so much time, more Back Benchers would be called. I thought that I should point out that, while at our previous Scottish Question Time, my Front Bench colleagues and myself rose on only three occasions and today on only four occasions, that did not help progress during Scottish questions. You chose to call five Conservative Members —four English and one Scot—who did not even have questions on the Order Paper. What is the position? Will hon. Members with questions on the Order Paper be called, or given that there is a serious shortage of Scottish Tories, are the Government packing the Conservative Benches with English Tories to try to achieve a balance?

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. This raises a point of some substance. It is an observable fact that Scottish, Welsh and Northern Ireland Members expect to catch your eye with greater facility on matters affecting their parts of the United Kingdom. However, they expect to catch your eye with equal facility when Ministers from the English part of the United Kingdom are answering questions. This is a serious rather than a trivial or passing matter, and the only way to resolve it is to declare that, apart from the hon. Member who has tabled a question, we are all Members of the Parliament of the United Kingdom and have an equal aspiration to good fortune in catching your eye.

Mr. Canavan: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Do you agree with me that all these complaints and time-wasting tactics strengthen the case for setting up a Scottish Parliament?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) is correct. This is the United Kingdom Parliament, and everyone has an opportunity to catch the eye of the Chair. I make a judgment every day—I think I have said this before—about matters of interest to Members. Today I judged that the miners' strike, rating and teachers' pay were matters of considerable interest. It would have been possible to race down the Order Paper, but I managed to called 28 hon. Members, 16 of whom had later questions on the Order Paper on those very topics. I do not think that we should ever exclude English Members just because it is Scottish Question Time.

British National Oil Corporation

3.38 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Energy (Mr. Alick Buchanan-Smith): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement about the British National Oil Corporation. I hope that it is for the convenience of the House that I make this statement now, in view of the debate arranged for tomorrow.

In the summer of last year, the Government reviewed the institutional arrangements and operations of BNOC. We then concluded that the balance of advantage lay in retaining the corporation in its present form, given the contribution that it was able to make to deriving full benefit from our oil resources.

Since then, the environment in which BNOC has to operate has undergone important changes. BNOC has traditionally operated by purchasing and selling oil under term contracts at prices fixed for a period of months ahead. Its purchases under participation contracts have been in this form which, as I explained to the Select Committee on Energy, has enabled BNOC to make a contribution to stability of markets in the short term.

There has, however, now been a major change in the structure of the oil market away from term contracts and towards spot and similar short-term transactions. This trend is unlikely to be reversed in the near future. In these circumstances, BNOC could avoid the risk of losses only by linking its prices for participation oil closely and continuously to movements in the spot market. Such a system would mean that BNOC could no longer contribute to stability in the market. The Government have concluded that this shifts the balance of advantage decisively against the retention of BNOC in its present form. I see no advantage in retaining a public sector body to operate on that basis.

The change in market structure that I have described has led me to the conclusion that BNOC should no longer purchase oil by exercising its options under participation agreements. Dealing in participation oil has been the dominant part of BNOC's activities.

The Government consider it essential to retain powers that would enhance security of supply if that proved to be necessary. We will therefore retain the participation agreements themselves so that we can activate them to have access to these oil supplies should the need arise. We will also retain the arrangements under which we have the power to receive oil from continental shelf licensees as royalty in kind. Those two factors together mean that security of supply will continue to be safeguarded.

I see a need in present circumstances to retain one other function of BNOC—the management, as agent for the Government, of the Government oil pipeline system. This system is important for both defence and civil purposes.

The retention of those three functions—custody of the participation agreements, disposal of oil received as royalty in kind and management of the Government pipeline system—requires the establishment of a small Government oil and pipelines agency as a successor body to BNOC. The abolition of BNOC and the establishment of the agency for the purposes that I have described will require legislation, and I intend to introduce this in the present Session of Parliament.

Finally, I wish to express the Government's thanks for the valuable work carried out by the chairman, board and staff of BNOC.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): The Minister's statement is as disgraceful as it is incredible. As recently as 18 December he told the House of the important, vital and crucial role that BNOC could play and was playing in securing and controlling the nation's oil supplies. He now announces its abolition.

The notion that the Department of Energy can handle participation agreements and the complex problems of buying and selling oil is incredible. How many people with experience and professionalism in oil trading has the Department of Energy compared with Mr. Goskirk and the BNOC team? The statement is a disgraceful kick in the teeth for some of the most professional oil traders in the country?

The only lame excuse for abolishing BNOC is that it could no longer contribute to the Government's propping up of the oil price policy, but that was never its intention or original purpose. Deliberate intervention by the Government in the past few months has created the corporation's problems.

Did not the Minister himself recently carry out a review of BNOC's role and totally reaffirm its vital part in the management of our oil affairs? We then heard that the Prime Minister's private policy unit had been further reviewing the corporation's role. Is it not absolutely clear that, on a major aspect of energy policy, the Department of Energy has now been taken over by the Prime Minister's policy unit? Given the very personal and honourable involvement of the Minister of State in supporting BNOC, should he not resign as a result of this decision?

The Minister's announcement is a final act of vandalism in the breaking up and dismantling of a highly successful and profitable corporation set up under the Oil and Gas (Enterprise) Act. BNOC belonged to this nation. It was the only corporation with 100 per cent. loyalty to the nation. We shall oppose this legislation tooth and nail. We commit ourselves to re-establishing BNOC, which will safeguard and develop our precious national oil resources.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I only wish that the hon. Gentleman had read the statement, or at least listened to me. There is no question of the Department of Energy taking over the participation agreement functions. We intend setting up the oil and pipelines agency to exercise the powers under the agreements.

I make it absolutely clear to the hon. Gentleman that this decision is my decision and that of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State with the agreement of colleagues. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that the policy unit to which he referred advises my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. I have received no advice or representations from that body.

The hon. Gentleman cannot sit like Canute and completely ignore market conditions. He cannot defend a body and its functions when that body is no longer appropriate.

Mr. John Hannam (Exeter): Will my right hon. Friend accept our thanks for making this statement today in advance of the debate that is due to take place tomorrow? Will he accept that those of us who have supported BNOC's role as a protective mechanism to ensure security of supply and as a stabilising influence on the oil market recognise that the position has changed dramatically during the past few months and that, therefore, we welcome my right hon. Friend's decision?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He is absolutely correct. Two things are important. First, BNOC's ability to help in the short term is now severely limited. Secondly, we are retaining certain functions, especially the participation agreement and royalty in kind, which are important in relation to security of supply.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): Does the Minister not realise that this is yet another chapter in the story of bungling ineptitude in relation to the development of offshore oil which could have job implications for Scotland if the world oil price falls? Does the right hon. Gentleman not realise that the real answer is to have an adequate depletion policy with production cuts in open association with OPEC to sustain the world oil price? Without that, the Government will find themselves floundering completely.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Before the hon. Gentleman pursues that line, he should study not only how BNOC operates but the evidence to the Select Committee, and its recommendations.

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): Will my right hon. Friend accept that, contrary to the primitive views that we have heard from the Opposition, his decision is wholly welcome? The decision will be warmly welcomed by all those who are interested in lower prices for the consumer and a stable oil market. Will my right hon. Friend concede that the existence of a quasi-official oil price for North sea oil has created great difficulties for the Government and that the apparent size of intervention to hold up the OPEC price has not helped stabilise the oil market? Will my right hon. Friend accept that, by his decision and, I hope, future policy, United Kingdom industry will help the world oil price to settle down and so bring benefits to sterling and oil consumers?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: My right hon. Friend is correct. If BNOC had now moved to a market-related type system, as recommended in some quarters, that could have destabilised the oil market. In those circumstances, I think that there is no purpose in maintaining a particular state function in this area. The market has changed, and I believe that it is right and realistic to recognise that. I am grateful for my right hon. Friend's remarks.

Mr. Ted Leadbitter (Hartlepool): I think that the Minister might not take too much notice of the right hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell), who was a well-known failure as Secretary of State for Energy. Apparently, from what I have hard, the truth is foreign to the Minister. [HON. MEMBERS: "Question."] When the Select Committee on Energy asked about the restructuring proposals for BNOC, why was it advised by the Minister's officials to write to the Prime Minister? When the Select Committee did so, the reply was that the matter being considered was confidential. The Select Committee has been bypassed by this statement. Will the Minister now try, as a simple exercise, to associate himself, for once, with the truth?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: There is no question of bypassing the Select Committee or anyone else. If the hon. Gentleman had only listened to the questions and the answers given in the Select Committee, he would know that there was a question about the role of a particular body. If he had listened to my answer to the Select Committee or read its report he would know that I was asked whether BNOC's role was being reviewed. I said that that was continuing in relation to the circumstances. The decision has been taken because of the changed circumstances.

Mr. Leadbitter: It was last week.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Therefore, the hon. Gentleman himself should perhaps be paying more attention to the truth than trying to preach to others.

Mr. Ian Lloyd (Havant): I thank my right hon. Friend for announcing these proposals so that we may consider them carefully, and have a rather more intelligent debate tomorrow than we might otherwise have been able to do.

Mr. Leadbitter: It is not true.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): It is nonsense.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Lloyd: Secondly, although the Select Committee has plainly had no chance to consider the proposals, and since it may be argued that they follow our recommendations fairly closely, I hope that they will be received with some enthusiasm by the Committee. Do the Government expect the new organisation to be self-sustaining, and, if so, which section of its operations will be revenue-producing?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Its main purpose is to work as an agency for the Government for some of BNOC's current functions. The Government already pay fees for some of BNOC's functions. The details of the financing are still to be worked out; that will be done during the preparation of legislation. I am grateful for what my hon. Friend said about the Select Committee's role. Although, in the outline of these proposals, we have not necessarily followed exactly what the Select Committee recommended, the deliberations of my hon. Friend and the other members of the Select Committee over the past six months helped us to reach a decision on this matter.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): Can the Minister of State offer any evidence that dealing on the spot market necessarily has less influence on stabilising prices than dealing with long-term contracts?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Yes, I think so. I believe that the terms for acquiring participation oil have a strong potential for destablising the market. Moving to a market-related price system means frequent price changes related to the spot market. It also has the effect of accentuating market trends. Those involved in sales realise the potential for instability.

Mr. Michael Morris (Northampton, South): Is my right hon. Friend aware how welcome it will be to the country to find a Department of State that reacts to changed market circumstances and at the same time safeguards the nations's security of supply?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I am grateful to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): May I remind the Minister that the Select Committee on Energy has never considered the proposals contained in his statement? For the Chairman to stand in the Chamber and say that it has is completely wrong. The Committee has never discussed the proposal. I will discuss it at the next meeting. The pressure that has been on the Committee for the past six months and which lies behind the statement has come from the oil lobby and not, to my knowledge, from members of the Select Committee. What has been said today is a further attack on the national interest such as has gone on for many years with this Government. I am afraid that the national interest will lose as a result of what is happening to BNOC.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The hon. Gentleman has to answer for himself in regard to what the Select Committee said. I said that the deliberations——

Mr. Barron: It is there.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I said that the Select Committee's deliberations were a help in reaching the decisions which we have announced today. (Interruption.)

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I said a few moments ago that in some respects we had not followed the Select Committee's recommendations. The national interest was uppermost in the discussion that we had before reaching this decision. We have retained the functions of BNOC that we believe are unnecessary and important to the national interest and discarded those which we believe are unnecessary in a changed market.

Mr. Tony Speller (Devon, North): Does my right hon. Friend accept that the purpose of Government is to seek lower prices for fuel for industry, commerce and private households, and that anything which works towards that, as this move may do, is to be welcomed? I congratulate the Government on the decision.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I must emphasise that the role of BNOC in fixing a price is related to the short term, to avoid destabilising the market. I do not believe that BNOC either has, or has attempted to exercise, the power to influence prices in the long term. In those circumstances, and given the fact that it no longer has the same number of contracts as previously because of the changed market, it is right to take this decision.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): Do not the events of recent weeks demonstrate the enormous importance of the impact which oil prices and the rate of oil depletion have on the value of the pound, interest rates and our economy? In view of today's statement and the confusion that the Minister's statement on oil pricing to the Select Committee caused, will he make it clear to the House how in future the Government intend to protect the national interest in relation to oil prices and oil depletion?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I would urge the hon. Gentleman, as I have urged others, to read my evidence and that of other people to the Select Committee. BNOC has no power to influence the prices of oil in the long term. There has been power in the short term so long as market conditions make it possible for BNOC to operate term contracts. The hon. Gentleman must face up to change, not only in the United Kingdom oil market, but in world oil markets, which have shifted decisively and on a longer-term basis to spot sales, not contract sales. In the light of that, the decision was taken.

Mr. Patrick McNair-Wilson (New Forest): Has my right hon. Friend had discussions with representatives of the other major oil producers to reassure them that his action today does not pave the way for a major price war, with all that that could mean for sterling? Will he confirm that it is in our national interest to keep an orderly oil market?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Obviously, there have not been consultations about this decision with OPEC, to which I think my hon. Friend refers. The decision will be well understood. Contrary to the views expressed by Opposition Members, the decision accepts the realities of the position.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is the Minister aware that, when a Labour Government set up BNOC, they did only half the job? One reason why the Minister can do what he has today announced he will do through ensuing legislation is that they gave BNOC only the ability to buy and hold oil, not to take over the companies. Is it not a fact that this is a prelude to allowing the Yanks to get their hands on British oil to a greater extent than at present, especially as she at No. 10 will be in control of it for a while? Is it not a scandal that Ministers at the Department of Energy are letting the Prime Minister dominate them to the extent that she will control part of their Department because she does not trust them?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Characteristically, the hon. Gentleman has not recognised the position. I hope that he noted what I said about participation oil and royalty in kind. In that sense we are certainly looking after the national interest. During the past 20 years the success of the development of the North sea has been a prime example of all the best aspects of the private enterprise system. If we had not had that, the country would not now benefit to the degree that it does.

Mr. Rob Hayward (Kingswood): I welcome the statement, but will my right hon. Friend accept that the Select Committee's report, which was published earlier this week, identified some contradictions, and that it was therefore right for the Government to take some action in whichever direction because of those contradictions which had been identified?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: It would have been most dangerous if there had been any speculation or indecision about what might happen in future. The matter is sensitive for many market areas and the economy generally. Therefore, I welcome what my hon. Friend has said.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): Will the Minister of State, who is fundamentally an honest man, tell us what change there has been in the world market between 6 March, when he gave evidence to the Select Committee, and today? On 6 March, he gave no sign that he would abolish BNOC. Is it not true that there is instability in the world oil market partly because of Government greed? Britain and Norway together produce more than the Saudis, and we are doing that because the Government are hooked on getting revenue. That is the real reason for the present difficulties.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: If the hon. Gentleman reads my evidence to the Select Committee, he will find that I made it clear then, as I did in December, that the functions of BNOC are reviewed by the Government in the light of changing circumstances. Of course, there was no major change in the past week. The hon. Gentleman shows the most extraordinary ignorance of the circumstances of the market if he believes that one should trail one's coat for some days before a decision is taken. Surprisingly, he also shows ignorance about Norwegian and United Kingdom production in the North sea if he tries to liken production offshore in the deep and hostile waters of the North sea to onshore production in the middle east. The position is completely different, and he should recognise that.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): My right hon. Friend's statement will be warmly welcomed by British industry. Does he agree that there may be a short-term weakening in the domestic price of oil, which would be good news for British industry and employment, although it is not welcomed by the Opposition?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Obviously, the market will have to choose the way in which it reacts, but, given the firmness of the decision, I hope that the market will settle quickly.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): The Minister said that he had yet to work out the financial implications of the changes that he has announced. Can he give us an idea of when he will be able to do that? Does he agree that the need to retain participation agreements to secure oil supplies means that we should ensure the supply of products, not just the crude oil, because that must be given to the major companies anyway? In a time of crisis, we need the products, not the supplies.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to await an announcement on the details of the legislation, although all these and other details will be discussed with the chairman of BNOC. As to security of supply, we already have in place arrangements with oil companies, especially those which refine oil and which, therefore, have considerable control over products, not just crude oil.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his decision will be greeted with relief and even delight in the west midlands and in all areas that depend upon heavy manufacturing industry? Is he further aware that it has always been difficult to explain why taxpayers' money was being used to rig oil prices so as to make oil more expensive than it would otherwise have been?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: In fairness, there is no question of taxpayers' money being used to rig oil prices. As I acknowledge today and have acknowledged on many previous occasions, when BNOC had many term contracts for oil it was able to operate a stabilising influence on the market. It has done so successfully, but we must recognise that the market has changed. In that sense, I am grateful for what my hon. Friend said.

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): The Minister talked about accepting the realities of the position. Is he saying that the Government have no depletion policy at all and that they are not interested in stabilising oil prices, which is very much in the national interest? Is he abandoning responsibility for all those factors?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I am certainly not abandoning responsibility. As to depletion, the right hon. Gentleman should remind himself of the Labour Government's policy and the assurances that they gave on that before he makes such a statement.

Mr. Gerald Malone (Aberdeen, South): My right hon. Friend will be aware that during the two Select Committee inquiries into this matter there was some scepticism about the ability of BNOC to control short-term fluctuations in prices. There will be a recognition throughout the House that he has been exceptionally perceptive in following the market trend. Can he say whether Opposition Members are as perceptive if they are thinking of controlling depletion in the North sea? Would that not go completely against market trends and drive away investment?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Yes. With heavy front-end investment in the North sea, if one followed the sort of policy advocated by the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Gowan (Mr. Millan) it would hinder development and would be to the detriment of the United Kingdom economy, and especially that of Scotland.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): Since some of the Minister's hon. Friends have said constantly that there will be a reduction in oil prices as a result of the decision, will the Minister confirm today that the decision will not affect oil or petrol prices? Secondly, how many jobs will be lost as a result of the decision?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: BNOC currently employs about 140 staff. We shall need staff to run the new agency, and numbers and details will be discussed with the chairman of BNOC. There is no way in which I can predict what will happen to prices, any more than I was able to predict in the past.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Is this not yet another disgraceful example of the Government's ludicrous commitment to their ideological theories, regardless of the national interest or of international oil stability?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The hon. Gentleman is completely wrong. Had he listened to my statement, he would have heard that we are retaining some functions that will be operated on an agency basis on the Government's behalf, where we believe those functions to be necessary in the national interest. We are discarding unnecessary functions, and I would have hoped that the hon. Gentleman would have welcomed that as an efficient Government move.

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): But is not this announcement another small element in the process that will lead historians to look back and wonder how the British people could so tragically have squandered this major natural resource? In view of the Minister's answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers), and as his statement made no reference to staff, will he at least give an assurance that all jobs and present conditions of employment and salaries will be maintained?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I paid a tribute to the staff, who, as I hope the hon. Gentleman recognised, have done a good job. Their future is something that will be properly discussed with the chairman and with those representing the staff.

Mr. Rowlands: Will the Minister clarify a couple of his replies? First, will he confirm that in January and February this year, the Government and his Department encouraged BNOC to maintain those price levels, and that the Government were wholly committed to that policy? It was not BNOC's policy, but the Government's. Secondly, until legislation is passed, BNOC will be operating and will have to make decisions about prices in March and April or until the legislation goes through. What will BNOC do in determining those contracts, which involve large amounts of oil, before the legislation—if it gets through the House—is passed?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: On the first question, BNOC has fixed prices in full consultation with the Government during recent months, for reasons which I explained clearly and unequivocally to the Select Committee. Decisions have not yet been taken, nor have recommendations been made, on future market prices. The hon. Gentleman will have to await them.

Mr. Leadbitter: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. During his statement and subsequently, the Minister said that the conclusions that have now been drawn arise from—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is a very distinguished member of the Chairmen's Panel. He should address his point of order to me, not to the Minister.

Mr. Leadbitter: I was trying, Mr. Speaker. The Minister said today that the conclusions that he has drawn and that have now been made available to the House arise from some observations on the report of a Select Committee of which I am a long-serving and, if I may say so, distinguished member. Since we are having a debate tomorrow, is it proper and in order that that observation by the Minister should be considered by the House? I find nothing in the report which suggests that the Select Committee helped the Minister, in even the minutest way, to arrive at the conclusion that he did.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. Gentleman is not chairing a Committee tomorrow, the best course for him to adopt would be to seek to take part in the debate, when he will doubtless be able to make that point.

Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service (Amendment of Statutory Duties)

4.10 pm

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the statutory terms of reference of the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service (ACAS) by repealing its statutory duty to encourage the extension of collective bargaining and to impose instead a duty to encourage co-operation and consultation between employers and employees at the place of work.

ACAS currently has a statutory duty to encourage the extension of collective bargaining. I believe that it should more appropriately be charged with the duty to promote better co-operation and consultation between employers and employees at the place of work.

The Government have rightly pursued a programme that has modernised British employment law. In a series of Acts of Parliament the objectives have been, first, to make trade unions more accountable to their membership and, secondly, to restore the balance of trade union immunities where they were clearly excessive. This modernisation of the employment law is an essential step towards making British labour relations more co-operative and less divisive. The aim of us all must be to help all those who work in an enterprise, not to undermine the health of the business by fighting one another but instead to work together in a spirit of co-operation for the success of the enterprise so that it can more readily create new prosperity and new opportunities for employment. If we as a country are to enjoy greater economic success, we clearly need to move away from the entrenched "them and us" attitudes which have their origin in an outdated doctrine of class warfare which our country can no longer afford.

ACAS was established under the Employment Protection Act 1975. The right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) introduced it with terms of reference that had been provided by the Trades Union Congress and its advisers. Not surprisingly, the trade unions were anxious to raise their membership to the highest possible level and chose to do so not by offering their members and potential members an attractive service but by the compulsion of statute.

Although the Act provided that ACAS should be independent of the Government of the day, its original terms of reference were unfortunately partisan. Sections 11 to 16 of the Act established a procedure whereby trade unions could use the services of ACAS and the central arbitration committee to seek to obtain recognition from employers. This was a partisan procedure. It cast doubt on the impartiality of ACAS and led many employers to regard ACAS with suspicion. The result was that in 1979 the chairman of ACAS wrote to the Secretary of State for Employment that the council of ACAS

"cannot satisfactorily operate the statutory recognition procedures as they stand."

My right hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Prior) therefore repealed sections 11 to 16 of the Employment Protection Act 1975 in his own Employment Act 1980.

Unfortunately, however, the job was not completed. Section 1(2) of the Employment Protection Act 1975, which still applies, charges ACAS with "the general duty of promoting the improvement of industrial relations, and in particular of encouraging the extension of collective bargaining and the development and, where necessary, reform of collective bargaining machinery."

[Mr. Tony Baldry]

It is the particular duty of ACAS to encourage the extension of collective bargaining which now gives rise to difficulty. ACAS is still obliged to work within the framework of this duty, which is of added significance because it incorporates an official Government view of what is involved in the improvement of industrial relations. Until this section is repealed or amended, the extension of collective bargaining is therefore effectively seen as being the Government's main way of improving industrial relations in this country.

This does not sit happily with the Government's own conviction that the best way for new jobs and new prosperity to be created is to allow enterprise to operate in a climate of opportunity, with employers and employees working together in a spirit of partnership and full co-operation. As the director of social affairs of the Confederation of British Industry commented recently:

"The CBI welcomed the establishment of ACAS but objected most strongly to its terms of reference because of their one-sided emphasis on the extension of collective bargaining."

The CBI objected to them then and has continued to do so since, he concluded.

The statutory duty of ACAS to promote the extension of collective bargaining is unique. None of the labour law legislation since 1970 contains a comparable provision. It is in marked contrast to the Government's own recent Employment Act which seeks to maintain a careful balance between the right to join a trade union and the right not to join. I therefore commend the suggestion made by the Institute of Directors that the statutory terms of reference of ACAS should be modified to remove this partisan and anachronistic statutory duty of ACAS and to take into account a number of trends which are becoming more and more established in this country.

Increasingly, British managers and directors realise that they have a direct responsibility for the management of relations with their employees. Increasingly, they recognise that they should try to communicate directly with each and every employee. At the same time, many employees now understand that their interests are best served by real increases in pay as a result of higher productivity and by the acquisition of new skills. In other words, the two sides of industry which have traditionally been pitted against each other as adversaries are increasingly recognising that the common interest is best served by co-operation.

I therefore propose that ACAS should be charged with a new statutory duty so that it is made responsible for promoting the improvement of employee relations and encouraging mutual respect between employers and employees by means of consultation and co-operation at the place of work. This would be an entirely constructive objective. It would help to give momentum to the entirely welcome voluntary growth in employee consultation schemes which has sprung up during the last five years. It would strengthen the growth in positive employee relations practices which have led, for example, to no-strike agreements, with independent arbitration as a last resort.

It would help both employers and employees to bring the standard of labour relations in their own businesses up to that of the current excellent best standard in this country and would greatly facilitate ACAS to establish itself as a genuinely impartial service available both to employers and to employees. ACAS would gain a new credibility, particularly among employers, with whom its neutrality has been in doubt, and would therefore be strengthened in its mandate to help to undertake the long overdue task of putting British employee relations on the sensible footing that has already been established in the best British companies.

4.18 pm

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): I rise to oppose the motion moved by the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry). If there were to be any proposal for altering the constitution and functions of ACAS, it would be advisable not to attempt to do it by means of a private Member's Bill. I shall deal in a moment with the merits or demerits of the hon. Member's proposals, but I should have thought that the whole country was aware of the contribution that ACAS has made to good industrial relations ever since it was established in 1975. Many tributes have been paid to it by all sides of industry, and it is not surprising that that should be so. When ACAS was established—and I was responsible for its establishment—efforts were made to ensure that it had the support of trade unions and employers and of all the different organisations in the country so that it could work successfully.

Ever since its establishment there has been a board, which makes ACAS an absolutely independent body. If it were not an independent body it would not be able to perform its functions of ensuring consultation, of ensuring arbitration and of attempting to establish collective bargaining. None of the functions of ACAS could properly be conducted if its independence were not fully recognised. The Government have understood that point right up to this moment, and I trust that they will vote against the motion when I have made these few remarks on the subject.

It would be a shocking way to deal with an institution which has made, still makes and will make a considerable contribution to good industrial relations to introduce a motion of this character to change its conduct. I hope that all those who want to encourage ACAS to do its job properly and to encourage the independent body that is in charge of ACAS will vote against this proposition.

The hon. Gentleman seeks to remove the emphasis on collective bargaining which ACAS is at present instructed to obey. That does not mean that ACAS is required to consider only collective bargaining. From the beginning we considered that before there was any resort to arbitration, or even to encouraging people to join trade unions, advisory and consultative processes should be available in particular cases. That is why it is called an advisory and consultative body. All those processes are now undertaken by ACAS at every opportunity that it has to do so.

When the parties are eager to have ACAS intervene, it tries to intervene in a dispute before it really begins, as that is the best time to stop it. ACAS is required to uphold the proper principles of collective bargaining and to try to extend them when that can be successfully done, and it would upset the whole balance if that were not so. Except in the one quotation which the hon. Gentleman used from the CBI, no one has suggested that ACAS has not been doing its job properly.

If the Government and hon. Members were to support this Bill, they would do considerable injury to the independent status of ACAS and to the work that ACAS is constantly doing. The balance would be readjusted in the most derisory way of all. I hope that the House of Commons, partly because of a recognition of the work that ACAS has done over the 10 years since it was established, partly because of understanding the part that it plays in many disputes, and partly because of the miserable and squalid way in which this proposal has been made, will throw it out. I hope that nobody will think of changing the status of ACAS except by a direct proposition that can properly be examined in advance.

Question put, pursuant to Standing Order No. 15 (Motions for leave to bring in Bills and nomination of Select Committees at commencement of public business):—

Privilege (Newspaper Report)

4.33 pm

Sir Edward Gardner (Fylde): I beg to move,

That the report in the Times newspaper of 6th March concerning the draft Report of the Chairman of the Home Affairs Committee on the Special Branches of the police be referred to the Committee of Privileges.

The motion arises from an item in the Times diary on 6 March concerning the draft report of the Chairman of the Select Committee on Home Affairs on the special branches of the police. On Wednesday 20 February copies of the draft report were issued to the 11 members of the Committee and to no one else. The draft report on this highly sensitive and difficult subject has yet to be considered by the Committee.

On Wednesday 6 March, a summary of the draft report appeared under the heading "Special clearance" in the Times diary. I submit that I need hardly satisfy the House that the article is a disclosure of the draft report, because the article itself admits that the report has been "leaked to the Diary". I submit that this disclosure is a clear and serious breach of the rules governing Select Committees.

The article appears to have been intended to embarrass and influence the Committee in its consideration of the draft report. Some might say that it was an attempt to set the cat among the pigeons. I am not suggesting for one moment that the members of the Home Affairs Committee individually or collectively are not strong enough to resist tactics of this kind, but the fact remains that what has been put at risk is something very important—the trust that ought to exist between members of a Committee of this kind.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): It happens all the time.

Sir Edward Gardner: I submit that the article flouts contemptuously the rules of the House regarding the publication of a draft report by a Select Committee.

For those reasons, the matter should be referred to the Committee of Privileges.

4.36 pm

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): In opposing the motion, I am sure that the hon. and learned Member for Fylde (Sir E. Gardner) will know that I personally wish him no ill. There was a famous occasion when we worked together in a murder trial, and to our astonishment our client got off. Some said that it was due to the forensic skills of the hon. and learned Gentleman; others that he so confused the jury that it gave up trying to find out where the truth lay. Anyway, the net result was that that murderer was set free on the streets of London, but that is by the way.

I think that hon. Members on both sides of the House will agree that government by leak is not open government. That applies whether we are dealing with the despicable conduct of Mr. Clive Ponting or the school sneak who has apparently released this document to the Times diary. That is a totally different question from saying that the House should be using its powers of privilege in this matter.

I believe that Select Committees have got themselves into a terrible mess over the issue of privilege, and that it is fair to say that double standards, duplicity and hypocrisy are being used. Although the hon. and learned Member for Fylde is not guilty of any of that, I believe that it is implicit in the very bringing of a privilege motion of this kind.

I think that a lot of the trouble began—I do not want to rake up old feuds—when the Select Committee on Members' Interests was dealing with complaints about the Oman issue last year. At that time, we had reports by Mr. Gordon Greig of the Daily Mail and Mr. Anthony Bevins of The Times which were direct reports of the meetings of the Select Committee on Members' Interests. I wrote to the Clerk to the Committee, Mr. Lankester, pointing this out, and he presented my letters to the Committee, but the Committee, in its wisdom, decided to take no further action. Hon. Members may say that that is all right, but there appears to be one standard for the Select Committee on Members' Interests and another for the Select Committee on Home Affairs.

It was also deeply disturbing, because my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), although he was not responsible for any of the leaks, was under extreme pressure not to talk about the Select Committee on Members' Interests in public. Yet two distinguished journalists were reporting on the proceedings of the Committee and no action was taken against them.

There was also the curious situation that the Chairman of the Committee, in a radio broadcast, spoke about what the Committee was doing at that time. You ruled, Mr. Speaker, that it was not a prima facie breach of privilege, and, knowing that my place in the sun would eventually come and that I would get my rock cake over tea with you, I accepted your ruling, but I am bound to say that I shall never understand it. However, that is my ignorance rather than your lack of wisdom.

It seems that the whole basis of confidentiality in relation to Committees of this type has broken down, and it will not be re-established by asking journalists on the Times diary questions about the leak that occurred on this occasion. It is clear that we shall not get anywhere with action of that type.

I am a member of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service. That Committee leaks so much that we could be a Government Department charged with the safe keeping of top secret documents. A few months ago there were leaks to the Financial Times, and a few weeks ago Mr. Anthony Bevins wrote a story about exchange control, based on a report that had not yet come out, and that story subsequently appeared in the Financial Times.

Perhaps we could solve four fifths of the problem by imprisoning Mr. Anthony Bevins. Editors of other newspapers may be asking, "If he has an elixir that enables him to get hold of all these Select Committee reports, what are all the other parliamentary journalists doing? Why can they not get hold of the information?"

We have Select Committees dealing with Members' interests, the Treasury, public accounts — we have problems with that one, but I will not go into those now —and with home affairs. In this case, no member of the Home Affairs Committee has admitted leaking the document. We are therefore chasing journalists. In other words, we are questioning the freedom of the press. We are chasing people who have rights, responsibilities and obligations to their public. Those obligations mean that they cannot keep silent when they get hold of information.

It is preposterous for Parliament to have its own people, whom it cannot trust, and to chase members of the National Union of Journalists. In that respect I declare an interest as an NUJ member. It is the duty of journalists to report—to publish and be damned—and it is absurd for us to take journalists before the Committee of Privileges and to use that great steamroller to deny the freedom of the press.

4.42 pm

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): I rise in essence to repeat an apology that I made once before. In 1975 I was responsible, when on the Government Back Benches, for raising under the old rules a matter of privilege concerning The Economist and a draft report to a Select Committee.

The result on that occasion was that the matter went before the Committee of Privileges. That Committee used the blunderbuss of seeking to ban the journalist in question. I urge the hon. and learned Member for Fylde (Sir E. Gardner) to bear that in mind before pursuing the matter further.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) was right to say that the House will find itself going after the journalist in question, and nobody else — [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Hon. Members may deny that, but it is clear that the journalist will not say who gave him or her the report. The source of the information will not be divulged. Thus, the House will be after the journalist, and nobody else.

The only sanction that can be employed—apart from putting the journalist in the Tower or calling him or her before the Bar of the House, which I suspect we shall not do — is to seek to ban the journalist or journalists concerned from the House. We would be a laughing stock if we attempted to do that. There is no justification for proceeding with the type of motion that is now before the House.

I accept that a journalist who gets a report in draft form should not be in possession of it and that a breach of trust must have occurred. But that problem will not be solved by hunting journalists. Indeed, there is no solution to the problem. It is impossible to legislate to create trust between members of Select Committees—I declare an interest in that I have never been a member of a Select Committee—and any lack of trust problem cannot be solved in that way. Thus, what is the hon. and learned Member for Fylde seeking to achieve by taking the matter to the Committee of Privileges?

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire) rose——

Mr. Rooker: I will not give way, because I am anxious not to delay the House.

If the motion is approved, the result could be to pillory a journalist—[Interruption.]—and that is the reality of the matter. It will not be an hon. Member, a clerk or a typist—perhaps the typist who typed the report—who will be pilloried.

Remembering that the only sanction available in the past has been to ban a journalist from earning his living —the case I have in mind concerning The Economist involved a Mr. Schreiber and somebody else — we should be indulging in a futile exercise which would make us the laughing stock of the nation and the free world. For that reason, I urge the House to reject the motion.

4.45 pm

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Today, unlike on certain occasions in the past, parliamentary privilege exists for one purpose only, and that is to enable Parliament to do the job for which its hon. Members have been elected. That must be the test of the application of such sanctions as parliamentary privilege possesses. Thus, the question is whether Select Committees of the House —after the recommendation of the Select Committee on Procedure in 1977-78 was adopted by the House in 1980 —are a new way of wasting time, or are among the most valuable assertions of the reality of Parliament, as opposed to the Executive.

If one takes the view that Select Committees are not as much as that but are, nevertheless, a valuable tool by which Back Benchers carry out the job for which they were elected, we must go on to ask whether, if a breach of privilege has occurred — that is a matter for the Committee of Privileges to decide—it is a breach which impairs the functioning of Parliament. That is the aspect to which I wish to refer.

What is known as the Chairman's draft may occasionally be written by the Chairman. In practice, it is written by a combination of the Clerk of the Committee and the specialist advisers, under the guidance of the chairman. That is then presented to the Committee for private discussion.

If at that stage it is released, a question is raised which is important but which would not otherwise matter in the least. Should anybody other than the Chairman be allowed to write the Chairman's draft? If it is to be released in a form in which somebody not elected has written it, then that report—at that stage it has not been adopted by the members of the Committee—will be read by the public as the Chairman's, if not the Committee's, report, when of course it is not.

Unless the House orders—anyone who has served on a Select Committee will appreciate that to do this would be impracticable—that the Chairman's draft is to be written only by the Chairman, the professional servants of the House will be put in an impossible position.

I have been a member of what is now called the Select Committee on Trade and Industry since it came into existence 14 years ago, having been a Sub-Committee of the Select Committee on Public Expenditure. I have never known any member of that Committee criticise the Clerk, who wrote the Chairman's draft, on the grounds that he or she expressed one, rather than another, opinion. The Chairman accepted responsibility for the draft.

To leak a report as if it were the report of elected Members when it is not, is to do a disservice to the readers of the document and to the Select Committee. The confidentiality of the process, leading, in private session, to the report being laid on the Table, is not marginal or peripheral but is essential to the integrity of the Select Committee process.

When the recommendations of the Procedure Committee were laid before the House in 1980, the Government made one important alteration. They proposed that the membership of Select Committees should be agreed between the usual channels—which, translated into English, meant that the Committees would be packed with toadies rather than appointed by the Committee of Selection. A free vote was allowed on that crucially important question because, however good the Standing Orders and the structure, if the Committees were packed with toadies, the whole operation would be worthless ab initio. The House decided then that the Select Committees should be manned by those appointed by the

[Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop]

Committee of Selection. Since 1980 my observation is not that the reports have been perfect, nor that the recommendations have always been ones with which I agreed, but that the Select Committees have made a most valuable contribution to open government, to better policy formation and, above all, to the accountability of civil servants who had previously not been accountable.

Holding that view, I believe that the integrity of these processes is essential to the effective operation of Select Committees. Therefore, it is necessary to refer this matter to the Privileges Committee and, if the Privileges Committee decides that there has been a breach of privilege, to treat it as a serious matter, coming back to the test with which I started. The sole purpose of privilege is not the aggrandisement of Members of Parliament or indeed of Parliament itself. The sole test must be: does this enable us, is it essential to us, is it important to us in carrying out the task for which we were elected? It is because I believe the answer is, yes, it is important, that the motion should be passed by the House.

4.52 pm

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): I shall come in a moment to the speech of the hon. Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop), but I should like to make one preliminary comment about privilege, arising from the motion moved by the hon. and learned Member for Fylde (Sir E. Gardner). There has been a considerable overhaul of the procedures of the House. Therefore, Members who wish to raise matters of privilege have first to raise the matter with Mr. Speaker. That was an excellent proposal, which was carried almost unanimously by the House when it was brought forward. One of the purposes was to cut down the number of attempts to refer matters to the Select Committee of Privileges.

The authority of the Chamber is protected by that procedure. Because Mr. Speaker rules that a matter is one which, prima facie, should go to the Committee of Privileges, that is not a reason why the House should not reject such a proposal if it wishes. The House of Commons retains the power to reject such a motion if, on grounds of common sense or whatever, it judges that it is advisable to do so. Moreover, the Committee of Privileges does not decide in the end what is a breach of privilege. In the end the matter has to come back to the House.

One of the reasons why I take a different view from the hon. and learned Member for Fylde is that this case will have to come back to the House in the end. It would be much simpler for the House to settle the matter here and now. There can be no doubt that the House now has the power, if it wishes, to settle the question by rejecting the motion. If the House thinks it wise to do so it can settle it in that way, but I understand that there are other arguments.

On the point made by the hon. Member for Tiverton about Select Committees, I am not a great enthusiast for Select Committees, but I am not in favour of sabotaging them by having their documents or discussions leaked before they have reported to the House. I do not wish to interfere in any way with the work that they do. I agree with what the hon. Gentleman said about the valuable work that has been done by many Select Committees, but it does not alter the fact that the multiplication of Select Committees increases the problems about publication of their discussions.

There has, of course, been an increase in the number of occasions when there may be a slip between the cup and the lip, or however one may describe it. Between the time when a Committee starts its sittings and its report is available for publication, under the normal authorised process the possibility of slips, leakages or whatever one may call them, or the possibility of journalists finding out what is happening and actually daring to print it in their newspapers, is greatly multiplied.

The fact that there are more Select Committees means that the danger of this kind of development is greatly increased. That is not a reason for not having Select Committees, but it is a reason for having a sensible way of proceeding. If the motion is referred to the Committee of Privileges, and if this is accepted as normal procedure, my fear is that there will be a series of such cases, because we cannot distinguish between one Select Committee and another. I do not believe that we will prevent leakages by this kind of procedure. All that we will do will be to multiply the references to the Committee of Privileges. Far from making privilege an effective force, we will weaken it. Therefore, I ask the House to think carefully before accepting the motion.

Now let us consider what will happen in this case. What applies to members of Select Committees also applies to the Clerks. I am sure that the Clerks serve the House with the utmost ability and loyalty. None of us wishes to put them in an invidious position, but it is right that members of Committees should preserve the secrecy and the agreements that they have made in the Committee. There will be breaches. If there are leakages from the Cabinet, as there are almost every week, there will be leakages from Select Committees. If there are leakages from the Cabinet on matters of major policy that may involve the state, high finance and so on, we cannot say that we expect a much higher standard of every Select Committee. There will still be pressure from the Gallery and from journalists who are doing their job to find out what is happening.

What will be the result? My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) prophesied what will happen, and I agree with him. If this is referred to the Committee of Privileges, it may decide, as some Committees of Privileges have decided in the past, that the only way that it can proceed is to call the editor of the newspaper and say to him, "You must tell us who was responsible for this leakage, because we cannot trace it otherwise." It is likely to come to that, because that has happened previously. When that happens, my prophecy is that the editor of The Times will say to the Committee, "I am very sorry, but I cannot divulge what my journalist has done."

Journalists are protected in the sense that they are under an authority or under their oath to preserve their sources, and especially in the House. If lobby correspondents were to feel free to break their obligations to Members of Parliament, absolute chaos would break out. Everyone knows that almost every day of the week, almost every hour of the day, and almost every minute of the hour conversations are taking place between Members of Parliament and lobby correspondents. If a breach of confidence were to take place, the whole relationship between the House of Commons and the press would be utterly destroyed. If we refer this matter to the Committee of Privileges, we will come up against a brick wall. The newspaper will refuse to reveal its sources, and the journalist will say the same, so we will not be able to proceed any further.

In the days of John Wilkes, the House would have sent the journalist to the Tower. However, that did not work very well and eventually that practice was stopped. The House of Commons did not do that with good grace, but eventually accepted that it did not work and that it had to be stopped. Why do we not learn from that experience and accept that referring the matter to the Committee of Privileges will not work, so we had better give up now?

If we do not oppose the motion, when we come up against that brick wall and the matter is referred back to the House, we will have this debate again, except that we will be faced with the facts which we are now trying to present to the House. It is better to deal with the matter now.

It is, of course, right that these matters should be aired, especially as we have a new system of procedure, new Select Committees and new things happening in the House. Therefore, it is proper for us to discuss the relationship between this House and the journalists in the Press Gallery. The more that we look at the matter, the more we will find that it will cause only ruptures between this House and the press if we try to enforce the authority of the House through the Committee of Privileges.

That does not mean that I am in favour of people leaking information. I am not in favour of people leaking information from Select Committees or from the Cabinet. I am not even in favour of Speakers leaking conversations that they had when they were in office. These are matters of honour, and that is the way that they should be handled in the House. If the House says that there is no honour between Members of Parliament and journalists, the House will destroy the relationship between Members of Parliament and journalists. I urge the House not to embark on that course.

5.2 pm

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): I believe that this House and the country as a whole pay exaggerated and undue respect to the reports of Select Committees. A dozen or so hon. Members, chosen more or less at random, cannot possibly, in their reports, give the distilled wisdom of 650 hon. Members. Therefore, they are often not representative of the House. In addition—and it applies to the matter that we are discussing—all the evidence on which the report is based has been published.

Those who draft the first draft of a report fulfil a useful function. It enables other members of the Committee to focus upon the issues. By participating in discussion about it and its details, we can eventually marshall the arguments, summarise the facts and serve the House on a national issue. For that reason, we should not pass over lightly a breach of trust and honour. We must not do that, for the sake of the House. There must be a sanction against that sort of thing, and surely that sanction is to refer the matter to the Committee of Privileges, which is all that the motion suggests.

The motion does not suggest that the victims of any investigation should necessarily be the press. That is not the point. The point is that an investigation is necessary, because the members of the Select Committee concerned know that only 11 hon. Members had copies of the report. Therefore, one of us is responsible for handing it over to The Times. That cannot possibly be denied. To try to gainsay that at this stage is to bring into the arena the honesty and honour of the professional staff who serve this House. It would not be right to leave the matter there.

We know that one hon. Member actually revealed a document which he was under a duty of trust and honour not to reveal. Therefore, it is a matter of common sense. We do not need any special pleading on behalf of the press from the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) or anyone else. It is truth, honesty and decency that count, which is why we should refer the matter to the Committee of Privileges.

5.5 pm

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): This matter should, without doubt, be referred to the Committee of Privileges—in regard not to a newspaper, but to an hon. Member. The motion does not refer to an hon. Member.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) said that the House could divide on the motion. In doing so, it would be dividing against your judgment, Mr. Speaker. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Perhaps you would clarify the matter, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I think that I can put the hon. Gentleman right. All that I have done is to give the matter precedence on today's Order Paper.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I made my remarks advisedly, because the difference between this application and others is that you have given it precedence. Therefore, you are expressing the view that the matter should be dealt with. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] When we read the record of the debate, others might also draw that conclusion.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should not put words into my mouth or thoughts into my head. I have given the House an opportunity to decide the matter.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I am interested in consistency. Two weeks ago The Guardian published an article containing a statement about the deliberations of a Committee of the House. The journalist inadvertently made that statement because he was not aware that he was, to some extent, breaching the privilege of the House. It is ludicrous for us to pursue a journalist or a newspaper when it is obvious that a journalist, having accepted copy in good faith, has then published it in good faith. He did not know that the copy that he was submitting for publication referred to the deliberations of a Committee.

The journalist who wrote The Times diary may or may not have known about breach of privilege. We cannot be sure. If the Committee pursues the matter in the way that has been suggested, the danger is that the question of privilege may be raised whether or not the journalist knew about the deliberations of the Committee. It might be that the deliberations were in public. A journalist must not be put in a position where he has to decide on privilege. He is not required to understand fully the proceedings and procedure of the House.

If we penalise The Times, it means that any journalist writing anything about comments or statements emanating from the House would, technically, have to check in advance and be assured that the matter was or was not privileged and therefore could or could not be published. It is wrong to place an unnecessary responsibility on a journalist. If he commented on matters raised in the House, but he was not in the Press Gallery and did not have an understanding of the procedures, he would be placed in a difficult position.

[Mr. Campbell-Savours]

In my view, the motion should go for an hon. Member as an hon. Member appears to have breached the privilege of the House. He or she made a statement to a journalist. However, the motion does not do so. Therefore, I submit that the motion should be withdrawn, or that, if it is not withdrawn during the course of the debate, we should vote against it.

5.10 pm

Sir Ian Gilmour (Chesham and Amersham): The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) says that he is interested in consistency. I believe that whenever the House gets on its high horse over a matter of privilege it consistently makes a fool of itself.

We must consider the precedents and make one obvious distinction. It is plain that whoever leaked the report was in error, dishonourable and guilty of a breach of trust. It is equally true that the journalist who printed the report was not guilty of any of those things. He was simply perfoming his duty as a journalist and was entirely within his rights. It would be totally wrong for the House to give the impression that it was critical of a person who was doing his duty. If we pass the motion, we shall be in danger of failing to make that important distinction.

This is a relatively unimportant matter which should not go before the Committee of Privileges. It seems clear that a member of the Select Committee was at fault. Should not the matter be investigated by the Select Committee itself?

5.12 pm

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Unusually in these days, I find myself in disagreement with the right hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Sir I Gilmour). There is a reference to The Times in the motion only because the appearance of the report in The Times is the sole evidence that a breach of privilege may have occurred. There is no charge against The Times. Whether, how and why a breach of privilege took place must be a matter for the Committee of Privileges to investigate, if the House decides to refer the matter to the Committee. If no report had appeared, there would be nothing for us to discuss.

The matter is not unimportant. Our Select Committees are an important and necessary, if imperfect, means of extending our scrutiny of and control over the Executive. I believe that it was desirable for the Home Affairs Select Committee to investigate the special branches of the police. I am on record as arguing that some Committee of the House—perhaps a smaller one—should investigate other security matters. The incident under discussion does not help me to put that case.

I believe that Committees must have some means of asserting the importance of confidentiality, both in relation to the nature of the subjects that they discuss and because they should have a means of carrying out their discussions in the way that some hon. Members have described. For example, the members of a Committee should be able to assent to the preparation of a report on a certain set of propositions, some of which they may subsequently vote down. That procedure makes it possible for a certain set of proposals to become a focus for discussion. It is common practice in Select Committees for members to agree that a series of propositions should be placed before them in complete form so that they can be amended or voted down. That is a means of carrying forward the discussion. If such reports are to be leaked, that sensible course of discussion cannot be pursued. That is another reason why we should protect the confidentiality of the Committees.

Some hon. Members have pleaded earnestly on behalf of journalists, who they fear may be imperilled if we accept the motion. I do not share that fear. Moreover, there has been no sense in those speeches that those hon. Members are reaching out for a better remedy for what I regard as a serious impediment to the work of Select Committees. In engaging in special pleading, some hon. Members have failed to show that they take as seriously as they should the importance of the need to maintain confidentiality.

The House has, at the moment, only one means to hand of showing its displeasure, and that is to refer the matter to the Committee of Privileges. That action will have no necessary and immediate consequence. Mr. Rupert Murdoch will not find himself in the Tower—although if that were in prospect the proposition might attract more votes. All that we would secure is that the Committee of Priviliges would consider the matter and exercise its judgment — the Committee includes many able and experienced hon. Members — to make sure that a sensible course is followed. That is not much to ask as a way of insisting that the Select Committees should enjoy confidentiality.

5.15 pm

Miss Janet Fookes (Plymouth, Drake): I agree with much of what has been said by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith). We must bear in mind that Select Committees engage in public discussion when they are taking evidence and that when the report is completed it again becomes public. It is open to members of the Committee, if they so wish, to sign a minority report or to make reservations. It therefore seems unreasonable not to allow a Committee a period of confidentiality while it is engaged in chewing over possibilities for inclusion in the report.

Mr. Gordon A. T. Bagier (Sunderland, South): The hon. Lady has the facts slightly wrong. One cannot produce a minority report in a Select Committee.

Miss Fookes: It is, however, possible to record dissent.

It is not unreasonable to allow a period of confidentiality—usually relatively brief—during which the members of the Committee may hammer out the contents of the report. That is why it is so bad that a report should have been leaked.

I am not much concerned about the fact that the press picked up the report, whether from a noble sense of duty or because it seemed to be a juicy morsel of information that might help to sell more newspapers. I am more concerned about the unpleasant feeling that members of the Committee experience when they cannot trust their colleagues. That is at the heart of the argument.

We work in Committee as members of various parties. We work together despite our political differences. If we have to look over our shoulders and wonder whether we can trust X, Y or Z, it will be far more difficult for us to carry out our work.

I regret very much what has occurred. Whoever leaked the information would do the House a service if he were prepared to do the honourable thing and own up frankly.

5.18 pm

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): I am not sure whether it is a coincidence that this debate follows our debate yesterday, but we certainly seem frequently now to find ourselves discussing security, and I have no complaint to make about that.

I am a member of the Select Committee in question. I hope that if I had leaked the information I would have enough guts to stand up on the Floor of the House and admit it. If I say that I did not do so, it is up to Conservative Members to decide whether they believe me. Those who know me know that I do not lack the courage to defend what I have done, whether in the case of a leak or anything else.

I am an innocent party, but I cannot deny that there was a leak and a breach of confidence. Setting aside the question whether the material should have been leaked, I do not think that the action made much political sense. However, it happened.

However, leaks are hardly unknown, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) has said. I understand that there were a few leaks from the Home Affairs Select Committee in the previous Parliament, although they might not have been of the earliest draft report, as in this case. As far as I am aware, no motion such as this appeared on the Order Paper then.

No useful purpose would be served by taking this matter further. It is not the House's function to give the impression that we are over-sensitive. No purpose either would be served by giving the impression that, because the report appeared originally in The Times and then, somewhat later, in The Guardian, civilisation as we know it is coming to an end. This is not such an important matter. As others have said, if there is discord in a Committee, that is a matter for members of that Committee. I do not know whether the hon. and learned Member for Fylde (Sir E. Gardner) agrees. I expected an item on the Committee agenda concerning the leak. The issue is given an importance which it does not deserve by bringing it up on the Floor of the House and, if the motion is accepted, referring it to the Committee of Privileges.

I agree that the journalist should not be blamed. It is not the journalist's job to decide whether a matter is confidential. It is an odd journalist who would say, "I cannot handle this material because it is confidential and has not yet been considered by the Committee." The journalist has carried out his duty and there is no reason to criticise him. The person to blame is the hon. Member who leaked the information. I doubt whether the offending person was the Committee Clerk, so an hon. Member must have done it.

It is foolish to believe that journalists were not aware of the differences of opinion in the Committee, on the evidence of our public sessions, about the approach to the inquiry into the special branch. If we have differences of opinion on the Floor of the House, it is foolish to imagine that they will disappear in Committee when we are considering a sensitive and controversial matter such as the special branch. Any journalist who followed our proceedings must have known that there was unlikely to be a unanimous report.

The best thing to do in the circumstances is to note what has occurred. Members of the Select Committee can decide to regret or deplore a leak. It would be quite wrong to send the matter to the Committee of Privileges. We should not find out the identity of the culprit, who would probably not wish to own up. As the journalist is not likely to be dealt with critically, because we all seem to agree that he was not at fault, it would be a waste of time to accept the motion.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Have we not flogged this horse to death? Are we to debate this trivial matter all afternoon when we have other, more important, matters to discuss?

Mr. Speaker: This is a matter for the House. Many hon. Members are rising in their places.

Mr. Cranley Onslow (Woking): I do not wish to delay the House. Unusually, I find myself in some agreement with the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick). The matter should not be referred to the Committee of Privileges because we want to make a scapegoat of The Times or to have a witch hunt against a journalist. Some journalist has had something stuffed into his pocket and, naturally enough, he has put it in his newspaper. There is nothing strange about that. Anyone who thinks differently is naive.

Equally, anyone who supposes that no hon. Member has committed an act of dishonour is being naive. I do not understand how hon. Members think that it would be possible for Select Committees to work if we tolerated members of those Committees behaving dishonourably to each other. The Committee of Privileges should address itself to that fact. If it is established that there has been an act of dishonour by an hon. Member, or by an hon. Member who cannot be identified, I hope that the Committee will present some recommendations to the House on how hon. Members might be put on their honour before they are appointed to Committees. Unless we go to that length, we shall have wasted our time.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): This is the first time that I have heard the House discuss its privileges, and I must say that I am not impressed. There is an awful air of pomposity. The House is putting through legislation endorsing policies that are smashing up the lives of most people in the country. Hon. Members are not concerned about honour or truth in those matters. That is just a personal comment.

I am a member of the Home Affairs Select Committee and I oppose the motion—but not out of any disrespect of that Committee's Chairman, although I am surprised and regret that he has moved it. I greatly like all his qualities except his political views. No disrespect is intended in what I have said.

The Select Committee's inquiry has drawn great public attention but it has been clear in several of its hearings that it is divided on party lines. It is also well known, and has been reported in the press, that Conservative members of the Committee have deliberately brought the inquiry to a premature conclusion because they want to stifle it and that Labour members of the Committee want other witnesses to be brought before the Committee.

[Ms. Clare Short]

Nothing in the leak brings the Committee into disrepute, embarrasses anyone or puts pressure on anyone. That was the claim of the hon. and learned Member for Fylde (Sir E. Gardner), and it would be a serious matter. Everyone who has followed the inquiry knows how the Committee is divided. Perhaps I might inform the hon. Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) that the line taken in the report that was leaked was discussed by the Committee. It was not a draft that had been prepared by the Clerk to the Committee without there having been political discussion. I thought that the hon. Gentleman might like to know that, as he rested much of his argument on the need to protect Clerks to the Committee because of the assumption that they had prepared a draft. That is not the case here.

It was not me who leaked the document. [Interruption.] If I had thought that it would benefit the public or improve our security services or their accountability, I should have leaked it, but I did not. The evidence for that is that, if I want to leak anything, I should not leak it to a disreputable newspaper such as The Times has now become. I used to take that newspaper. Although I did not endorse its political views, I had some regard for the objectivity of its reporting. I cancelled my order some time ago and I have no such regard for it now.

The leak is entirely accurate, as anyone who has followed the proceedings of the Committee knows. Those members of the Committee who want prematurely to end the inquiry by not calling witnesses whom Labour members of the Committee want to call are breaching trust and bringing the Committee into disrepute. The complaint that the leak has done serious harm to the Committee, its members or the House is nonsense, and the motion should be dismissed.

5.30 pm

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): I do not serve on this or any Select Committee, but having listened to the debate I am beginning to think that a bit of leaking is not a bad idea. I shall not join a Select Committee, but if any Member wishes to pass me any information, I assure him that I have several contacts. They may not work for The Times, but instead the stories could appear in Tribune or Labour Weekly. Neither of those publications has a large circulation, but it is possible that the article could be picked up by others.

This debate has revealed the fraying edges of privilege in this House. In a way I am pleased that it has taken place, because I have always hated the idea of privilege. Many hon. Members who have spoken, even some Conservative Members who want to send this motion to the Committee of Privileges, have done so in an extremely ambiguous manner. Some have been ultra-defensive and have almost admitted, "We will send it, but nothing will happen when it gets there." The hon. and learned Member for Fylde (Sir. E. Gardner), who, according to my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore), got a murderer off by bamboozling the jury, has done it again today. He has introduced a motion, but does not know who he is attacking. He thinks he is after an Opposition Member, but given that the Government have a majority on the Select Committee, it could be a Tory. The hon. and learned Gentleman could have put up the classic defence. It could be him.

I am not even sure about the hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook). He was quick to rise to his feet and say, "Not me, Mr. Speaker." We shall need the pink panther to solve this one, and any inquiry could run longer than "The Mousetrap", the Agatha Christie play which is now running in a Strand theatre.

This is all nonsense. We are told that this Committee will cost money and that staff will have to be employed, yet people are dying of hypothermia. Every day the Government complain that they do not have money for this, that or the other. The Prime Minister is always saying that the Government have no money—that it belongs to the taxpayer.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Sit down while you're ahead.

Mr. Skinner: The hon. Gentleman is not ahead. He has only just walked into the Chamber.

Passing this motion will be a waste of time. Will the 11 members of this Select Committee be grilled? Will their phones be tapped? Will the special branch be brought in? If the Leader of the House has any sense—I am told that he has a bit—he will say,"We have heard enough." He will take the advice of my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) and others, and throw this motion in the dustbin with all the other privilege which abounds in this place.

5.34 pm

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): Follow that!

The hon. and learned Member for Fylde (Sir. E. Gardner) acknowledged the possibility that this alleged leak could have been an attempt to influence the Committee, but he added that he did not believe that the Committee was likely to be damaged by it in any way. Therefore, what damage has this alleged leak done, except to our amour propre? In my view, what has allegedly taken place is in no way serious enough to warrant the motion.

I am a member of the Committee. I am also a journalist. I know that journalists are paid to discover things which other people do not want them to discover and to report their findings in their newspapers.

The hon. Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes), who is also a member of the Committee—I hope that she will not think that I am being offensive—made the mistake of assuming that if a leak has taken place, it must have been by a member of the Committee. That is the same mistake as assuming that simply because a report appeared in The Times, it must have been written by a member of the staff of The Times. That is not necessarily so, because, as the hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) said, all the Committee's evidence has been published. Even someone masquerading as a journalist on a comic called The Sun and reading through the evidence would not need A-levels or a university degree to draw certain conclusions about what kind of report might come out of that evidence. One does not need to be clever to do that. All the evidence has been published, and anyone with the time and diligence could have arrived at the conclusions which allegedly appear in the article in The Times.

Why do we hear about privilege only when matters to which hon. Members take exception appear in newspapers? Last weekend The Sunday Times told us that Sir Antony Duff was to be the new boss of the security services. Last night a junior Minister from the Home Office told the House that there was to be a new boss of the security services and that he had been appointed two months ago, but, so far as I know, no hon. Member has introduced a privilege motion on that matter.

Most of the Sunday newspapers carried stories that the Government would introduce a minimum prescription charge of £2 per item. I know, Mr. Speaker, that you will take the view that information of that kind most properly belongs to this House and should have been announced in the House first by the Secretary of State, yet no one is shouting "privilege" over that.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) said, every day of the week members of the press lobby are wheeled over to 10 Downing Street and fed goodies which fly in the face of proper respect for this House, but apparently no one cares a jot or tittle. All we have is the occasional complaint that press releases are available in the Press Gallery before a statement is made.

I have already said that I am a member of the Committee, but I have no intention of saying whether I did or did not make any alleged leak. This House is not a court or a court martial. We are not here for that purpose. My colleagues, who have said that they did not make the leak, are, I believe, wrong. That is the way in which an American gentleman called McCarthy worked. We are taking ourselves far too seriously. I urge the hon. and learned Member for Fylde to withdraw his motion.

5.38 pm

Mr. Terence Higgins (Worthing): I believe profoundly that the work of the departmental Select Committees is of the greatest importance. Moreover, I believe that the institutional reforms that we have made have been important in adjusting the balance between the Executive and Parliament. That being so, anything which undermines the work of those Committees is a very serious matter. In that respect, I agree very much with the views expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop).

Certainly it seems to me that this is a House of Commons matter and not a partisan matter in terms of the action that should be taken in matters of this kind. The right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) set out very clearly the problems that may arise if we agree to the motion, but he offered absolutely no solution to the basic problem. We must face the fact that leaks of the kind referred to by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Fylde (Sir E. Gardner) damage the work of Select Committees. That is certainly so if a final report appears in the press in advance of publication and laying before the House. The impact of the report when it is finally published is inevitably diminished.

More important, in cases of this kind damage is done if reports appear in the press of working documents or proceedings of a Committee. A working document—a Chairman's draft report, for example—has no authority whatever. It is not endorsed in any way as representing the views of members of the Committee or of the Committee as a whole. Yet the leaked report—for example, the one that we are now considering—seeks to give some credence to the views expressed in the draft report or in a report of discussions that have taken place.

Regrettably, a member of the Committee, or, indeed, the journalist concerned or the staff or others involved in the work of the Committee, may seek to promote a particular view through a leak of this kind——

Mr. Skinner: So what?

Mr. Higgins: The hon. Gentleman asks, "So what?" It is usurping the authority of the Committee to suggest that the Committee holds a particular view when that is not the case. Therefore, I believe that we should take action in this instance and on the more general issue involved.

This is not a question of excessive secrecy or of something being concealed indefinitely. It is purely and simply a question of whether the information should be made known before the report is published. As has been pointed out, there is no such thing as a minority report from a Select Committee. Nevertheless, any member of a Select Committee with a dissenting view may have that recorded in the proceedings and when the report is published it is abundantly clear what has taken place.

Another point should be considered carefully. Virtually all the leaks that have taken place have concerned proceedings, draft reports and the like. Once that is allowed to happen, some doubt must be cast on the confidentiality of the information given to the Select Committee. That is extremely dangerous, because the work of the Committees would most certainly be inhibited if the Government or outside bodies could say—perhaps on a matter of commercial sensitivity—that they will not give the information to the Committee because it might be leaked and damage them. That is a matter of considerable concern. Therefore, we must take a stand.

Mr. Winnick: As I said earlier, no one could deny that there was a breach of confidence, but what will be the result of the action proposed? Will the Committee of Privileges produce a conclusion or recommendation that will actually prevent leaks in the future?

Mr. Higgins: That is why this reference is so important. We have to know what is likely to happen in cases of this kind.

In discussing the matter with members of the parliamentary press lobby I was surprised to discover that some of them were not fully aware, or indeed aware at all, of the extent to which the House has powers with regard to privilege. This is not a matter of being over-sensitive or pompous but of whether we have a system that allows us to work effectively. That is the crucial issue. Some members of the lobby seem to be unaware of the situation, so they may print things of this kind inadvertently. If nothing else, this debate will help to clarify the position. Others may be well aware of the rules but continue to publish these things all the same.

I fully accept that if we refer this matter to the Committee of Privileges it may be very difficult for that Committee to ascertain who was responsible for the leak. I take the point made by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett), that it may not be a matter of a Member of the House acting dishonourably. The papers may somehow have fallen into the wrong hands. It may have been a member of the staff or someone else involved in the work of the Committee. That is a matter that the Committee of Privileges should investigate.

The more difficult matter that we shall have to consider, and which the Committee of Privileges will have to consider first, is the issue raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Sir I. Gilmour). Even if we cannot ascertain who was responsible for the particular leak, we must consider whether some action should be taken in relation to the press. In that context, I am bound to say that I suspect that there would be far fewer leaks from Select Committees if it were clearly understood that such leaks could not be published in the press.

Mr. Robert Kilroy-Silk (Knowsley, North): I am chairman of the all-party parliamentary group on penal affairs. In the past six years we have published half a dozen major reports, each of them as complex and potentially controversial as the reports published by any Select Committee. There are Members in the Chamber now, on both sides, who have contributed to the working parties on those reports, but there has never been a leak although there was never any question of the sanction of privilege being used against any Member of Parliament or member of the press. To me, that is clear evidence that what is needed is not the sanction of the blunderbuss of privilege but the trust that exists among Members of all parties in the House. Without that trust, it does not matter whether we have privilege or whether sanctions can be imposed.

Mr. Higgins: I entirely accept that trust among members of the Committees is of the greatest importance. That is not in dispute. In my view, however, to ensure that the work of the Committees and the business of the House is not undermined, it is extremely important to make clear the rules concerning the printing of alleged or actual reports. I believe that it is important for the Committee of Privileges to consider the matter and to make clear what the rules are in respect of the press. It would also be very helpful to consider what should be the appropriate penalties for such breaches of privilege.

As I have said, it is not a matter of being pompous or over-sensitive. I am desperately concerned that the work of the Committees, which I believe to be of such great value, should not be undermined by leaks of this kind. Therefore, I strongly support the motion.

5.58 pm

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): It is clear that there is considerable disquiet on both sides of the House about the fact that we could be in danger of creating scapegoats of journalists.

It is worth reminding the House that we are saying not that there has been a breach, but that there appears to have been a breach and that it should be investigated. We are not saying to the Committee of Privileges, "Take away those who are guilty and punish them." We are saying, "Establish the nature of the offence and make recommendations to the House." At the end of the day, it will still be for the House to decide the appropriate action.

It may seem rather simplistic, but I believe that if the House has rules it should abide by them or it should conscientiously abandon or modify them. It should not be left as a matter of individual default. If the rules are fraying at the edges, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) said—it is clear that this is a general feeling—it would be appropriate for the Committee of Privileges to consider whether the garment of our procedures is reparable. I hope that the Committee will take account of the misgivings expressed today about the danger that we could end up condemning the wrong target.

The newspaper was fulfilling its role by publishing the news as it saw and obtained it. The real culprit is probably a Member of the House. I make no apology for saying "culprit", because I believe that the Select Committees have been a valuable addition to the role of the Back Bencher. The capability of the House of Commons to interrogate the Executive has been made far stronger by the creation of the Select Committees, many of which have shown considerable independence. It is a pity that the culprit is in danger of going scot-free, skulking dishonourably, as he does, behind the hope that the journalists will conduct themselves with greater honour in not disclosing his name than he did in disclosing the contents of the report. Whoever is responsible is lacking not just in personal courage, but in consideration to his colleagues in the House——

Ms. Clare Short: Or she.

Mr. Williams: —because, in the process of indulging in the decision to ignore the rules of the House, he, or she —I do not wish to exclude my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) or any others from my comments—has cast doubts on the integrity of everyone else who had access to those documents—not just hon. Members, but the servants of the House. It must be a matter of considerable disquiet and concern to them when blame is attributed.

Therefore, I support the motion. However, I hope that, in the light of the debate, the Committee of Privileges will feel able to consider, in addition to the actual remit before it, the appropriateness and relevance of the procedures of the House as they now stand.

5.52 pm

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) felt that proper regard and protection was not being given to local authority financial matters which will be considered next. I understand at once his anxiety, but I ask for his tolerance.

The House has been considering a matter of lively concern, touching on the relationships with the departmental Select Committees and on the honour and integrity of hon. Members and their relationship with the world outside, especially Fleet street. All that is embraced within this procedure motion. As the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) has properly pointed out, it is merely a question of whether we refer the matter to the Privileges Committee for adjudication or withhold the facility that is sought by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Fylde (Sir E. Gardner).

I have always believed it to be my role in these debates to speak but briefly and to bring matters to a conclusion. I shall therefore not dwell upon the merits that have been eloquently argued, except to say that I have felt a strong emotional sympathy with the points argued by the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), for these are dangerous times. The right hon. Gentleman suggested that the House could be in grave danger of making a total fool of itself in these matters. That is a danger that permanently attends the House. We must therefore attend to the right hon. Gentleman's words with particular care.

It is perfectly true that there are dangers of arousing expectations that cannot conceivably be fulfilled. I suspect that gone for ever are the days when John Junor stood at the Bar of the House to be admonished by a suitably outraged House of Commons.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: Bring them back.

Mr. Biffen: The true reactionary opposite says, "Bring back that situation." I am a product of evolution. I know that that situation is beyond likely recall.

Because one cannot have totality of expectation, that does not mean that one can have no expectation at all. The question of privilege, as with so much else that concerns the House, is a question of graduated response, graduated ability and, above all, graduated expectation. The rules by which we operate run to much more than the mere Orders of the House, regulations or what you will; there are conventions that sustain our behaviour every bit as much as formal rules. The part played by privilege and the Privileges Committee and the judgment that the House forms with the Privileges Committee can have a real effect upon the conventions no less than upon the rules of the House. In that spirit of qualified and modified expectation, I wish my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Fylde well and commend his motion to the House.

Local Government (Prescribed Expenditure)

Mr. Speaker: We now come to the somewhat delayed debate on the local government prayer.

6.8 pm

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): I beg to move,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Local Government (Prescribed Expenditure) (Amendment) Regulations 1985 (S.I., 1985, No. 257), dated 25th February 1985, a copy of which was laid before this House on 4th March, be annulled.

In a speech in Los Angeles in 1952 the American politician Adlai Stevenson said:

"Bad administration can destroy good policy, but good administration can never save bad policy."

What the Secretary of State for the Environment consistently and unerringly demonstrates, whenever he introduces his policies to the House, is his determination to have bad policy and bad administration. These regulations are no exception. This is the third occasion on which the House has had the opportunity to consider the crucial issues involved in the Government's policies for the control and reduction of local government capital expenditure which goes to investment in the built environment of Britain.

The Government's case remains deeply unconvincing. Whatever tests are applied, the policy is not only demonstrably stupid in the prevailing social and economic climate, but deeply damaging to millions of people, our infrastructure and to the future of the British economy. The arguments of the Secretary of State have few friends outside the Cabinet, almost none in local government and the building and construction industry, and are heavily criticised by professional and academic bodies involved in local government. Yet again the right hon. Gentleman has united local authority organisations against him, including those dominated by his Conservative friends.

Local authority capital expenditure has been consistently reduced in every year of the Government's term of office. In 1982-83 it was approximately half of the total a decade ago, and in real terms about £1 billion less than when the Government came to office. Ministers now argue that local authority capital expenditure must be controlled and that councils must lend their money, not spend it on projects and investments or invest it in the infrastructure. Ministers argue that that must be done so that the public sector borrowing requirement can be reduced.

In effect the Government are forcing local councils to use their money in support of the political aims and objectives of central Government. In doing so, they are preventing councils from meeting the desperate needs of the millions who are living in overcrowded and unfit housing and who need improvement grants. If today it is true that local government capital expenditure affects the PSBR, it must also have been true in 1981, when the PSBR was far higher than it is now. At that time councils were given the freedom to use 50 per cent. of their capital receipts, and were promised by the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) that they would continue to be able to do so. They were also allowed to spend 100 per cent. of their receipts from other sources.

Shortly after that, during the run-up to the 1983 general election, in the now infamous quote, the Prime Minister said:

"We need more capital spending by local government and in the public sector generally. I agree that it is vital to maintain the nation's infrastructure, its roads, its buildings, its water supply and its drains."—[Official Report, 3 November 1982; Vol 31, c. 21.]

If that was true in 1982, it is even more true today, given the deterioration that has taken place in our environment and the even worse problems now being faced by the building and construction industry.

At the same time, the Prime Minister wrote to the leader of the Association of Metropolitan Authorities expressing her anxiety that councils were underspending their capital receipts. She urged them to spend and to invest. Two years later, with far greater unemployment and a much greater need for investment in housing, schools and our inner cities, the Government make a U-turn and take further central authoritarian control of other people's money.

It is not difficult to expose the wider failures of the Government's economic policy. At present we have crisis interest rates, appalling unemployment, social deprivation and inadequate investment, yet public expenditure is taking a bigger share of national income than it did in 1979. In pursuit of their failed and perverse economic theories the Government have damagingly reduced the quality and scope of public services, while increasing the share of national income taken by public expenditure from 39·5 per cent. in 1979 to 42·5 per cent. now. That is the exact reverse of what was promised, and a result which, perhaps more clearly than anything else, demonstrates the folly, failure and crass stupidity of their policies.

The Government now propose further to control and reduce the proportion of capital receipts that councils can spend, which at present in total appear to be between £5 billion and £6 billion. The new rules will mean that councils can spend only 20 per cent. of their receipts from house sales, 30 per cent. of receipts from land disposals and 30 per cent. of other income. So much for the promise of the right hon. Member for Henley to have "a bonfire of controls".

The effect of the latest Government-imposed control will be severe, especially in housing, which accounts for two thirds of local authority capital expenditure. It will have serious implications for education, social services, recreation, roads and transport. In addition to the control, there will be an 11 per cent. cash reduction in the housing investment programme in the coming financial year. That is at a time when people in all types of housing desperately need assistance. The advice given to the House by the Secretary of State on previous occasions not only flies in the face of any sensible macro-economic argument and ignores the massive burden of evidence from industry and commerce on these issues, but deliberately conceals the appalling consequences of these proposals for millions of people. Homelessness will increase, council house waiting lists will lengthen, the alarming deterioration in private and public housing will accelerate, and thousands more families will be condemned to live in unfit, damp, cold, miserable conditions. As the director of Age Concern told me in a letter, which other hon. Members will also undoubtedly have received:

"Councils are cancelling planned sheltered housing."

The construction of sheltered housing has been halved under the Government. Elderly people will again suffer, as will disabled people waiting for special accommodation.

The proposals bring no comfort to young people who seek a home or to those who want a grant to improve their properties. Many councils have effectively closed their lists to those seeking such assistance. Recent surveys have come up with startling quotes from Conservative-controlled councils. The Tory-controlled metropolitan borough of Sefton list under housing projects either lost or delayed:

"Improvement Grant applications received between April and July 1984, to be dealt with. No more applications will be dealt with except for disabled grants where action has been commenced by the Authority.

Audio alarm system to a central control network for 260 elderly persons, accommodation.

Environmental works to council housing estates.

No major funding for housing associations. Reduced expenditure on all housing activities."

The authority says that if the capital receipts are reduced, Sefton will in effect lose nearly 35 per cent. of its spending power in the coming financial year.

The story is the same for the Conservative-controlled West Lindsey district council in Lincolnshire. In 1983-84 total housing spending approached £4·5 million. That is to be reduced to less than £3 million for the current financial year, and further reduced because of restraints on capital receipts to just over £2 million in the coming financial year — effectively halving the council's expenditure on housing within two financial years.

The story is the same from Conservative-controlled South Oxfordshire and Bournemouth and, of course, from authorities under Labour control. Those results come from a survey carried out by the National Housing and Town Planning Council following the Secretary of State's announcement.

In education, the school building programme will be badly affected. As Her Majesty's inspectors reported in 1984, poor or unsuitable accommodation is already adversely affecting the performance of one quarter of all schools visited. The report states:

"All in all, the state of much of the school building stock is already a cause for concern and the situation is apparently worsening."

Government policies and these proposals have been deluged in criticism from the building and construction industry. The Building Employers Confederation forecasts the loss of about 150,000 jobs. The British Aggregate Construction Materials Industries describes the Government's policy see-saw as extremely damaging to planning and costly for all involved. The Federation of Civil Engineering Contractors said, of a speech in November by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, who is asleep at present:

"We consider many aspects of your speech to have been highly damaging and calculated to mislead" the industry. It recognises the prospects for the industry and for employment as being grim as a result of the Government's policies.

After six years of this Administration, Britain comes bottom of the international league for spending on infrastructure, according to the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development. The importance of policies to renovate, renew and improve our infrastructure has been widely recognised and emphasised by the National Economic Development Council, the CBI, the TUC and the British Institute of Management among others. The case for increased, better-planned and sustained public capital expenditure is overwhelming. Almost everyone except the Government believes that, and recognises the major contribution that could be made to job creation, improved social conditions and better economic performance. Our inadequate and declining infrastructure and insufficient investment in it are important reasons why private sector investment is not taking place in many cases.

The Government's policy fails on social grounds. It fails on economic and industrial policy grounds, too. In addition, the Government are hopelessly wrong in terms of good local administration and the efficient use of public money. In its sixth report the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee concludes that the rationale for existing arrangements has everything to do with the Government's desire to reduce the PSBR and too little to do with rational use of local authority assets.

That view seems to be shared by the Audit Commission, which was created by the Government to examine such matters, and which was described, at least in its infancy, by the Secretary of State,

"as providing councillors with a powerful new weapon in their fight to keep costs down."

He soon changed his tune when the Audit Commission published its massive criticisms of his policies on local authority block grant distribution. We are told that he went along, gave the commissioners a rocket and then left in a huff. The Under-Secretary of State—the hon. Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave)—then warned the Audit Commission publicly about its getting too much publicity for its work. He said:

"Auditors need to do much of their work by stealth."

Success at last. The commission seems to have taken him at his word, because by stealth I have obtained—I do not know the source—a copy of its latest draft report on capital expenditure controls in local government. It is a substantial document entitled, "The Case for Reform." The commission concludes that changes in Government policy are required as a matter of urgency. It observes that serious problems exist with present policies—that will come as no surprise to many people in the Chamber. They generate waste, says the Audit Commission, and inefficiency at local level and fail to give the control that the Government profess to be seeking in the interests of their policies. Government policies, says the Audit Commission in its draft report——

The Minister for Housing and Construction (Mr. Ian Gow): It is a draft.

Dr. Cunningham: Yes. I said at the beginning that it is a draft report. It states that Government policies have resulted in a decline in capital expenditure and its effective use, and will continue to do so unless changed.

The commission gives detailed arguments to support its conclusion——

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Patrick Jenkin): In response to an intervention from my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction, the hon. Gentleman acknowledged that this is a draft. He has prefaced every quote from the document by saying, "The Audit Commission says". Does he have any evidence that the draft report in his possession has been approved by the Audit Commission? I can tell him categorically that it has not. The hon. Gentleman would be wise to await the report that comes from the Audit Commission.

Dr. Cunningham: Of course I shall wait for the Audit Commission to publish its report. It is a mystery why it has taken the commission so long to do so, given that it has been working on it and that this is the third occasion on which such matters have been debated in the House. I regard the fact that the commission has not yet published its report with some suspicion. We have been round this course before. The Secretary of State's intervention is similar to one that he made when the previous report was discussed——

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: That was quite different.

Dr. Cunningham: The right hon. Gentleman says that it was different, but he knows that that is not true. It was at the time of the draft, and remained, a damning indictment of Government policy. It would be astonishing, given the nature of these conclusions about Government policy, if, at the 11th hour, their nature, tone and content were to change. But I accept what the right hon. Gentleman says. The House will see what the published report has to say about Government policy. My guess is that it will be little different from the conclusions set out in the draft.

From whichever angle one considers the Government's bungling and incompetence over local government, the failure of their policies is all too clear. In this matter of crucial public investment our money is being misused, mismanaged and wasted in a manner that is criminal, given the problems faced by the people of Britain. Yet, in the face of all the evidence, the Secretary of State ploughs on seeking more controls and more central powers in these regulations.

I began by quoting the American politician Adlai Stevenson. It is appropriate to conclude with another quotation from America, this time by one of the founding fathers, James Madison, who, speaking in Virginia in June 1788, said:

"I believe there are more instances of the abridgement of freedom of the people by gradual and silent encroachments of those in power than by violent and sudden usurpations."

Those words accurately reflect the Government's approach to local democracy, and the regulations are yet another example of such encroachment. They should be rejected.

6.30 pm

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Patrick Jenkin): I should like to begin by setting out the background to the regulations that we are considering on the Prayer moved by the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham). May I say at the outset that we welcome him back to the House after his illness. We are glad to see that he is in such good form.

Since 1979, three quarters of a million families have been able to buy the council houses they live in. This, together with other sales, has generated receipts over the last few years amounting to nearly £10 billion. Year by year, many of these receipts have been spent but the spending, mainly because of a hesitant start in the early years—the hon. Gentleman might have recognised that fact when he quoted what the Prime Minister said in 1982—has not kept pace with the inflow of receipts. There is now an accumulated unspent amount of receipts of around £5 billion or more.

This sum of £5 billion of accumulated receipts has two effects. First, until it is spent it helps to reduce the aggregate debt of local authorities. The total of local authority external debt in England is now about £30 billion. Without the accumulated receipts, this figure would be several billions higher. Secondly, as the receipts are spent, the amount spent adds to the total of public expenditure and local government debt rises towards £35 billion.

There is nothing in the regulations—again, I need to make this clear after the hon. Gentleman's speech—to prevent these receipts in due course from being spent by the authorities to which they belong. The only issue, at least on this side of the House—a good many more of my hon. Friends are attending this debate than are hon. Members sitting behind the hon. Member for Copeland—is the pace at which those receipts should be spent.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Jenkin: When I have developed my argument, I shall gladly give way to my hon. Friend.

It is central to the Government's case that the pace at which those receipts should be spent must be consistent with the overall judgment of the proper level of public spending that the country can afford. That in turn is determined each year by the Government. It is subject each year to the approval of the House of Commons. The total of United Kingdom public expenditure for 1985-86 at around £132 billion was approved by this House when it voted on 6 December 1984 to approve the autumn statement and again when it voted last week on the public expenditure White Paper.

Those who argue either that it does not matter how fast those receipts are spent or, alternatively, while accepting some restraint, that they should be spent faster than the Government are planning, should recognise that any additional spending above the national cash limit will add to the overall planning total of public expenditure and therefore must add to the overall total of public borrowing. I now give way to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: I am most grateful to my right hon. Friend. How can my right hon. Friend allege that that is the only issue, when I took the trouble to write, and to send a copy to the Chief Whip, telling him that there was a major issue; that last year he, with the consent of the House, imposed an open-ended commitment on local authorities to buy back defective houses in certain categories and that he is now making no provision whatsoever for meeting the obligation which he imposed? How can my right hon. Friend say that what he has told the House is the only issue when he ought to know that it is not the only issue?

Mr. Jenkin: I read my hon. Friend's letter last night and those of one or two of my other hon. Friends who have written on the same subject. My hon. Friend will find that later in my speech I shall have something to say which may be of interest to him.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Jenkin: No, I am not going to give way.

I was making the point that, as the receipts are spent, inevitably this adds to public spending and to the overall total of public borrowing. There really is no way of arguing, as some have argued, that in some way, because there are receipts from the sale of public assets, the normal mechanisms for the control of total public spending should not apply to them. That is why, from the moment that this issue came before the House last December, the Government, in the series of debates to which the hon. Member for Copeland referred, have argued that the pace at which these accumulated receipts can be spent is central to the Government's management of the economy.

The provision made in the autumn statement and in the public expenditure White Paper for gross local authority capital spending in England next year is planned at just over £4 billion. The importance of the estimated capital receipts in that total can be gauged from the fact that just over half that figure of £4 billion will come from the receipts which will flow in to local authorities from asset sales during the year, leaving just under half as the net figure that goes into the overall planning total. Although the proportions have differed in earlier years, the principle has been the same. As the receipts have been generated, so they have been treated as negative public expenditure. Correspondingly, as they are spent they add to expenditure.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins)—both in an article in The Guardian and on other occasions—and the Select Committee of which he is the distinguished Chairman, have argued that the receipts should not be treated as negative expenditure but should be regarded instead as a method of financing public expenditure. I understand that argument, but have to say that it is not and has not been the convention on which successive public expenditure White Papers have been based under the management of successive Governments. The hon. Member for Copeland will recognise that when, in 1977, our predecessors sold some of the shares in British Petroleum for over £500 million, the receipts were treated in exactly the same way as I have described. They were treated as negative public expenditure.

It is often argued that councils should be free to spend the receipts as they arise and that it does not make any difference that they arise in one year and are spent in another. I should like to answer that point, because it is an important part of the argument. When, in the 1980 Act, we moved away from the old system of controlling borrowing project by project to the new system of controlling total capital spending, it was seen right from the outset that it would be necessary to prescribe a proportion of the receipts that could be spent in any year, leaving the balance to be carried forward to future years.

The reason for this is that each year the Government take into account the amount of receipts as they arise when fixing the national total for capital allocations, and in particular in fixing the allocations to councils with the greatest housing needs. If that were not done, many of our rundown inner cities and other poorer areas simply would not have been able to have the housing investment programme allocations of the size that they have had. Those who argue that councils with large receipts should be entitled to spend the lot must explain how, under that system, the poorer councils with fewer receipts would still receive fair allocations.

It will be within the experience of many hon. Members on both sides of the House that many of these inner city areas have been unable to generate receipts on anything like the scale of other authorities because there simply is not the same attraction to tenants of owning a flat in a rundown tower block as there is of owning a semi-detached house in the suburbs or in a country town. That is a fact of life. If, therefore, councils with receipts had been free to spend all their receipts as they arose, the capital allocations made to authorities with relatively few receipts would correspondingly have had to be much lower.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): Irrespective of the right hon. Gentleman's argument—I do not believe in it—is it not a fact that my local authority had its wrist slapped for not selling council houses and that one of the things that the Secretary of State told it was that capital receipts that it generated could be used to replace stock? Now, it has stopped replacing stock. What has happened to that promise?

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. Nothing in the order stops the use of capital receipts. All that it does is to slow down, spread out and regulate the pace at which the capital receipts are spent. As the hon. Member for Copeland said, it is not only that the 20 per cent. may be spent — the balance is carried forward as well. The whole of the amount is eventually spent over time. I notice that the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay) did not try to argue with my proposition that, if councils had been free to spend the whole of their receipts, and if there had been no re-allocation of those receipts this year, those authorities, many of them deprived city authorities with housing problems, could not have had the allocations that they now have.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): If that is true—I do not believe it to be true—why has the Secretary of State cut the housing investment programme for the inner city borough of Lambeth from around £100 million in real terms in 1979 to £34 million next year?

Mr. Jenkin: It comes ill from the hon. Gentleman to complain about cuts in local authority housing capital when, under the Government of which he was a member, it was cut in five years by 45 per cent. He should recognise that.

My hon. Friends are entitled to say, with some justice, that the system set up by the 1980 Act has not worked as it should have. For the Government, it has not delivered the cash limit, and for councils, it has not delivered the benefits that were intended in getting rid of the old system of project-by-project borrowing control. That is why we are now in discussion with the local authority associations to work out a better system that will deliver both the national cash limit and a framework in which local authorities are more free to plan their capital spending with greater certainty.

Over and over again, local authorities ask for greater certainty. They often ask that they should be able to plan their capital spending over a longer period. I understand that and it is a justifiable request. I can answer that over recent years we have gone a long way to meet this demand. For instance, both last year and again this year, when announcing the allocation for the year immediately ahead —what I might call year one—we have at the same time given firm assurances that local authorities can rely on receiving allocations of a certain amount for both year two and year three. In the figures for the allocation for this coming year—1985-86—we have delivered fully on that undertaking.

Furthermore, local authorities have a 10 per cent. year-end tolerance that allows them to carry forward unused allocations. The position in Wales is a little different from that, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales, who hopes to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, later in the debate, will deal with that point.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): Why was the commitment to carry forward 80 per cent. into succeeding years not available to the Greater London council for the stock transferred from the GLC to the boroughs?

Mr. Jenkin: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman realises that that is a highly technical point. It is inappropriate to deal with it now, but if he likes, I would be happy to write to him with the explanation. For the great generality of councils, that undertaking was given for two successive years and it has been delivered.

In the debate on 27 February, my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction announced an important concession for certain low-cost home ownership schemes in England. For schemes for building under licence, building for sale and purchase for resale we had originally proposed to reduce the prescribed proportion from 100 per cent. to 30 per cent. We listened to what the local authority associations said about this, to the representations of the individual councils and to the point made by several of my hon. Friends that such a move would put at peril the future of these valuable schemes. We have decided that councils should continue to be able to use 100 per cent. of such receips in the year of sale to match their expenditure on this project. From experience, it is estimated that this should allow over 6,000 families to benefit from these schemes next year.

We are making another small change. The new Historic Buildings Commission makes grants available to councils for the preservation of buildings in their ownership. Such sums will now score as capital receipts, 100 per cent. of which may be spent by councils on preserving our national heritage.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): We appreciate all this, but is my right hon. Friend aware of the special problems faced by Southend and some other borough councils in making provision within their budget for legal obligations for the repurchase of Jnity and other houses? As it is almost impossible for such councils to make a proper estimate of the cash involved, could the Secretary of State at least say that he will consider making some additional resources available for this special problem?

Mr. Jenkin: I have a great deal of sympathy with my hon. Friend's point, which is somewhat similar to the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop). Perhaps I can answer the point in this way. In making the HIP allocations for 1985-86, we took account of the need for expenditure under the Housing Defects Act. I recognise, as my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton has pointed out, that some authorities have particular difficulties in meeting their obligations under this Act in addition to their other commitments. Therefore, I am prepared to consider sympathetically requests from authorities that cannot otherwise meet their obligations under the Housing Defects Act for additional allocations towards the cost of repurchasing or reinstatement grants. I hope that my hon. Friends will regard that as helpful.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): My right hon. Friend referred to the concessions that my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction made last week. Will he confirm that this also refers to sheltered housing, and in particular to joint venture schemes?

Mr. Jenkin: This certainly applies to sheltered housing if it falls within the category that I have described, but the normal sale of land for sheltered housing purposes, which was not a build for sale or a low-cost ownership, would be caught by the ordinary rule. If my hon. Friend has any particular case in mind, I should be happy to look at it as a matter of urgency, because I understand that he wishes to know how things stand.

We have already given an undertaking, in relation to my statement last July calling for restraint, that authorities that have complied with the request to restrain their expenditure this year will receive additional allocations of 5 per cent., and that will be honoured. That promise remains and we have allowed for it in our plans. It is too soon to say how much will be needed to meet that commitment, but there is a modest margin of flexibility within our plans to meet the points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor).

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): Can my right hon. Friend explain the economic logic of allowing certain authorities an additional 5 per cent. capital allocation—in other words, allowing them to borrow more money for capital purposes—and not allowing them to spend the money that they already have?

Mr. Jenkin: With respect, my hon. Friend draws a distinction that is not as real as he is seeking to make it out to be, because capital receipts represent in this context an authority to spend. If the council has capital receipts and is given the extra 5 per cent., it has the authority to spend and may draw it from those capital receipts. With respect, I think that 5 per cent. is welcomed by the authorities who have complied and continue to comply with the request that I made, and I can tell my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) that that will be honoured.

Local authorites which have generated capital receipts by the sale of land and council houses, or by refinancing their mortgages, or by the sale of other capital assets, retain the ownership of these receipts. They can use the cash to pay off debt and so reduce their interest charges; they can put the money on deposit and so generate interest receipts; they can use the money for internal lending to other services in the same authority; or they can lend the money to other institutions. Whichever they do, the cash stays theirs. The control is over the rate at which the receipts may be spent. That control is necessary to ensure that the aggregate of local authority capital spending year by year is in line with the national provision for capital spending made by the Government and approved by the House.

Mr. Robert Banks (Harrogate): I am sure that my right hon. Friend will recognise the important financial contribution that local authorities make to housing associations. For instance, Harrogate borough council in this financial year has contributed £400,000 by way of loans and grants. Under this measure, in the next financial year no new loans will be available. Will my right hon. Friend consider being flexible and allowing money diverted and used in this way not to be calculated within the 20 per cent.?

Mr. Jenkin: I take note of what my hon. Friend says. I should point out that much the most important financing of housing associations is by the Housing Corporation. The figure which we have allocated for the Housing Corporation for next year is virtually the same as the figure for this year—£685 million. How far local authorities decide what proportion of their resources should go to lending to housing associations must be for them in the light of the competing priorities they face.

The hon. Member for Copeland towards the end of his speech referred to the construction industry. My answer is that the volume of local authority capital work for the construction industry will be precisely in line with the provision made in the public expenditure White Paper. These regulations are intended simply to make sure that that limit is not substantially exceeded.

Of course I understand the anxieties of the construction industry but, as I told the group of eight when I met it, and as I say to the House now, it is not right to look at public sector capital investment on its own. I must ask the hon. Gentleman to look at the total of public and private investment. Total construction output rose 4 per cent. in volume in 1983 and rose again substantially in volume in 1984. Private sector industrial and commercial orders are up over 25 per cent. year on year. Private industrial orders in the last quarter of 1984 were no less than 67 per cent. up on the corresponding quarter in 1983.

If one looks still more widely at the total level of investment in the country, one sees that this country had the highest ever total of fixed investment last year—some £55 billion, a 7·5 per cent. increase in real terms on the previous year. All the forecasts point to a further advance in total capital investment next year, and it is of the highest importance for jobs that we maintain that progress.

Dr. Cunningham: I am grateful for the kind remarks of the right hon. Gentleman about my recovery.

Why does the Secretary of State think that the building and construction industry is so concerned? It is because, last year, bankruptcies and closures were at an all-time record level, and the building and construction sector was the worst affected. Whatever he says about total fixed capital investment—which includes what the Ministry of Defence is spending on hardware and so on—it is a meaningless figure in this context. The reality is that local authorities want to spend their own money on environmental investment. They do not want to be forced by the Government to be lenders, which is what the right hon. Gentleman is making them be; they want to provide new houses and new schools and to improve the infrastructure, and the private sector of the building and construction and civil engineering industries wants them to do that also.

Mr. Jenkin: I am astonished that the hon. Gentleman should regard the figure for total capital investment—investment in the future prosperity of the country—as meaningless. If he wants public investment to be higher, I have to tell him that higher public spending would have to be matched by higher taxation or higher borrowing or both. I want to see more investment and more jobs created, but unlike the hon. Gentleman I do not see the stimulus coming mainly from public spending. I want to see it coming from a sustained and balanced economic recovery.

We are working out with the local authority associations a better system of control. We want to get that into effect as swiftly as possible. That may require legislation, but we should like to move as far as possible towards whatever new system emerges in 1986-87.

In the meantime, we have to operate on the present system under the present Act to protect the national cash limit for local authority capital spending. I believe that the difference between us is one not of principle but of timing. I accept that there are many worthwhile projects to be done and many needs to be met, but we cannot afford them all at once. If we try, the result will be a further massive public overspend at a time when total investment is at an all-time high.

For these reasons, I ask the House to reject the prayer and to stand by the public expenditure plans set out in the autumn statement and agreed by the House last December.

Mr. Chris Smith: (Islington, South and Finsbury): We have heard from the Secretary of State a supposed case for the action which he is taking under the regulations which totally fails to explain or justify the economic argument which lies behind the Government's thinking and decision. The only point which the Government appear to be making is that, when they wrote the public expenditure White Paper, they plucked a figure out of the air for total public sector spending on construction and capital work, and they are now intent on sticking to that figure. It is in order to stick to that figure that they have placed the regulations before the House.

We are therefore entitled to ask the Government why the figure has such magic properties and qualities. Why is it somehow economically essential to stick to the target for capital spending enshrined in the public expenditure White Paper? The Government have totally failed to answer that question and have told us only that it is essential to do so. I hope that when the Government sum up later they will begin to address that economic question.

In considering the Government's overall economic philosophy, I understand that they are concerned about the level of the public sector borrowing requirement, yet the measure now before the House will have at most a marginal effect on the public sector borrowing requirement. The only reference by the Secretary of State to that question was that the measure would help to reduce the aggregate of local authority debts until the moneys are spent. That has a marginal effect on interest rates and expenditure on the debt. In the context of overall local authority expenditure and capital expenditure, the effect of the public sector borrowing requirement is surely marginal.

It cannot be because of their attachment to the level of the PSBR that the Government are imposing these regulations on the House tonight. Why, then, are they doing it? What economic case do they have for sticking to this target for capital expenditure? Is it not simply that the Treasury has established a figure, in pursuance of an economic idea that is sheer madness, for the level of public expenditure as a whole, including money being spent by local authorities, which is local authority money, which does not belong to, or have any impact on, the Exchequer in relation to the level of taxation, or, in other than a marginal sense, have any effect on the PSBR?

The Treasury is seeking to make that figure stick, and we are entitled to know why. If it is anything other than an abstruse and absurd economic nostrum that leads the Treasury to determine that figure, that has not been made clear either today or in the debates that we have had on this issue in recent months. It is time for Environment Ministers to stand up to the Treasury and say, "Local authorities have needs, particularly in respect of the homeless and badly housed, which we must respect. We shall not accept, simply because we are told to accept it, the economic nostrum which the Treasury is seeking to impose."

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Does my hon. Friend agree that if one puts a pound note in a bank, in a year's time it is still only a pound note? It will not have rotted. On the other hand, if one fails to carry out essential housing repairs to pre-1919 property, the rot continues and within a year the cost of repairs is more than the interest on the money that the repairs would have cost a year earlier.

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend makes an important point. At the current rate of deterioration of the housing stock it will take, it is estimated, 900 years to replace it, and the more the housing stock is allowed to deteriorate—the more faults that go unrepaired and the more dampness creeps in and so on—the more expensive it will be when finally we get round to dealing with the matter.

The Secretary of State made great play with the question of timing, saying that while local authorities could not do the work this year, they would be able to do it next year or the year after and that the money would still be there. That was the kernel of his argument, but let us consider the impact of the policy which the Government are imposing, for which, as I say, they have advanced no real economic reasoning.

My borough of Islington is a hard-hit inner city area with great housing needs. In the coming financial year, as a result of the decisions which the Government are now imposing, my council, across the spread of capital spending, will not be able to carry out about £3·5 million worth of work, and, specifically in housing, will not be able to do about £2 million worth of work which it would have done without the regulations which the Government are imposing. That comes on top of a crisis which already exists in housing in Islington. The housing investment programme allocation has been cut drastically and is now down to £29 million. That is a pitiful sum in relation to the need that exists.

If the Secretary of State is so proud of the Conservative record in housing in the last five years, why has the housing investment programme allocation for Islington been cut in real terms by 56 per cent. since the Conservatives' first full year in office, 1980-81? Although it has gone down by 56 per cent., there is not 56 per cent. less housing need in my borough. Nor has there been a 56 per cent. increase in the housing standards of those already housed by the council. That patently cannot be the case. I see the position every day as I walk through the estates and streets of my constituency.

Having exacerbated the situation to that extent, the Government, on top of that, are taking more money away from the local authority. I see one of my constituents, the hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes) wishing to intervene.

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow): The hon. Gentleman may recall that I recently made a speech in support of rate capping and that I made a vitriolic attack on his constituency of Islington, and particularly on the local council. The present policy places a further burden on the ratepayer in that, as he will be aware, councils can drive a coach and horses through the policy by introducing a system of pre-funding, by which they can have some of their capital investment in housing, but they must pay high brokerage fees. In the long run, the ratepayers have to pay those fees.

Mr. Smith: I suppose it depends on the ability of borough treasurers to indulge in creative accounting, shifting money from one year to another and generating other sources of income to enable money to be spent on worthwhile projeots.

Everything that the Conservatives have done, including the wretched process of rate capping, on which they are engaged in my constituency, has meant that local authorities, to maintain essential programmes, have had to indulge in the sort of financial manoeuvrings to which the hon. Gentleman referred. If the Government had a sensible policy towards local government finance, they would not have forced that type of posture on to local authorities.

How ironic it is that in the midst of all this need—considering the money that the Government have removed from hard-pressed inner city areas such as Islington, all for the sake of maintaining a figure plucked out of the air by the Treasury in the White Paper on public expenditure —there appeared three weeks ago in the national press reports saying that the Government were preparing to underwrite to the tune of £20 million the future of three major stately homes.

I am not arguing that it is wrong for the Government to come to the rescue of Weston Park, Kedleston Hall and Lord St. Oswald's collection of Chippendale furniture. I am not saying that it is wrong for the Government to devote £20 million of public money to those eminently worthwhile causes, and I hope that in future years the public will be grateful for what is being done.

How ironic, though, that in the midst of anguished discussions about the lack of funds for local authorities to spend on the homeless and the badly housed—on people living with damp running down the walls and water coming through the roofs on estates that are badly lit, badly maintained and are a horror to live in — the Government can find money to support stately homes and a collection of Chippendale furniture. Yet they have the cheek to tell hon. Members that they will not tell the Treasury, not that it must find the money out of its own pocket, but that it must not forbid local authorities from spending money which they already have in the bank.

When Councillor Calnan, chairman of the borough's housing committee, complained about the level of the borough's housing investment programme allocation, the Minister for Housing and Construction replied, in a letter of 4 March, that he had taken > "full account of the particular needs of the Borough both in relation to the general level of deprivation and the condition of the Council's own housing stock, when deciding on a HIP allocation of £29·319 m".

Of course, he did not take full account of the level of deprivation or the condition of the houses. All he took account of was the figure in the Treasury public expenditure White Paper. He did not come down to Islington, as he has said he will, to see the housing need and the desperate circumstances which tenants right across the constituency have to face every day of their lives. He took account only of what the Treasury wanted.

The Secretary of State talked about urgency. He said that the money was not being taken away from local authorities and that they were not being stopped completely from spending it; that they were only being prevented from spending it in the coming financial year. What he has ignored is that the money should be spent now. It will not do the same good in two or three years' time.

I should like to take the Secretary of State or the Minister for Housing to visit a family whom I saw a couple of weeks ago on the Barnesbury estate. That family, with three children are living in one bedroom. They cannot use the other bedroom in their flat because it is streaming with water. The children are in bad health. The family cannot move out of the flat because there is no suitable home with a garden to which they can move. The block of flats badly needs proper heating. It was built in the 1950s and does not have central heating. It needs insulation and double glazing. Something needs to be done about dampness in the whole block.

Those flats need to be made decent enough to live in. The people cannot enjoy a decent life because of the sort of place to which they have been consigned. I should like to take the Secretary of State and the Minister to see the circumstances in which that family are living. I should like the Secretary of State to tell them that the work cannot be done this year because the council will not be allowed to spend the money this year, but that it will be done in three, four or five years' time. That is precisely the impact of what the Secretary of State told the House today.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): The hon. Gentleman knows that I am sympathetic to the things that he is saying, but, in those circumstances, would it not be wise for the council to drop its considerable support for such esoteric activities as a women's committee, a peace committee and all the other ideas that it has and spend the money on improving bad housing?

Mr. Smith: I fear that the hon. Lady has perhaps been imbibing too many myths from her right hon. Friends on the Front Bench, which they seem to propagate with remarkable alacrity about my borough. We indeed have a women's committee, which does valuable work. So far as I am aware, and I am rather closer to the ground than is the hon. Lady, we do not have a peace committee. In some ways, I wish we did. It is an absurdity to suggest that because the women's committee gives very small grants to some worthwhile organisations, many of them in the ethnic minority community, it is somehow depriving families on the Barnesbury estate of the right to have repairs carried out that are desperately needed. To suggest that is nonsense, and the hon. Lady knows it.

I should like to take the Secretary of State by the hand to Bentham Court estate, which is part of the estate action programme, and show him the work which is being done to put in lifts and improve the quality of the environment dramatically. The work includes the installation of entry phones, knocking down walls to make rooms bigger and the installation of central heating to make good flats out of very old estate property. Much good work has been done already in other estates, and work has just been started at Bentham Court. The Minister should see that work and then then decide whether it should be stopped in mid-stream. Only one part of the estate has been renovated. The rest will have to wait a few more years until the amount of capital receipts catches up or the Treasury allows the Department of the Environment to give a greater allocation to local authorities. I should like the Secretary of State to tell the tenants on that estate why they must wait for work which needs to be carried out urgently.

I should also like the right hon. Gentleman to see the asbestos on the Bemerton estate. That asbestos cannot be taken out because the local authority will not have enough money to do the work. The Secretary of State should tell us whether he took that problem into account when he was making the housing investment programme allocation.

Then there are the former GLC estates. The GLC has hitherto made money available for the work which needs to be carried out on those transferred estates. The Secretary of State should meet some of the thousands of people who report every year to the local authority as homeless and in need of accommodation. The local authority has been striving valiantly to avoid the use of appalling bed-and-breakfast accommodation as the only alternative to providing a roof over people's heads, simply because there is not enough housing stock available to let.

The scale of the need in my constituency is appalling. All that the Government can offer is a further cut instead of hope and some crumbs of comfort that they might be able to make more money available for next year. They give no sign that they will recognise the size of the problem or the difficulties which far too many tenants have to face. People have to wait for years for their first chance of renting a decent local authority home at a price they can afford. The way in which the Government are treating people like that is nothing short of shoddy and appalling. All that they are offering is a further cut, in the name of a Treasury figure plucked out of the air for the public expenditure White Paper, with no economic justification behind it. All that they are offering is a nonsensical, unexplained and unjustified economic theory which will make the housing need in my constituency more desperate and more acute.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): It gives me no pleasure to take part in the debate. As one who has been involved in the construction industry directly since 1967 and as a director of a private housebuilding firm since 1975, I have consistently supported Conservative environment and construction Ministers in their policy regarding sales of council houses and reforms in planning procedures and in the structure of local government. But we seem to have got into a serious muddle over the use of capital receipts. It is perhaps worth recalling briefly how the muddle has arisen.

It took local authorities some time to adapt to the new rules for capital receipts. When the money for council house sales began to flood in during 1981 and 1982, councils tended to put it in the piggy bank as savings rather than use it for capital spending. They built up large reserves of unspent receipts for the years 1980-81 and 1981-82. Indeed, in 1982 both the previous Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Prime Minister were urging local authorities to spend up to the maximum of their permitted capital resources.

Only in the last couple of years have the local authorities begun to do so, and it was not until July of last year that a formal block was placed upon their using the unspent, accumulated backlog of capital receipts. After two years of underspending, they began to catch up by the end of 1982-83, and, by 1983-84, they began to use so much of the underspent money that they were accused by the Treasury of overspending by £368 million. In the new financial year, the overspending problem was considered so grave that my right hon. Friend announced his "voluntary" standstill last July; he narrowly avoided a full-scale moratorium last September; and now we have these latest measures.

How can such highly restrictive annual bookkeeping make any sense? The money has been raised through the sale of assets. Capital receipts are already carrying the housing capital programme. Indeed, 57 per cent. of planned housing expenditure will be financed in that way, according to the autumn statement. The 60 per cent. of the housing receipts that the Government claw back under the existing HIP system has enabled the Government to allow an erosion of the value of central Government net spending to less than one half of its 1979-80 level in cash terms, and 60 per cent. in real terms. There has been a significant central Government cash reduction.

The prescribed proportion arrangements also appear very confusing. Ministers originally introduced the claw-back of 50 per cent. of receipts under pressure from those who argued that a local authority that sold a lot of houses did not necessarily need to spend all its receipts, so some could be redistributed to others in greater need. The earlier reduction from 50 per cent to 40 per cent. was made for exactly the opposite reason—that those selling houses were not reinvesting the money in capital work, and, if they were allowed to keep only 40 per cent., that would give more money to those prepared to spend it to the full. Now we are to have a 20 per cent. permitted retention level to prevent overspending by local authorities. How can any local authority make sensible long-term plans on that basis? It is not fair of Ministers to put councils in that position. The Government are like a driver with poor clutch control who makes the car lurch forward uncontrollably, stall, and then lurch forward again. The engine will seize up that way.

My more immediate concern is for the state of the construction industry. The House should not be misled by the overall figures for new orders received by contractors in 1984, which show a 4 per cent. increase over 1983. That figure conceals a 38 per cent. increase — which I entirely welcome—in industrial new orders and a 19 per cent. rise in commercial orders, but falls of 14 per cent. in public housing, 8 per cent. in private housing and 5 per cent. in public works. Housing appears to have slipped back a little further this year. The National House Building Council registration statistics, which foreshadow the Department of the Environment's private housing starts by about a month, show a 6 per cent. decline in January 1985 compared with January 1984. Various figures have been bandied around by the industry and the professional institutions about the likely financial effect of the proposed new arrangements on public construction spending. As the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) said earlier, the Building Employers Confederation predicts a fall of £1·3 billion and the Institute of Housing £1.2 billion.

Whatever the ultimate outturn, it is clearly bad news for construction, which has previously been grateful to Ministers for fighting off a moratorium last September. If, as Ministers have promised — and as my right hon. Friend said again today—local authorities really are able to phase their work over the next year or so, things might not be too bad in the end. However, I am afraid that it may not be as simple as that. What worries me is that the annual Treasury accounting procedure will simply throw up another potential overspend next June, and then we shall have a full-scale moratorium. Let Ministers be in no doubt that a moratorium will kill off many medium-sized contracting companies which are effectively buying work now by tendering at suicidal prices simply to keep their businesses going.

Large civil engineering contractors are undertaking road contracts far lower in value than they have ever looked at before, thus squeezing out the medium-sized firms that rely on that work to survive. Local medium-sized building firms have also been hard pressed by the reduction in public sector house building and in new school building contracts, as numbers on the rolls have fallen sharply, and by competition from cowboys and moonlighters in the domestic improvement market since the imposition of 15 per cent. VAT. Those local firms are the backbone of the industry. Their principals have tended to be the backbone of Conservative support in the constituencies. In my work I meet many builders, not just leaders of the industry. They are deeply dismayed by the latest turn of the screw. My right hon. Friend should be under no illusion about the depth of their dissatisfaction.

One does not have to be an unreconstructed neo-Keynesian wet to favour more capital projects. We need them for their own sake, not just to reduce unemployment — although God knows, unemployment is the worst social scourge facing this country and one that the forthcoming Budget must tackle energetically and with effective compassion. No Conservative Member is advocating a mad inflationary splurge. All that some of us say is that our basic infrastructure as a nation needs steady renewal now. Hundreds of thousands of houses, including many defective council houses, need major overhaul or total reconstruction, although some of them are only a few years old. Those problems cannot be left simply to the private sector, especially as it has proved virtually impossible to prepare any schemes for private sector funding of public sector projects to which the Treasury is prepared to give its agreement.

Many of those sitting behind my right hon. Friend want to be able to support him in his difficult task of reconciling his sponsorship of the contruction industry and his overwhelming moral duty to help the badly housed with his equal duty as a Cabinet Minister to control public spending. No Conservative Member expects local authorities or the construction industry to avoid tight restraint on their spending in a difficult financial position. But we insist that administrative procedures should be clear and comprehensible and that obvious muddles are avoided.

The present policy on capital receipts bears all the marks of making up the rules as the game proceeds. It is clearly inadequate, Ministers know that it is inadequate, and I am glad that it is to be reviewed. However, the work load problem is immediate. It is no way to treat the badly housed, the local authorities or the construction industry. Therefore, I regret that I shall not be able to support my right hon. Friend tonight.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): I have the dubious distinction of representing the constituency with the highest male unemployment rate in Wales, and also the constituency with the worst housing in Wales, if not in the whole of Great Britain. I was pleased to hear the Secretary of State say that he would take account of some authorities with particular difficulties and that he would make additional facilities available to them. I hope that the Secretary of State for Wales was listening because, so far, there has not been much evidence that he shares his right hon. Friend's view.

Nearly half the houses in my constituency are unfit for people to live in. Startling new figures that have just been published show that privately owned housing in the Cynon valley is probably the worst in Wales, if not in the whole of the United Kingdom. In some areas one in three houses lack basic facilities such as sinks, wash basins, inside toilets and baths. Nearly 9,000 privately owned houses are regarded as unfit for human habitation out of the total of 20,000 in the Cynon valley. A total of 4,000 houses lack those facilities and they also lack hot water supplies.

This is a major new survey, one of the most extensive to be carried out in the United Kingdom, of all the private houses in the Cynon valley over two years. It concluded that 8,923 houses were classified as unfit. That represents a staggering 48 per cent. of the private housing stock.

The report produced by the Cynon valley housing specialist has brought calls for urgent aid for the area—calls that we have communicated to the Secretary of State for Wales and his Ministers. The report says:

> "Housing conditions in the Cynon valley are not typical of those for Wales or for mid-Glamorgan, and whichever indicator is used the housing stock in the valley is significantly worse than any other county and probably any other district council in Wales or in the United Kingdom."

During the survey, council officials visited 18,500 of the valley's private houses—92·5 per cent. It was probably the most exhaustive survey of its kind to be carried out in the United Kingdom, and the Welsh Office has given the council considerable credit for carrying it out. It was found that 3,595 houses in the valley did not have an inside toilet —one house in five. The problem is even worse in the areas of especially high unemployment, where it is likely that at least one of the pits will shut down. That is one reason why only one out of 6,000 miners in the constituency worked during the miners' strike.

In the villages of Penrhiwceibr and Mountain Ash East, one house in three lacks basic amenities. A surprising 3,631 houses — one in five — lack a wash basin. The report also shows that 3,700 houses in the borough have no hot water supply, and that 3,000 have no bath. The report concludes:

> "With the current level of investment it would take over 50 years to repair the private sector stock".

The main conclusions are that 8,923 houses in the valley are unfit for habitation, that nearly 5,000 more are fit for habitation but classed as being out of repair, that 4,496 houses lack basic amenities and that 50 per cent. of houses will cost more than £4,500 to repair, compared with a figure of 14 per cent. for the whole of Wales.

[Mrs. Ann Clwyd]

Before the Secretary of State for Wales tells me that he would expect people in those areas to contribute towards the cost of improving their houses, I remind him that in this area the average income is among the lowest in Wales.

We took a deputation to see one of the Welsh Office Ministers. After he had listened to our case, he said that he understood the need for renovation grants as a primary instrument for tackling the problem. He suggested one or two ideas for dealing with our massive problem of deprivation, but his suggestions were merely cosmetic, and only scratched the surface of the problem. For example, the Minister suggests that we should take up the enveloping schemes. In the case of the Cynon valley, that would be merely a cosmetic approach to a serious problem.

The council has dealt with many of the comments that the Minister made when we visited him. The Minister suggested that there was a lack of council initiative in housing. He wanted to know why the council had failed to take advantage of Government money on offer between 1982 and 1984, espcially in the form of repair grants. The answer is that, in 1982, when the Government announced a more ready availability of repair grant money, the council was ill-equipped to cope with the large number of applications made, because — perhaps foolishly — the council has been too ready to obey early Government instructions to limit the numbers of staff:

"We just did not have the numbers available to deal with the increased numbers of applications . . . We did gear ourselves to this new position only to find the almost overnight withdrawal of the facility so that the full benefits of our changes of policy could not be achieved."

The borough council should not be blamed for a stop-go policy. Perhaps the borough council should have been bloody-minded instead of acquiescent.

The enveloping schemes are being discussed at borough council level at the moment, but the council feels that that is a cosmetic approach rather than a basic solution to a housing problem of such major proportions.

The Welsh Office asked us why no housing action areas have been declared on the borough. The adoption of housing action areas would be merely playing with the problem. The whole of the Cynon valley should be a housing action area — not just a couple of hundred houses.

We were asked why the council had not taken advantage of improvement for sale arrangements. That concept, too, is not really relevant to an area with such massive problems. The Cynon valley is a depressed area, with the highest male unemployment rate in Wales and very low incomes per head.

The Welsh Office also asked why the council have paid no regard to Welsh Office initiatives in housing. Those initiatives seem sound in theory, but they do not work in practice. They represent an attempt to apply comparatively minor answers to a major problem.

The housing conditions survey sets out concrete and comprehensive evidence of a serious and potentially disastrous situation which can only be dealt with by a major infusion of Government finance in the shape of a long-term and consistent policy that is not liable to be altered at the whim of one Government Department. The problem is so massive that it is believed that repairs, even at present levels, would take more than 50 years to remedy the problem. The total cost would probably be not less than £110 million, with more than 50 per cent. of the properties costing more than £4,500 each to repair.

This survey is probably the first of its kind in the United Kingdom. It follows recognised Government criteria. If the problem is not recognised, properties that are now reasonable could, in about 10 years, fall into the unfit category, while properties that are currently unfit may be ready for demolition. In the Cynon valley, and indeed most of south Wales, 57·1 per cent. of private dwellings were built before 1919. Surely it will be cheaper to renew them now than to build new properties in the future.

Finally, I remind the Secretary of State for Wales of what the only major survey carried out on poverty in Wales said about housing in the Principality:

"There is a major problem of renewing unfit and unsatisfactory housing which demands an acceleration in clearance, rehabilitation and new building. There is the problem also of the special needs of vulnerable groups."

There are higher percentages of disabled people living in the valleys of south Wales than in many other regions. Their needs are simply not being met. Almost every week, I meet at my surgery disabled people who are finding it impossible to continue to live in their houses. Many of them are prisoners in their own houses. They cannot get out because of the steepness of the terrain. The special needs of disabled people in the valleys of south Wales should surely be recognised.

The poverty report concluded:

"What is abundantly clear, however, is that the overall quality of the housing stock in Wales is inferior to that in almost all other parts of Britain and that the Government has no commitment to rectifying this important source of deprivation."

7.40 pm

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): Bearing in mind the size of the economic factors involved, it is not surprising that we are debating the regulations as local authority spending accounts for about one quarter of total public spending. Any attempt to control public spending would therefore be meaningless without control of local authority spending, whether on capital or current account.

It is estimated that there will be an overspend of about £1 billion in 1984-85 in England alone. The unspent capital receipts, which local authorities would be free to spend at any time if the regulations were not approved, amount to about £5 billion. That is one side of the problem.

Conservative Members have noted the need for some form of control, but it is as if the views of Conservative and Labour Members were positively charged nuclear particles, which occasionally come together but immediately rush away from each other. The hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) and his colleagues have enunciated a concept—which we have heard before but which is no less ridiculous however many times it is proposed—that the money belongs to local authorities.

I have spent most of my political life, with a little success, convincing people that Governments do not have any money of their own.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): They have plenty of mine.

Mr. Stern: They have only taxpayers' money. The money is held in trust. I do not know where the concept of local authorities' own money came from. The money came from ratepayers. I accept that surpluses have been made, but they result from the investment of ratepayers' money. Moreover, we are not talking about money being lost to local authorities, as it is to remain under their control. The Government are merely trying to determine the rate at which that money is spent. That has national economic consequences. It is regrettable that Opposition Members and many local authorities think that capital receipts belong to local authorities as of right. We should consider that ratepayers might like to benefit a little from capital receipts.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Can the hon. Gentleman give just one example of a local authority, representing and elected by ratepayers, which favours the regulations?

Mr. Stern: The answer to the hon. Gentleman's question is that the myth that I have just been attempting to displace has unfortunately taken hold in many local authorities. That is true of the local authorities that I have studied, all of which are Socialist-controlled. I have not studied others.

Mr. Simon Hughes: There is not one.

Mr. Stern: The authorities that I have studied hold firmly to the myth that the money is theirs.

All hon. Members have received representations on this matter. The Building Employers Confederation has asked me to vote against the regulations. It is regrettable that many of its press releases do not meet the perceptive standards of its members. It has told me that capital receipts

"should properly have been used to increase investment."

How has the confederation's desire been raised to the status of moral obligation? I agree that if capital receipts were used to increase investment, that would be convenient for members of the Building Employers Confederation, but it would be inconvenient for ratepayers and for builders who are active in the private sector.

Mr. Bermingham: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that local authorities have a statutory duty to house the homeless and to keep their housing stock in good repair? If local authorities are not allowed to use this money, they will not be able to meet the standards that we expect in a civilised society. Surely they have a duty to all ratepayers and their tenants.

Mr. Stern: I shall demonstrate later that local authorities can meet their statutory duty in housing within the proposed controls. I do not agree that local authorities can choose which groups they have duties towards, merely to fit the Opposition's argument. They have duties to many people. I accept that they have a duty to provide a reasonable housing service, although it has been overblown in the past. However, that duty must be matched by their duty to ratepayers.

The Building Employers Confederation says that the regulations will contribute to a significant fall in the industry's work load. Has it never heard of private sector capital spending? Is it unaware that the more money that is spent in the public sector, the less is available for the private sector?

Mr. Bill Michie (Sheffield, Heeley): Ring it up.

Mr. Stern: I have.

Does the confederation assume that its sole employers are local authorities? I note with amusement that the confederation's circular is addressed to selected Members of Parliament. It cannot even get its selection system right.

The same hysterical language is used by the housing authority part of which I have the honour to represent. The chairman of the housing authority says that the regulations will permit only half of the programme that is needed. The local council—which, of course, is Labour-controlled—has asked all Bristol Members of Parliament to represent the interests of council tenants, home improvement grant applicants and the local building industry. I accept that these are valid and important interests, but again one is omitted. My local authority does not ask me to represent the interests of the ratepayers, the majority of whom elected that authority.

Mrs. Currie: As a serving Conservative councillor, I should point out that the three groups that my hon. Friend has just mentioned are all ratepayers, particularly the industrialists. All the groups he has mentioned, including private owner-occupiers, have benefited specifically from improvement grants on which this money has hitherto been spent.

Mr. Stern: I accept that the majority of the first two groups, and perhaps a significant number in the third group, are ratepayers. However, Bristol city council is not asking me to represent their interests in totality. It is asking me to represent one of their interests, and I was trying to point out that I am also obliged to look at the other interests.

Bristol city council's needs, as expressed in its application under the housing improvement programme, include £2·7 million for new build. The city had the option of increasing joint venture schemes at little or no cost, but it has decided to go for the more expensive option. Here, again, the ratepayers do not seem to have been considered.

It is worth noting that in Bristol home improvement grant moneys receivable in the years 1982 to 1986 are estimated to be £23·6 million. In the period 1975 to 1979, under a Labour Government, the equivalent receipts were £2·2 million. The city has a large build-up of unspent capital receipts, and I am delighted to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the Labour party in Bristol which contributed greatly to those capital receipts. Whereas 5,932 council houses have been sold since the 1980 Act came into force, an almost equal number were sold in the years prior to 1980, when there was no statutory obligation to sell. For the major part of that period, the council was Labour-controlled. Therefore, I am delighted to pay tribute to that Labour party exercise of putting the interests of ratepapers and housing ahead of party dogma.

I do not wish to embarrass the Labour party too much, because its record does not compare well with the period when the Conservative party was in control. There were certain bureaucratic delays in selling council houses, but council houses were consistently sold when Labour was in control. Similarly, it is worth noting—again, I offer some praise—that partly as a result of the groundwork laid by the Conservative administration of 1983-84, the Labour party in Bristol, which is now in control, will next week propose a rate well within the Government's guidelines. It should be praised by its opponents for doing so.

The successful policy of selling council houses has led to problems in Bristol, because 1,400 prefabricated reinforced concrete houses have been sold—nearly 10 per cent. of the overall sales of PRC houses throughout the country. That is far more than was expected. I was therefore delighted to hear my right hon. Friend's assurance about the possible additional allocation of funds in this area. I assure him that I shall encourage the leader of the council and the chairman of the housing committee to submit an application tomorrow. But I hope that I shall receive a slightly more favourable reaction than I did in December when the housing chairman wrote to me complaining about the niggardliness of the HIP allocation. When I offered to arrange a meeting with Ministers to discuss the matter further, it was turned down on the ground that they would not listen.

Let us consider whether Bristol has done so badly under the present proposals. Its share of the 1985-86 generalised needs index increase for the south-west region is up by 4 per cent.; its share of the total funds available to the region are up by 9 per cent.; and its cash allocation, in the context of controlled public spending, has fallen by 3·1 per cent., against 11·9 per cent. for the region as a whole. Is that so bad at a time when public expenditure must be controlled?

It is probable that, had Bristol received the full housing improvement allocation for which it asked, it could not possibly have spent it. Nevertheless, the estimate is that in 1985-86, housing starts will be up by about 60 per cent., housing improvements by about 50 per cent., housing repairs by about 50 per cent. and grant applications by about 30 per cent. It is difficult to relate housing expenditure of that order to the stories that we have heard from Opposition Members about the effects of the regulations.

As a result of the measures that we are discussing, in 1985-86 Bristol and other local authorities will be able to spend 70 per cent. of their capital receipts. They will be able to spend 20 per cent. of previous receipts, together with 100 per cent. of net receipts from certain low-cost ownership schemes. Given the need for some Government control over capital spend, I do not consider that the limits that the Government have imposed are in any way unreasonable. They will not stop any realistic plans by Bristol. I shall be interested to hear whether a similar case can be put forward on behalf of any other local authority, because I assure Opposition Members that Bristol is by no means unique. Under the present proposals it will be able to make sensible and rational allocations for housing spend in the coming year.

I assure my right hon. Friend that I support the regulations and I am sure that the House will, too.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): The hon. Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) has convinced me of one thing. I had thought that in the coming county council elections it was fairly certain that Avon would be lost by the Labour party, but no one in Bristol with any housing need and who was perhaps among the 33 per cent. of the electorate who supported the hon. Gentleman can look to him to provide sensitive support for the predicament of local people, and I shall be happy to distribute his remarks widely throughout Bristol. Not only did he fail to respond to any of the housing needs of the people of Bristol, but he failed to produce evidence—because there is none—of any authority, its officers or members, which supported the Government's proposals.

The hon. Gentleman may know that prior to this debate there was a lobby by the Conservative-controlled Association of County Councils, the Labour-controlled Association of Metropolitan Authorities and the Conservative-controlled Association of District Councils, which unanimously condemned this blatant social and economic folly of a policy.

Mr. Stern: From his detailed knowledge of the conditions in Bristol, which of the figures that I gave does the hon. Gentleman wish to challenge?

Mr. Hughes: If the hon. Gentleman will linger a while, I hope that he will hear sufficient argument to persuade him that what he has said is a load of rubbish.

The trailers are for a Budget for jobs next week, but we shall believe that when we see it. These regulations are certainly against jobs. An estimated 65,000 jobs will be prevented if the regulations go through, without putting back to work any of the remaining 400,000 people in the building industry whom taxpayers are paying £600 million in dole money to keep out of work.

Unlike the rate-capping proposals, which may find favour with some of the Government's supporters, I do not believe that the regulations will make economic sense or be acceptable even to them. Four groups of people are affected. Home owners and private landlords seeking improvement and repair grants will be disappointed. council tenants seeking the repairs so desperately needed will find that that work cannot be carried out. People on waiting lists for new council homes will also be disappointed, because in many areas no new council accommodation will be built. Finally, those who rely on housing associations to build or renovate accommodation will be told that the Government will not help.

As the Secretary of State knows, this debate in some ways is the crunch—the last of the horrors of the current Department of the Environment year. The Government dallied for a long time before finding a day to slip this in, hoping that not too many Conservative Back Benchers would notice or vote against it. They even made a small concession, altering the original proposals by adding a few crumbs from the table. Nevertheless, few people will be fooled.

The Government's proposals are unprincipled, illogical, inconsistent and inept. The statistics are telling. The Secretary of State, as usual, was selective in his use of statistics. The total number of housing starts, public and private, has fallen from about 322,000 10 years ago to under 191,000 this year. Local authority capital expenditure in 1984-85 is 40 per cent. lower than in 1979-80, and next year it will be 60 per cent. lower than it was when the Government first came to office. Public expenditure on housing will be a quarter of the total when the Government came to power, and 11 per cent. down on last year.

At least £325 million would have been available if the Secretary of State had left the prescribed expenditure limits at 40 per cent. for next year as they were this year. That is because, at the Government's instigation, £1·5 billion has been accumulated in unspent capital receipts since 1981. The English house condition survey four years ago showed one quarter of the housing stock to be substantially unfit. Last year 200,000 people could have obtained improvement grants, but that figure will probably be halved in 1985. I do not advocate municipal housing as the only solution—private and public housing and the voluntary sector should rightly operate in partnership—but municipal housing starts this year will probably reach their lowest since 1919 — scarcely a record for the Government to be proud of.

The effects will be felt by all categories of the population. The old are perhaps the most vulnerable. Age concern estimates that 300,000 old people are now waiting to move into decent property. By the time the Government allow the money to be spent many of them will be dead. Those people will not go to their graves thanking the Government, and even then their families will receive a pretty rotten death grant to help with the funeral expenses. The capital allocation for housing in London will have been reduced from £1,400 million when the Government came to power, to about £500 million, although the problems of the capital are as bad as, if not worse than, those elsewhere.

I will tell the hon. Member for Bristol, North-West, with his accountancy background, why the Government's proposals are illogical, inconsistent and inept. They are illogical because Government policy is based on finance-led rather than need-led economics. I could not disagree more with that principle. Finance-led as it is, there is patently a profit on capital receipts. Local authorities have been selling assets at a profit. The Government's whole economic philosophy dictates that the authorities should be able to spend that profit to regenerate the economy by reinvesting and creating more homes and jobs. The Treasury Select Committee, which is far more expert in these matters, clearly agrees with that.

The present Government are the Government of the housekeeper's budget. Rather than frittering money away from day to day, the housekeeper is advised to save up and invest capital in important things. That is just what the local authorities have done, but having done as the Government wished and saved up their money, they are now not allowed to spend it. All they can do is look through the glass inner door at all the lovely money in the town hall safe. They will not be able to do anything with it. What use are savings in the bank when the owners—they are indeed the owners because it is their money, as the Secretary of State tells us almost weekly—cannot take the money out?

The folly and illogicality of the Government's proposals extend even further, because capital receipts do not increase the public sector borrowing requirement. Maidstone district council and other local authorities are not demanding to use the money to service their debts. They want to spend the money, so it does not enter the simple PSBR equation. Lastly, local authorities will not be able to accumulate so many capital reciepts in the future, because those receipts come primarily from the right-to-buy provisions and the most desirable properties have already been sold.

I have shown that the Government's policy is illogical, but why is it inconsistent? The inconsistency is most clearly understood if one reads the oft-quoted letter of 2 November 1982 from the Prime Minister to Sir Jack Smart. The hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) has already referred to that letter in part. I wish to quote just one sentence. The Prime Minister wrote to the leader of the Association of Metropolitan Authorities:

"I feel sure you will agree that much investment is needed to plan for future economic recovery, and that the present time, when the construction industry has spare capacity is the moment to be making provision for those future needs."

The housing industry has even more spare capacity now and the housing stock is much worse. The important difference is that when that letter was written we were approaching a general election, whereas now we are not. I only wish that we were. The Government might then pay attention to the voices behind them and change their policies, which their own supporters increasingly clearly regard as crazy, both politically for the Conservative party and socially for the entire country.

It is also inconsistent because the Prime Minister says through her Secretaries of State, "We want to reward the prudent councils." Rate capping is about making sure that imprudent councils are punished and that prudent ones are rewarded. It is the prudent council which save the money which are being told that they cannot spend that money.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: The unwise virgins.

Mr. Hughes: I shall not try to rival the hon. Gentleman's expertise in that matter. No doubt that could be a subject for an Adjournment debate. We are trespassing near to going off the subject. I shall resist the temptation.

Not one of these local authorities has done anything illegal or wrong. Therefore, according to normal Government philosophy, they should not be penalised. The carrot and stick arguments just do not apply.

If the money cannot be used to put the housing stock into decent repair, how do the Government imagine that they will increase the numbers of people who will buy under the right-to-buy legislation? If people live in a place that is in a pretty grotty state, they are less likely to want to acquire responsibility for it.

The Government introduced the Housing Defects Bill, which was passed by Parliament. Although a concession has been made which, in effect, amounted to, "We shall look favourably at those authorities which have to compensate people who bought defective Airey homes and the like," there is no guarantee that that additional money will be forthcoming.

What about the ineptness of the proposals? We need only refer to the draft report—I underline that it is a "draft" report—of the Audit Commission. As the hon. Member for Copeland said, the Audit Commission made similar points before the House rose for the summer. The Secretary of State has had to eat his words.

The greatest ineptness, however, is that the proposals do not recognise our needs. The inquiry into our housing stock, which is currently chaired by the Duke of Edinburgh, is due to report in July.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): He has a nice house.

Mr. Hughes: Yes, he has a nice house. I shall come to nice houses in a moment.

The provisional view of that inquiry is:

"the only clear message is a simple one: not enough is being done either to combat the shortage that exists, particularly in such areas as London, or to head off the looming disaster caused by the nation postponing necessary improvements and repairs to our existing homes. International comparisons reveal . . . that the United Kingdom has been continuously underinvesting compared with similar nations, reaching a level in 1982 that is significantly lower than that for any comparable country."

[Mr. Hughes]

One need only look at any series of headlines in our papers to see that there is a need.

"Council investment curbs 'waste millions'"

is the trailer to the Audit Commission's conveniently delayed report.

A few days ago another headline stated:

"£19 bn needed to right council house defects."

The Guardian of 26 February stated:

"Bishops protest at 'lethal' housing."

"Inside Housing" stated:

"Don't abandon housing morality say Catholic bishops."

One headline stated:

"Problem flats 'need £2 bn for repairs'."

Another stated:

"More than a million homes 'unfit to live in'."

Just before Christmas the Financial Times described the Government's policy as:

"Scrooge rules in council housing".

Whatever authority one takes, it is clearly shown that the policy is crazy. For example, Maidstone council will be able to spend only £500,000 by non-housing projects. One project will cost more than that. Why should the council sell to raise the necessary money? For example, Sefton council, which is Tory-controlled, has written to the Secretary of State saying that his measures are losing support for the Conservative party at an alarming rate.

The Tory leader of the council wrote in November:

"I am very concerned that the Conservative Members on Sefton Council feel that they have exhausted their capacity and, indeed, their desire to explain away rate increases of the magnitude which is indicated for next year."

He continued:

"Our political support in this part of the world"—

Merseyside—

"is ebbing away at an alarming rate, both in Local Government and Parliamentary terms, and we are very concerned that the whole basis of our support is being undermined by the financial difficulties we face."

Eastbourne provides another appropriate example. That is the town where the Minister for Housing and Construction has his constituency, although I do not think that he lives within the boundary. In Eastbourne, 2,000 people are waiting for homes and 100 families are in desperate need of housing. That is what is happening in this so-called blue chip town on the south coast of England which is represented by the Minister for Housing and Construction. Many of his elderly constituents have been waiting two, three or four years for a transfer. Can the hon. Gentleman honestly say—I am sorry that he is not here, but I do not apologise for these remarks—when he has two homes, one of which is in London and the other in the south of England, that he can justify this poicy to the people of Eastbourne?

Mr. David Sumberg (Bury, North): We all have two.

Mr. Hughes: Not all of us have two homes. Some of us have to make do with one. I realise that some hon. Members who do not represent London may have to have two homes.

Can any other hon. Member say that he can justify that policy? The demand for bed-and-breakfast accommodation has increased and costs more than decent housing repairs would. It does not matter whether one talks about rural areas such as Cornwall, where people are in desperate need and are living in caravans while waiting for housing, or about inner city boroughs such as mine in Southwark —the problem is the same, and people cannot believe that the Government are so insensitive.

Mr. Tony Banks: The hon. Gentlman referred to the circumstances in the constituency of the Minister for Housing and Construction. What about the circumstances in the Prime Minister's borough of Barnet? There are 5,206 people on the waiting list and no fewer than 31,000 unsatisfactory dwellings in the private sector. The right hon. Lady sold one of her houses, in Flood street, for £250,000, so she is OK.

Mr. Hughes: Every constituency tells the same tale. Transferred GLC stock will not be renovated. Tower blocks in the inner city, such as in Bermondsey, Rotherhithe, Southwark or the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) will not be renovated because local authorities are being told that they cannot spend the money that they have and wish to spend.

Why do the Government not wait until the Audit Commission produces its report and get the answer right? Why do they not wait until the internal review, by which the Secretary of State puts so much store, is carried out? What will the Government say to assure their supporters that next year they will not be told that they can spend not 20 per cent., but zero per cent. of receipts? The percentage has been cut to 50 per cent., 40 per cent. and, with this proposal, to 20 per cent. Why not make it zero per cent. next year? Why do the Government not say that they really do not know the percentage and that perhaps there will be no money left at all?

The Government are deaf to logic, but they are politically insensitive as well. Last month the National Home Improvement Council passed a resolution, with no votes against it, calling on the Government — having deplored their policy—to change their plans completely. The National Federation of Building Trades Employers that has said that it is now useless to try to persuade the Government by reasoned argument. The only thing to do is to get to Tories where it matters — in their constituencies. The Government's policy on this issue—when Britain's housing stock is so appalling and has worsened so much under their stewardship—is indeed illogical, inconsistent and inept. But it is also immoral. I do not believe that the Government can justify it for one moment longer. I hope that the prayer succeeds and that Government Back Benchers will be brave enough to support us in putting these regulations out of court.

8.18 pm

Mr. David Sumberg (Bury, South): I was going to begin by apologising to the hon. Member for Southward and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) for not commenting on his speech, but I must say that I thought his remarks about my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction and his two homes were unworthy. They showed the lack of understanding by London Members of Parliament of the need of those who serve constituencies outside London to have two homes and two bases so that they can act as proper Members.

I want to set out as concisely as I can the reasons why, for the first time since I became a Member, I shall not support the Government but shall vote for the prayer. The House should consider the background to this debate. I have no hesitation in saying that one of the Government's most successful policies and one which will live for years with those who benefited from it, is that which allows council house tenants to become home owners.

The right-to-buy law which was brought in during the Government's first term of office and which has been extended and improved during the present Parliament has given hope, freedom and encouragement to literally thousands upon thousands of council tenants. They are now free from the state and the local authority and, most importantly, they are free to move their home and thus can achieve at a time of high unemployment the essential advantage of mobility of labour.

When the arguments on this matter raged, in the House —I refer to the legislation which allows council house tenants to buy their homes — and outside, the Conservative party always maintained that its policy had two essential objectives. The first, as I have already summed it up in a Churchillian phrase, was:

"to set the people free."

That we have done and are continuing to do.

The second objective, which was equally crucial to the success of the policy, was to translate the houses into cash so that it could then be used for the benefit of the whole community. That was the answer that we always gave to our political opponents who at the time accused us of dissipating national or, perhaps more precisely, local community resources. The right-to-buy legislation was bitterly opposed by the Opposition. It ill becomes them, therefore, to come to the House as "Johnny come latelies" complaining that local councils cannot use the money that they never wanted them to have in the first place.

Mr. Tony Banks: The Opposition still object to forcing councils to sell their council stock. The hon. Gentleman must recognise that capital receipts are based on the sale of unrequired land as well as the sale of council houses.

Mr. Sumberg: Of course I recognise that, but cash from council house sales is also an important ingredient. The cash receipts, which, as the hon. Gentleman said, come from a variety of sources, can be used by the local authorities for a variety of purposes. Some of them have already been mentioned: homes for the elderly, home improvement grants and—that much maligned and over-used phrase—improving the infrastructure. They can all be used to enhance the community and are proper and better uses of public and taxpayers' resources. They will all increase employment. They all reflect great credit on the Government and the Conservative party.

There was a powerful incentive for local authorities not just to obey, or to go through the motions of obeying the law, but positively and aggressively to market the policy. My authority in Bury is a perfect example. The Conservative-controlled local council has the best record, in percentage terms, for the sale of council houses in Greater Manchester. The implementation of the regulations will affect it badly. The consequence is that Bury's spending power for 1985-86 will be reduced by some £600,000. How can I justify this to my good friends on Bury council who have steadfastly followed the Government's line on local government spending, and how can they in turn justify it to their political opponents in the council chamber?

My right hon. and hon. Friends at the Department of the Environment will argue—they already have—that this reduction is merely a postponement and that it does not abolish "at a stroke" the local authorities' right to spend—if I may use this phrase—their own money. All that is true, but a postponement, if it means anything, means that worthwhile schemes that were planned for 1985-86 will not now take place that year, and may never take place. Whatever meaning we apply to the word "postponement", genuine jobs that could have been created and could have dented the 17·5 per cent. unemployment rate in my travel-to-work area will never be created.

I have supported loyally and steadfastly the Government's actions to curb local government extravagance and I shall continue to do so, but what hurts me most about the regulations is that they do not attack our political opponents; they attack our friends. It is directed not at those local authorities which dragged their feet over the sale of council houses, which prevaricated and put obstacles in the way of anyone wanting to buy their council houses, but at authorities such as mine that faithfully, vigorously and loyally applied the policies of the Conservative party and the Government.

I regret that the course of action that I shall take affects my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and I am sorry that he is not in his place. He was kind enough to come and support me at the last general election and I was grateful for that, but I am afraid that he and his colleagues are victims of Treasury policy. They are victims of policies which in this regard I find it increasingly difficult to understand.

I am not a natural rebel. Some of my right hon. and hon. Friends find it easier than I do to defy the Whip and vote against the Government. I believe that this Government are the only one that will bring economic prosperity not just to the country but the region that I have the honour to represent. When I signed early-day motion 283 on this topic I knew what I was doing and what the consequences could be. By signing it, I was keeping faith with my constituents and Conservative councillors in my constituency, but, above all, I was hoping against hope that even at this late hour the Government would think again. That they have not done so is something that I regret. It gives me no satisfaction, but equally it gives me no alternative.

I shall vote technically with the Opposition tonight, but they cannot be satisfied with their record in these matters. I shall, in my heart, be going into the same Lobby as those of my right hon. and hon. Friends who believe that in this instance the Government have it wrong, that a voice must be heard, and that a vote must be recorded tonight for those Conservative-controlled local authorities that in hard times have kept faith with the Government.

8.29 pm

Mr. Bill Michie (Sheffield, Heeley): I congratulate the hon. Member for Bury, South (Mr. Sumberg) on his good and courageous speech. I agree with much of its content, but also disagree with much of it.

These regulations are an attack on local government decisions and local democracy. During the past few years local government has taken a tremendous hammering from central Government. The regulations are yet another blow to local authorities, which do their best to carry out their democratic duties to their electorates.

We have disagreements about grant-related expenditure assessments, rate capping, local government policies and many matters for which local government is responsible. Obviously, I would defend my local authority on all those issues. However, on this issue we are getting at the infrastructure not merely of the nation, but of democracy and decision making. As the hon. Member for Bury, South made clear, for some reason local authorities cannot use the money that they own. Any further reduction in the powers of local government will have an effect which even the Government would dislike. I am thinking of complete cynicism about whether it is worth taking an interest, voting or serving in local government. That would damage the nation's democracy.

I have read many of the Government's papers on the matter, but cash limits still seem to be arbitrary, and I cannot find anything fundamental on which we can have a logical discussion. I am not an accountant. I am glad of that, because the more I listen to them the more I feel that there is no soul in the world. The hon. Member for Bury, South convinced me that most accountants have no soul, let alone understanding.

The Government do not take account of the ability of local authorities to spend capital receipts from previous years. As a result, local authorities which have played by the rules and not acted illegally find that they have an excess. Nationally, local authorities exceeded cash limits in 1983-84 by £368 million. The latest estimates for 1984-85 are between £600 million and £1,500 million.

Those problems were not self-created. They resulted from authorities responding years ago to Government instructions about planning ahead. Authorities which have not acted illegally, but have carried out the wishes of central Government, now have to pay the price for it. It is bad enough that it affects local authority services, but it also affects jobs in the construction industry.

The Building Employers Confederation, which sent a letter to most hon. Members, has frequently been quoted. I read with interest the latter part of its letter, which stated:

"The rules governing the use of capital receipts have proved increasingly complex and cumbersome"— we do not need to be reminded of that, but it is interesting that it comes from that source—

"resulting first in an underspend and then in an overspend. The proposed changes represent further tinkering with the system and cannot rule out possible further disruption to local authority spending in 1985-86. Long-term capital programmes cannot be run effectively on a system designed to meet a one year cash limit. The Government's proposals will further confuse not clarify the situation and will contribute to a significant fall in the construction industry's workload."

The letter then strongly urges the Government to reconsider the matter, and me to vote against the regulations, which is precisely what I shall do.

The regulations affect both big and small businesses. I had the privilege to meet a new group of small business men in Sheffield, in particular those in the construction industry, who have set up a consortium to guarantee a high standard of work and to protect clients in the public and private sectors. Over the years some of the building firms have received bad publicity, and bankruptcies have caused distress to clients. I applaud the initiative of the private builders in joining together to ensure the maintenance of high standards and guarantees. They have undertaken that at their own expense, which I also applaud. Although they are prepared to do that, they admit that from year to year they do not know whether they will have orders or jobs. Even orders in the pipeline may have to be reversed because of the regulations.

It always make me smile when I recall the 1979 election, and occasions since then, when the Prime Minister urged people to vote for a Tory Government because they would look after the private sector, especially small business men. At present, proposals such as these can do nothing but reduce the chances of small business men, no matter how hard they try to remain in business and to employ people.

The regulations also affect the Government's plans. At Question Time yesterday the Minister for Health, in answer to a question, said:

"We shall continue to encourage the development of services that enable people in need of care to live as normal a life as their condition allows."—[Official Report, 12 March 1985; Vol. 75, c. 139.]

All hon. Members will applaud that. I recognise that money has been set aside in GREAs for that purpose. However, the Government are wrong in thinking that that can be taken in isolation. Bad housing, closing hospitals and not having the capital receipts to adapt homes, makes the position worse. Therefore, the principle may be right, but the regulations work against what the Government claim they seek to cure.

There seems to be little response to the points raised by organisations, such as the Association of Metropolitan Authorities and others. Recently, I read a resolution of Sheffield city council, passed on 9 January 1985. I fully agree with its principle. The council

"expresses its grave concern that, despite strong representations concerning the level of capital allocation in respect of the City's schools, this year's announcement . . . will . . . increase the difficulty of maintaining a reasonable physical environment in many Sheffield schools in line with statutory obligations . . . requests the Chief Executive to write to the Secretary of State for Education and Science expressing the Council's concern and reiterating the Council's request for an urgent meeting with him to press for a review of this allocation."

It is obvious that such resolutions come not only from places such as Sheffield, but from many other local authorities. The regulations will have a tremendous effect on local government infrastructure.

In Sheffield the projects that will be affected are endless. In the housing sector we have an allocation loss of £4 million, which is 15·6 per cent. in cash terms, and a loss of capital receipts of £7·3 million. The proposals will affect remedial work on tower blocks that suffer from structural defects; remedial work on inter-war estate dwellings that suffer from wall-tie failure; the demolition and replacement of more than 2,000 houses, on one estate, which suffer from acute wall-tie failure, the modernisation and planned maintenance work on inter-war estate dwellings, of which 24,000 remain unmodernised; repair and renovation grants to private sector dwellings; further enveloping initiatives; and new council house buildings, especially for the elderly. I remind the House of the Government's stated willingness to look after the community and to bring more of those people into community care. Remedial work on post-war houses and the contribution of the slum clearance programme will also be affected.

The projected allocation loss for non-statutory housing in Sheffield is £800,000, or 11·1 per cent. in cash terms, and the projected loss of capital receipts is £3·7 million. Another great worry is that the council will be unable to carry out the work which any responsible authority should do for services such as the fire precaution work recommended by the county fire officer in homes for the elderly and the mentally handicapped — the most vulnerable in society. It will be unable to adapt homes for the seriously disabled, including the provision of stairlifts, downstairs toilets and ramps. That may seem like small fry, but it is not for those who live in houses where such adaptations are not made. It is a strain not only on those people but on the social services, which are criticised for spending too much in those areas. The fact that the building programme is not going ahead means that those people cannot be rehoused in more suitable accommodation. The people of Sheffield lose out in every way.

The council may also have to abandon a support unit that would allow the mentally ill to lead independent lives. It may also have to abandon special units for the elderly, which at present are geared to ensuring that the elderly believe that they have a role to play in society and that, given the opportunity, they will do so.

It is interesting to note that many of the schools that will be affected by the regulations are in the only Tory constituency in Sheffield. I wonder how the parents of the children in those schools will react? We are talking not just about knocking down a wall here and putting in a window frame there; we are talking about, for example, a new roof for King Edward secondary school, through which water is pouring at present. If it does not get a new roof, the structural damage will continue to the point where it is no longer habitable. It is obviously false economics, but, under the regulations, it is not likely to get a new roof.

The proposals will also affect the building of new schools and improvements to schools throughout the city. A great problem in the country has been the removal of asbestos from public buildings, including schools and colleges. Again, that is likely to be affected by the regulations. The council will have to abandon or delay plans for energy conservation and its proposals to integrate handicapped children into mainstream schools. We shall lose the improvement programmes for Hunter's Bar first school, Tinsley nursery and infants school and Southey Green school. The planned expansion in nursery provision will probably also go out of the window.

Despite the Secretary of State's claim this afternoon that more money is being made available, the Government cannot claim great success for their policies. There has been success in some areas, but not as much as there should have been. All caring local authorities, all persons in need of proper accommodation, whether children in schools, old-age pensioners waiting for custom-built homes, and even the Government's ex-friends — I say that because I believe that they will lose a few of them — in the building industry know that the policy is nothing short of a long-term recipe for disaster.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Many aspects of the control of capital expenditure by local authorities have been mentioned in the debate, but one is of special concern to me. I start from the principle that if a Government pass legislation placing new expenditure burdens on local authorities, they must make proper provision for the discharge of those burdens. During 1984, the Government put through Parliament an Act which did not apply to everyone in a certain financial bracket who lived in defective houses, but to one category of those who owned defective houses—those who bought them from local authorities. The Act placed on local authorities an absolute obligation on demand to purchase back some categories of defective houses, including Woolaway and Cornish unit houses, although there are others.

However, that does not end the financial consequences which fall on local authorities. Having purchased back those houses, not at a price related to what the house-owner paid, but at a price related to the current market value, that family has to be rehoused. It cannot live in the house while it is being demolished or while its corroded steel structures are being replaced. Therefore, the council must buy back the house, rehouse the family——

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Wyn Roberts) indicated dissent.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Of course, the family can sleep in the street? The family will be homeless, so it must be rehoused. The same problem applies to those who live in such houses, who have not exercised the right to buy. It may be true that the repair of such houses is extremely uneconomic in view of their remaining economic lives. It might be better to demolish them and to rebuild.

My complaint is that, having placed that statutory provision upon local authorities, no provision has been made in their capital allowances to discharge it. It is all very well for the Secretary of State to say that he was unaware of this until last night. That is an absurd claim; I wrote to him eight days ago and sent a copy of my letter to the Chief Whip. If he was unaware until last night, that is his fault, not mine. The matter has been discussed frequently with Ministers. The cost of the burden could represent a huge proportion of the estimated capital spend of small councils. I recommended to my right hon. Friend that expenditure under the Housing Defects Act 1984 should be outside the capital controls which this prayer seeks to annul.

It would also be extremely sensible, because the problems of councils with a minute spend are wholly different from those of councils with a large spend, to have a de minimis rule on the control of council capital expenditure, so that a council spending, for example, less than £5 million a year would not have this cumbersome mechanism, which will cost central Government a great deal to operate, thrust upon it. Councils with a posture of low capital spending have demonstrated that they do not need such cumbersome control mechanisms anyway.

In his opening speech, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State gave some encouraging signs—that is the only word I can use — so worded as to commit himself to nothing. My right hon. Friend is extremely generous and courteous in receiving deputations. The only trouble is that nothing happens after he has received them. There is no reason to suppose that that pattern from the recent past will not be repeated in the future. The form in which he gave his undertaking, after quite adequate notice to think the matter out clearly and thoroughly and to obtain the agreement of the Treasury, was worthless. If he had intended it to be what is being asked for by many of his Back Benchers, he knows perfectly well that he could have phrased it so that it was an actual commitment.

For years Ministers have said that they will consider matters put to them sympathetically, and they do, but their sympathy is all that we get. One cannot buy back defective houses or rehouse people with sympathy. It is no good saying that if one buys back a house the person concerned can rehouse himself. What happens in the part of the country that I represent is that any houses for sale are snapped up by those retiring from the midlands. Therefore, they are priced out of the reach of local people. That option in very many cases simply does not exist. That is why what will have to happen, in the representative case, will be the council rehousing the family where there is a buy-back under the Housing Defects Act 1984.

I should like to be told by the Minister when he winds up whether I am to be invited to believe that Ministers did not think of this when they introduced the Housing Defects Act 1984. Is the Secretary of State really inviting us to believe that he did not think of it until, by a happy chance, last night he read my letter? That is not, I am afraid, a very dignified posture for Ministers to adopt, nor do I believe it to be a truthful one: yet that is the apparent import of my right hon. Friend's remarks. We want better government than this. We are entitled to expect it, and we shall not get it by voting tonight against the Prayer.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): My constituency is situated in an area of high unemployment. I have a number of interests in this matter, which I shall gradually declare during my speech. The other day I received a letter from the director of finance in the borough pointing out the exact implications of the imposition of these regulations for the housing stock in the borough of St. Helens. Out of a total stock of 69,000 houses in the borough, 14,000 were built before 1919. A recent survey showed that 16·3 per cent. of the housing stock is unfit because it lacks certain amenities.

It would be instructive to look at the local authority's plans for the last year for which figures are available, namely, 1984-85. During that year it planned to make 2,147 toilet alterations. I am referring to houses which do not have baths or indoor toilets. One would have thought that in any reasonably civilised society in 1985 the provision of indoor toilets was a basic necessity.

The hon. Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) gave the House a good accountancy demonstration. I have never understood balance sheets. They always seem to prove that one is making a profit, when in fact one is making a loss. The reality, however, is that my constituency is no different from any other constituency where thousands of homes have no indoor toilets. Local authorities up and down the country, regardless of whether they are Conservative or Labour-controlled, have used capital receipts to install toilets and baths in houses. As my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Heeley (Mr. Michie) said, local authorities have used capital receipts to install ramps for the disabled and handles on baths, but the Government have laid regulations which will reduce the right of local authorities to spend capital receipts for this purpose.

I listened carefully to the Secretary of State's reply to the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham). I could not find any rationale in what he said. The House has not been given an explanation of why capital receipts are to be cut by 20 per cent. The Government say that they have been over-generous with their housing improvement grants. I asked my local authority to supply me with the figures. In 1981-82 the housing investment programme allocation for St. Helens was £5,978,000. Taking into account the effects of inflation since 1981-82, the HIP allocation for 1985-86 is £5,775,000. That is a 3 per cent. reduction on 1981-82. In fact, it is a 17·5 per cent. reduction on 1984-85, when the amount was £6,775,000. In volume terms, between 1981-82 and 1985-86 there has been a reduction of about 20 per cent. This has happened at a time when the metropolitan boroughs have been suffering from an escalation in unemployment and increasing housing needs.

According to the housing survey of 1984, council-owned properties in the borough need £27·2 million to be spent upon them to carry out outstanding repairs. This is the position in a town where many building workers are out of work. Although £27·2 million worth of repairs need to be carried out, the borough's allocation for 1985-86 is to be only £5,775,000. Furthermore, our capital receipts are being cut back. The logic of it defeats me.

As I said in an intervention to my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), it is all very well for the Government to say that councils should put the money generated from excess receipts in a bank and live off the interest or lend it to somebody else for the interest. The repairs that will not be done this year, the buildings that will not be built this year, the jobs that need to be done and were being done with capital receipts and will not be done, will cost us a little more than interest rates in excess payment next year. At the same time, we shall leave many people out of work.

According to a parliamentary answer that I received the other day, at the end of 1983, the last year for which statistics are available, out of all those out of work, 275,000 people have shown the construction industry as being their last place of work. In other words, 275,000 construction workers are on the dole, and that costs the state a lot of money. At the same time, all this work needs to be done, but the Government just say, "Cut back and do not do it." The elderly and the badly housed are the ones who will be affected most, and invariably it is the elderly who live in the worst housing conditions. At the same time, the 275,000 construction workers are on the dole. It will not cost the state anything in what I can only call their cowboy economic policies to try putting a few of these people back to work to relieve the misery and the poor housing conditions in which so many live.

If the Government are proud to run a country in which there are 1 million homes which are unfit for human habitation, of which about a quarter do not have running hot and cold water, they mark themselves as a Government without care. I hurl that charge at the Secretary of State and I wait with some interest to hear his reply at the end of the debate.

We are talking about whether repairs will be done. This applies not just to council houses, because there are millions of houses in the private sector, both rented and owned, which because of age and deterioration, need improvement grants, repair grants and insulation grants, which used to come out of the capital receipts and other HIP money. They will not get them. How often have hon. Members had people at their surgery — I have them every month—who say that they have put in for a grant but the council has told them that it does not have any money. There is not one Member of Parliament who does not face that problem.

I await with interest to see what will happen on Tuesday in the Budget. I doubt that there will be very much from our point of view. It will be another non-exercise.

Ordinary people, whose houses are in need of essential repairs, will not get help in the Budget, although the money is there.

The Government's theory with the PSBR is that if they do not allow councils to spend £5 billion, that will notionally reduce the apparent local authority debt. I suppose that that looks good on paper, but are we in the business of looking good on paper, or are we in the business of making homes that are fit for people?

I declare one of my interests in this matter. In my constituency there is a large company that makes bricks. That company cannot sell its bricks unless we start doing repairs.

Mr. Tony Banks: The Secretary of State just drops them.

Mr. Bermingham: I hear my hon. Friend.

The company cannot sell its bricks unless people are investing in new build. We have heard a lot about inward investment, and I welcome industrial investment and pray that there will be more. Yes, the total investment in the country is going up, but it is not going up fast enough, and we all know that it is not creating jobs for the 4 million plus who are unemployed. In one little sector—housing—there would be funding for jobs which would not affect the Government's overall borrowing requirement. The money is there. Why on earth do we not use it? There used to be an old adage in accountancy books that one had to speculate to accumulate. I suggest that the Government speculate on housing and we might accumulate a slightly better housing stock.

I declare another interest, as Pilkington Bros., one of the largest glass manufacturers in the country, also has a factory in my constituency, and I am worried about the effect of these policies on the glass industry. That company employs 10,000 people in my constituency, and that is an awful lot of people. In last year's budgetary effort the Chancellor put VAT on housing improvements and double-glazing and there has been a 30 per cent. fall in the volume of orders. Therefore, less glass is being made. If this order goes through and we cut back further on repairs, even less glass will be used. Thus, another of our important industries will suffer from the problem of artificial cutback.

Anybody who knows anything about industry knows that price depends on volume. The more one produces, the less the unit costs, the less the price of the product and the more competitive it is. We are in the ludicrous situation that some glass is coming in from abroad at a price which is less—this is particularly true in the glasshouse type construction—than the price at which we can buy the raw materials. The Government seem not to appreciate that such industries as the brick and glass industries suffer as a result of their policies which do not take the realities into account.

The cutting back on permitted expenditure of capital receipts affects my constituency in three ways. It does not give the unemployed in my constituency the opportunity to work in the construction industry, which they desperately wish to do, it harms and affects the brick and glass industries, and above all it harms and affects those in society who are least able to defend themselves, the elderly and the poor, who are invariably the worst housed and live in the worst conditions.

I ask all hon. Members to support the prayer against the regulations. While this will not change the economic policy overnight, it will give the elderly, the handicapped and others in need the prospect of a slightly better life. I reckon that that is no bad effort for the House to make tonight.

9.6 pm

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): In a world of local authorities of different political persuasions, from the extreme Left to the Right of the Conservative party, what is it that can get Solihull to agree with Greenwich, Westminster council to agree with Barnsley, Lewisham with rural Suffolk and Essex with Sheffield? In the House today, there was a meeting of three diverse council associations representing councils from all over the country—the Association of County Councils, the Association of District Councils and the Association of Metropolitan Authorities. I know a little about councils as, indeed, all hon. Members know a little about politics. That these three organisations and some of the councils that I have mentioned can meet and agree about the problem from which they suffer, although not necessarily about its solution, I should have thought would make any Government, and particularly my own Government, reconsider whether their policy is wise.

Councillor Mrs. Kirwan of Westminster wrote a letter, not a private letter, to the Secretary of State—I think that it was sent to nearly all hon. Members—in which she said:

"Mr. dear Patrick,

I have waited until now to write to you as I did not want to over-react to your HIP announcement until I had seen the full document. I have now seen this, and must say I am appalled at its content".

Throughout the letter, a good Conservative chairman of a committee indicates that she is worried—a concern which has moved her to write to other Conservative Members of Parliament and say:

"I feel as though I have been kicked in the teeth—the more so as Westminster has always backed government policy and has pioneered so many new ventures in furtherance of our Conservative beliefs".

One of the leading members of Solihull council—Solihull is not known as a Left-wing part of the country—has come to the House of Commons to join people from Sheffield, an area that bears no great political resemblance to Solihull; but then, Sheffield bears little political resemblance to any other area.

We must listen when such people come here united and say — as Councillor Lewis of Solihull said — that authorities need some certainty, stability and consistency. Nobody is saying that the PSBR is nonsense. Indeed, as a member of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service, and having had a modest hand in the report that the Committee issued, I appreciate that we said that the local government expenditure that was being stopped really had nothing to do with local authorities but everything to do with a global policy.

The Government, being on the make, saw a chance—not having been able to control expenditure in the way that they should properly have controlled it—and felt that it was like winning the pools; millions of pounds resulted from the activities of councils which had loyally followed the policy of selling council houses. That has indeed been one of the best policies that we have followed. The Government regarded that as a way of balancing the books.

It has been the economics of madness to tell councils one year, "Spend, spend, spend," and the next year to tell them, "Hold it. We did not mean spend, spend, spend but just spend." Is it any wonder that councils do not trust Governments?

We are talking about capital projects. They sometimes take years to plan and bring to fruition. It is no good blaming councils for doing what they were asked to do two years ago and what the Government say they should not do now. It is not their fault if, once a contract is given, it costs hundreds of millions of pounds to cancel.

The Audit Commission—the report of which, being another of those private reports, has not yet come out but which many of us have read — says that about £500 million is wasted by the ridiculous policy of "Stop, start; spend, stop spending." Councils must get confused in such a situation.

Much confusion surrounds the problem about which we are talking tonight. Who of us, if we have water coming through our roofs, a damp course that has rotted or woodwork that is so wormy or rotten that one can push a finger through it, will say, "I will not see to it this year. I will do it next year or, if not, the year after that." If we do not spend £1 million his year doing such work, it will cost £1·25 million next year and probably £2 million the year after.

As the Lewisham authority, which is some way from my constituency, made clear today, even in terms of saleability—this applies whether or not one agrees with the sale of council houses, a policy with which I strongly agree — the more houses are left to decay, the less saleable they will be. It is obvious that people are less likely to want to live in a rundown area.

Throughout the land there are hundreds of thousands of pre-1918 houses. They may not be as distinguished as Weston Park, but they still need to be repaired and they, too, are people's homes. They are not as precious as monuments, but if we do not do something about them, they will stand as monuments to neglect. Then, they will have to be torn down and rebuilt at far greater cost.

There is in Britain a crisis of dilapidation. There is no city in the land, be it my city of Birmingham, or Manchester, Liverpool, Leeds or London, where dilapidation is not prevalent and accelerating. Decay is a geometric progression and although someone might say, "Let us save a few million or a billion pounds by delaying certain work," it is financial nonsense to think that by putting a figure on one side of a balance sheet, all will be well next year. Usually there is another crisis, so there is another reason not to keep the promise that was made.

Surely we should kill two birds with one stone. We should do the right thing by people and by the Government's word. The Government told local authorities to sell council houses. Barnsley said that it was against that policy. That does not surprise me. Representatives from Barnsley came on a little visit to London on one of those rackety trains. They were told that if they sold council houses they would be able to use the money for more important things. The council believed the Government. Sadly, it was wrong to do so. Now it finds that it will have to wait an extra two years to do its slum clearance.

In terms of human misery I cannot believe that cutting £1 billion off the PSBR will be as important to people in this country or to those abroad as doing something about the infrastructure. We must remember the backlog. People now in their 20s will still be living in slums when they die in their 70s; that is what the problem is about. Expenditure of at least £15 billion is needed not to cure the problem but to contain it. The Government misunderstand if they suppose that cutting £1 billion off the PSBR will cause people abroad to rub their hands and say, "What a sensible country."

Should we believe figures from economists? Often I do not; the only certainty about five economists is that they usually have six opinions. It is estimated that capital expenditure of £500 million can create up to 65,000 jobs. Surely it is important to create 65,000 jobs. As failure breeds despair, so success breeds further success. The Government would benefit if people could see that their homes and their environment were being improved. The Government should be willing to do something about them instead of always talking about tomorrow, because the problem is with us today.

If the Government do nothing, they will lose on two counts. They will lose because people know that their policy is not common sense. They know that we have not really found a way to save money but that we are only delaying the solution to a problem that should have been solved yesterday. Tomorrow it will cost much more.

Let me give a few examples. South Ribble will have to cut £1·4 million from council house improvements. Cheltenham will have to cut £2 million from its renovation grants. In Derby, there will be a reduction of £3·5 million in improvement grants. In my own city of Birmingham, there will be a cut of a modest £14 million off a programme that we were trying to cope with 14 or 15 years ago. In Hertsmere, £3·5 million will not be spent on improvements; in Ipswich, the figure is £750,000. The list of dishonoured promises goes on.

It is not too late for Ministers from the Department of the Environment to ask Treasury Ministers to see the sense of spending the £1 billion. The money would not be spent recklessly. It might not even be spent in this financial year, because authorities would have to plan to spend it. They are being asked to reduce notional targets. Let us give a go-ahead and hope to local authorities. The people would gain; the Government would gain in respect and the country would gain in prosperity.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): The regulations represent another blatant attempt by the Government to manipulate local authorities' finances. Indeed, local authority finances are being used as a stop-go mechanism within the economy, rather in the same way as the car industry was used in the 1960s. I should have thought that by now it would have dawned on the Secretary of State that the House has become tired of the gross interference by the Government in the affairs of democratically elected local authorities.

We all know that the regulations seek further to restrict the ability of local authorities to spend their capital receipts. The Secretary of State said that about £5 million of accumulated receipts are waiting to be spent. The House has a right to ask why there is so much money waiting to be spent. The first reason was the moratorium on housing investment at the end of 1980, which so disrupted programmes that it took local authorities two years to recover. The second reason is that the Government grossly underestimated the level of receipts from council house sales.

The Opposition opposed the compulsory sale of council houses, and that remains our policy, but having been forced to sell the houses against their wishes, it is morally unjust that those local authorities are not allowed to spend the money accumulated in the banks.

Although no individual council overspent, the councils have collectively breached the Treasury's cash limit. As hon. Members on both sides of the House have said, none of those authorities has in any way acted illegally. We understand that the Government are reviewing the expenditure control system. I want to ask the Secretary of State a direct question; will he at some later stage prevent local authorities from spending their accumulated receipts altogether? Are there any thoughts in his mind, or proposals gradually coming to the surface in the Department of the Environment, which would prevent local authorities from spending accumulated receipts? If the answer is no, if there are no such proposals and if it is not his intention to produce any, by what percentage will the receipts' spending be reduced in subsequent years?

The Secretary of State has made great play of the fact that the regulations do not stop spending altogether—merely even it out and slow it down—and that councils will be able to spend the accumulated capital receipts. The right hon. Gentleman must make it clear, and give a cast-iron guarantee, that the accumulated receipts—which are rising because councils are still selling houses—will be available to be spent.

The Government argue that breaking the cash limit is bad in itself. However, since the cash limit is only a number, they are also arguing that spending accumulated receipts increases public borrowing and therefore threatens the public sector borrowing requirement target. That appears odd to hon. Members on both sides of the House. If receipts are already in the bank, they need not be borrowed. Indeed, no new borrowing is involved when receipts are literally kept in a bank account gaining interest. The Secretary of State set a figure of £5 billion on accumulated receipts. What proportion of that is sitting in bank accounts? I do not think that he heard my question, so I shall repeat it. He is still not listening, but perhaps I will get through to him eventually. What proportion of the accumulated receipts is sitting in bank accounts?

If the receipts are used for other purposes, such as paying off debts and lending to other bodies, once the right to spend that has been conferred is used, they must, in effect, be borrowed back. That is the Government's argument. There are two flaws in the argument. The receipts were not spent in the years in which they accrued, so the Treasury's public sector borrowing requirement target benefited at that time, and the effect was to reduce borrowing in that year. However, as the local authorities were accumulating within the rules it seems immoral not to return the benefit to the housing programme, especially as the underspending that created the problem was caused primarily by the Government.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Banks: No, I will not. The right hon. Gentleman refused to give way to me. That is known as poetic justice. The Secretary of State or the Minister may give the answer when he replies to the debate. If he pays attention, he may get the arguments straight for once.

Secondly, the treatment of receipts in the national accounts makes nonsense of the PSBR concept. Receipts are treated as negative spending, so the PSBR is totally unrelated to the amount borrowed. As the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee pointed out a couple of years ago, receipts are being used by the Treasury to massage the PSBR downwards so that the Government can appear to be meeting their borrowing targets. The arguments for more investments in housing are clear and have been stated by hon. Members on both sides of the House. There is a massive need for more investment in housing. In London, the housing investment programme allocation has been cut from £560 million this year to £480 million in 1985-86. That is a cut of 19 per cent. in real terms. The London boroughs, both Tory and Labour, bid for £1,500 million.

The capital receipt cut which we are now facing is only the latest in a long series of housing cuts. Since 1979-80, the provision for local authority housing in London has been cut by well over 50 per cent. in real terms. The cumulative loss has been over £3,000 million at current prices. What, then, can one make of the 1983 Conservative general election manifesto pledge to make Britain the best housed nation in Europe? The Government have a strange way of making good that pledge. It is nothing more than a sick joke and a good illustration of the two-faced attitude of the Government.

Newham's bids for housing capital allocation for 1985-86 totalled £78·3 million. The Secretary of State has specified an allocation of £21·5 million, a reduction on Newham's 1984-85 allocation of 11 or 12 per cent. in real terms. Under the regulations, only some £4·7 million will be available from housing capital receipts.

At this point we must do some arithmetic. The specified housing capital allocation for 1985-86 is £21·574 million. That is slightly less than Newham's estimate for payments on commitments, which is £21·824 million. The £4·7 million of capital receipts is very little more than the borough's own estimate for payments on statutory grants, now running at £4·258 million.

Assuming a certain overstatement on statutory grants, the Secretary of State has in effect provided a balance of £192,000 for all other categories of new housing capital expenditure in Newham for 1985-86. That is ludicrous, when one considers the problems of the borough.

In letters sent to the London boroughs, the Department of the Environment has set out policy objectives and asked the authorities to concentrate available resources on those with special needs — the elderly, the disabled, the homeless and those who cannot afford to buy. Newham has been given £192,000 to deal with those categories. Can the Secretary of State or one of his bright officials tell our councillors which category they should choose? Should they build an additional hostel for the homeless, or preserve the existing low-cost home ownership schemes? It is choices such as those that Newham will have to make.

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham West): The hon. Gentleman is telling us about homelessness in his borough. How many empty council properties are there in Newham?

Mr. Banks: I cannot answer that question offhand. However, many properties are empty because they are not fit to be lived in. The hon. Gentleman may not know much about Newham or about our 110 tower blocks. He may, however, have heard of Ronan Point and the Taylor Woodrow Anglian blocks. Those blocks were jerry-built, but can we get hold of Taylor Woodrow Anglian now? No. It has gone out of business. Taylor Woodrow still has money to give to the Conservative party, but Newham cannot get compensation for its jerry-building. Newham has to get people out of Ronan Point and another five TWA blocks, but the Government will not provide the money necessary to replace them and stop people living in fear.

I do not believe that Conservative Members, least of all Environment Ministers, appreciate the scale of Newham's housing problems. Housing problems are the most common ones that are brought to Members of Parliament. That is certainly the case in my advice surgery. Less than 10 per cent. of Newham's population earn enough to qualify for a mortgage—so much for moving into the private sector—but 90 per cent. of all new housing in the borough is private. Much of it is coming through the London Docklands Development Corporation. The great majority of the people of Newham cannot afford to buy those nice posh houses which are being built in a derelict part of the borough.

I shall give some more statistics. I know that statistics are boring, but these are essential to Newham. There are 4,600 people on the waiting list, 13,400 unfit dwellings, 30,000 unsatisfactory dwellings and 660 homeless households. They are boring statistics, but statistics of misery, dejection, and hopelessness. The Government have a major responsibility to try to do something about them rather than sit on their hands. The Government will not even allow Newham and other boroughs to spend their own money.

We should also consider the impact of the regulations on unemployment. Through their housing cuts, the Government are close to destroying the construction industry and home building. In London alone the number of unemployed construction workers increased from 17,000 in 1979, when this benighted Government took over, to 40,000 in 1982, when they ceased to collect the figures. It is not surprising that they ceased to collect the figures, because they are an appalling indictment of their record.

Housing investment is good at creating jobs because it is labour intensive. Moreover, those jobs go straight through to the private sector. It does not seem to have dawned on the Government that, of every £100 spent on construction, about £87 goes straight through to jobs in the private sector. The Conservative party's friends in private business are being driven to the wall by the Government's economic policies. How many jobs in the construction industry will be lost by the reduction of spending of capital receipts? I have heard 65,000 bandied around. Is that correct? I believe that the Government have a balance sheet and they should know the likely impact of the regulations on employment.

The regulations will lead to fewer homes, fewer jobs and less investment. Nobody can argue the contrary. The Government's proposal is therefore socially unjust and economically blind, and it should be rejected.

9.33 pm

Mr. Roger Freeman (Kettering): Like my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark), I voted for the public expenditure White Paper. I am sure that he also is worried about the news, which has been reported in the newspapers today, that local authority capital expenditure—principally on housing—is likely to be £1 billion in excess of the original estimate for 1984-85. If that is true, it is up by £300 million since my right hon. and learned Friend the Chief Secretary gave evidence to the Treasury Select Committee three weeks ago. That is surely evidence that the Government find it extremely difficult to estimate the level of local authority capital expenditure, and the reason is simply the method of control.

The committee which my right hon. Friend set up to look into the system of controlling local authority capital expenditure will have the best chance of affecting the total outturn in the fiscal year 1986-87. There are four reforms which I know my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) will join me in commending to the Government. I put them forward in a constructive spirit because they are designed to improve the system of controlling local authority capital expenditure.

The hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) somewhat disparagingly referred to the Treasury and Civil Service Committee's recommendation on the treatment of asset sales as mere accounting methodology. However, I believe that it is important to treat local authority house sales and the proceeds of privatisation as a means of financing the PSBR, not because of a slavish belief in the purity of national accounting but because I am concerned about the future. Five or 10 years hence, the rate of sale of local authority houses will inevitably begin to fall because we shall run out of houses to sell. I am concerned about the effect on the planning total for local authority capital expenditure.

If receipts are regarded as a means of financing the PSBR, and if we merely look at gross capital expenditure consistently over the next decade, we shall be able fairly to allocate our national resources much more sensibly than we do under the present system, which takes into account only the net figure — that of gross expenditure less current capital receipts.

The second reform is an attempt to redress the problem to which I alluded at the outset. The Government find it difficult to forecast the outturn of local authority capital expenditure for the year because the system of control is the housing investment programme allocation plus a proportion of past and current receipts. Therefore, it is a guesstimate.

Last summer, my right hon. Friend was forced to announce a voluntary moratorium—I am sure that it was the last thing he wanted to do—because the outturn was likely to be much greater than assumed in the public expenditure White Paper. The only way to solve that problem is to have precise gross capital expenditure allocations for each local authority. That would be much fairer to the two authorities in my area — Kettering borough and Daventry district.

If central Government, in consultation with the local authorities, were to set precise amounts of allocation for each local authority, that would alleviate the great injustice done to those councils which have been successful in selling council houses. Such authorities have suffered under my right hon. Friend's proposals, even though they were inevitable, following the logic of the public expenditure White Paper for which the House voted. As a result, the authorities which have suffered the largest falls in their capital budgets for next year are those which have been successful in selling council houses.

I admit that such a system would be difficult to introduce and would require time, but it would be fairer to authorities such as the two in my constituency which have been successful in selling council houses. They would have the chance to argue with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for a much less sharp fall in their capital budget than the 40 per cent. to 50 per cent. that they face next year. Moreover, if there were a specific capital budget allocation for each authority my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State would not be forced into stops and starts and voluntary and even compulsory moratoria during the year, because he could be certain at the outset and would hold each authority to the exact amount allocated.

My third suggestion concerns an incentive scheme. If for national accounting purposes we treat as negative expenditure 100 per cent. of receipts, from council house sales in any given year—my right hon. Friend proposed this when the system was introduced and we must be consistent—and if there was a specific allocation of estimated receipts, my right hon. Friend could allow authorities which exceed the estimated receipts to keep and spend all the additional receipts without that having any effect on the PSBR. That would provide a modest incentive for councils to sell council houses, which the present system of allowing only 20 per cent. of current receipts to be spent does not really provide.

Finally, although many authorities accept the logic of the proposals and the need for them, they are worried because once again there is uncertainty as well as a sharp reduction in capital budgets. Many believe that far greater certainty is needed for capital expenditure. If central Government can plan ahead for three years, as the public expenditure White Paper does, surely local authorities can be given some certainty over a three-year cycle as to the amount that they will be allowed to spend.

I support my right hon. Friend's action in reducing the prescribed proportions, because I believe that it is inevitable and because I support the public expenditure White Paper, but I hope that his committee will bring greater sanity to the system of setting public expenditure capital budgets for local authorities.

9.43 pm

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): This is a very serious debate on a very serious issue. I should say at the outset that I am one of those who strongly believe that the sale of council houses by local authorities, especially those facing severe housing problems, does nothing whatever to assist the solution of long-term housing problems. It is very short-sighted of the Government to insist on the sale of council houses when they know perfectly well that those sold will be those on cottage estates, street properties, nice acquired properties and rehabilitated properties, and then to blame the authority because it cannot transfer families with children from tower blocks to street level accommodation. There is something altogether wrong with the way in which the Government seek to impose that policy on local authorities.

Because I represent an area of enormous housing deprivation and see daily the problems thereby created, I believe that the council has been told that it must hurry up the sale of council houses. It has then been told that it cannot use to the maximum the capital receipts from those sales to meet the problems of those on the housing waiting lists. The council could not even run to stand still on the existing housing allocations and capital receipts; now it is being further handicapped. My borough's housing problems can only worsen because of the Government's decision in allocating HIP money and using capital receipts.

This debate is serious because of the terrible housing problems facing people in London and other major cities, as other hon. Members have explained. Overall housing expenditure in London has decreased from the 1978-79 figure of £1·32 billion to £609 million in 1983-84. That is a constant decline brought about not because the people of London are better housed or are in less need of good housing but simply because Government policy insists that that should be so.

The make-up of new building starts and housing allocation in London as a whole is even more serious. For example, in 1975 there were 21,441 new building starts by local authorities and 4,790 new building starts in the private sector. The total numbers of starts, including other public sector starts, was 29,410. By 1979, the total was somewhat lower than 15,000 new building starts, but by 1984 there were 2,300 local authority, 3,430 public sector and 6,220 private sector new building starts in London —a total of 9,650. That makes London the worst housed city in Britain and possibly one of the worst in Europe.

We should examine other grim statistics. In 1984, a horrifying 2,090 people were in bed and breakfast accommodation and 3,470 people were in other temporary accommodation. [Interruption.] Conservative Members might find this amusing, but they are the ones who are on the payroll vote. They will go through the Division Lobby to hit further the homeless and the poorest in the inner London areas.

Mr. Robert Atkins (South Ribble): Tell us about the wealthy Mrs. Hodge.

Mr. Corbyn: The hon. Gentleman, who always addresses the House from a sedentary position, should remember the days when he was on Haringey council, when he continually opposed expanding the housing programme and neglected the people on the housing waiting list.

Mr. Atkins rose——

Mr. Corbyn: The hon. Gentleman can stand!

Mr. Atkins: I was intervening from a sedentary position to remind the hon. Gentleman that he comes from a council the leader of which lives in a large and expensive house in Canonbury. She has a nanny who looks after her children. Can the hon. Gentleman honestly tell the House that such a council in Islington with such a leader is anything less than hypocritical in its attitude towards housing the poor?

Mr. Corbyn: The word "hypocritical" comes easily to the hon. Gentleman's lips. If the hon. Gentleman can only make a personalised attack on one member of the council who personally has done more to achieve a high level of public sector housing in Islington than anyone else, he shows the disgraceful attitude of the Conservative party towards the poorest people in the inner city. This is a serious issue, and if the hon. Gentleman has nothing serious to say I suggest that he should not bother to intervene further.

I ask Government Members to consider what they are doing not just to London as whole but to the borough that [Mr. Corbyn]

I represent. Some months ago, the borough council made a reasonable bid for a £81 million housing investment allocation which could help towards rehabilitating existing council properties, beginning a new building programme and getting us away from the dangerous position when so many families were threatened daily with having to go into bed and breakfast accommodation because they had nowhere else to go. Instead, the council was offered rather less than half the figure it wanted.

The Government treat local authority bids in a way that almost leads us to believe that local authorities make them up when they put them in. I should like to quote from a report by the chair of Islington Housing Committee, Councillor Chris Calnan to the tenants liaison committee on 14 February:

"The Council's bid is not an arbitrary figure—it is based on technical and statistical advice as to all the repairs and improvements required to the Council's stock and on the demand there is for public housing for people in need. This is then translated into a costed total and becomes the Council's bid. Unfortunately, whilst the Council's officers do put much time and effort into working up the bid, the DOE operate a set of needs criteria which produce results far removed from our needs. Therefore, as previous experience has shown, the allocation we receive tends to bear little relation to the bid we submit."

The allocation is £29·3 million against the submitted bid of £81 million.

Further to that, if the regulations go through tonight, the council will lose a further £3·48 million from its capital receipts. On top of the disgraceful attack on our capital housing programme we are to lose a further £3·48 million. That can only serve to harm the people of Islington in housing need still further.

Islington's housing problems are serious. Anyone who lives in an inner city area and any Member of Parliament or councillor who holds a weekly surgery must be aware of the frightening misery in which many people live. People who bring up their families in one-bedroomed flats cannot transfer out of them, and they cannot transfer from high-rise developments. Some people cannot even obtain any form of council flat. Around them they see dereliction created by the Government's policy of refusing sufficient money to rehabilitate existing properties.

We have the ludicrous position of many unemployed building workers all over London and in other major cities walking past the dereliction, often living in substandard housing or on jerry-built estates which now need major repairs, signing on at employment exchanges or claiming DHSS benefits when they are willing, able and ready to build the houses needed for themselves and the people of those areas.

All that Conservative Members can do is make jokes about councillors and councils. They should be ashamed of themselves and of their attitude towards the country's badly housed people.

Misery and desperation exists on housing estates where people have been promised improvements and where they have worked for years to reach agreement with the council on how rehabilitation work can be done and how badly designed and built estates can be made slightly more habitable. They now know that due to Government policy many of those improvements and repairs will not take place and that they will be confined to further years of misery.

I spent the whole of last Sunday morning talking to tenants on the Mayville estate in Islington. If the Minister wishes to find out about housing problems, he should go to that or any other estate in my constituency and we should be glad to show him what it is like there and the problems that people face. All those people could see the improvements that the council was doing to some of the blocks and they asked whether they would happen to their blocks or whether they would be stopped by the Government. They know what kind of Government we have and what kind of a man the Secretary of State is. He continually cuts the HIP and the council's use of its capital receipts.

There is misery in the inner cities and throughout the country. Housing is the greatest problem and misery. It is the greatest retardant of children's development and the biggest divider of communities, yet we have a Government who are now cutting capital programmes and who will not even allow local authorities to use their own capital receipts to develop and improve their housing stock. Once more there is a fundamental issue of local government democracy and of the denial of the wishes of local people. The Government seem to have a blinding desire to destroy any vestige of local democracy when it has been seen to try to provide for the needs of the people who elect local councillors. We have been faced with rate capping, the abolition of the GLC, the cancellation of elections, cuts in the housing investment programme, and now with the control of capital receipts. It is a final insult to tell local authorities, which are opposed to the sale of council houses because of the misery that it brings, that they cannot even use the receipts from that to do something for the poor people who are stuck in bed and breakfast hotels, halfway house, and temporary accommodation.

There is terrible misery. The social cost that we shall reap will be terrifying. It is ludicrous to cut public spending. Now is the time to offset the shortage of housing and homelessness against the problem of unemployment among building workers. Put together, they would solve each other's problems, and from that, we could build a better society.

9.55 pm

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): Those who have spent the past four hours in the Chamber have heard a rhetoric of misery from Opposition Members. It is worth placing on the record the fact that the catalogue of civic housing disasters outlined by the hon. Members for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) and for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) may in part be due to the long periods of Socialist control to which those authorities were subjected.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gale: No, Sir.

Ten days ago, in a similar debate, I placed on record my belief that these proposals were likely to offer a disincentive to future sale and, therefore, to the generation of new money. I stated then, and I repeat tonight, that the proposals are likely to prove counter-productive. I commend to my right hon. and hon. Friends the proposals of my right hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) which, as some of us have said, would go part of the way towards alleviating that disincentive.

I also place on record my understanding of the need to control public sector borrowing. I listened to the courageous speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, South (Mr. Sumberg), but his economic argument is as unsatisfactory as that of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark). If one wishes to sell an old car and to buy a boat, no one will stop one from doing so. However, if one also happens to be overdrawn at the bank without an arrangement when one sells the car, the bank manager is likely to say, "Before you buy the boat, where is my money?" It is all very well having money in one account, but if one is overdrawn in another—as the country is—it is right for people—in this case the Government—to object.

Mr. Simon Hughes rose——

Mr. Gale: I sought to raise earlier a matter which causes me greater anxiety. I hope that clarification of it will enable me to support the Government tonight. I understood my right hon. Friend to suggest that it was likely that sheltered housing could be accommodated under concessions made by my hon. Friend the Minister 10 days ago. Many elderly people, especially those in seaside towns, live in under-occupied public sector housing and wait on transfer lists for accommodation in sheltered housing. It is right and desirable to rehouse them in the type of accommodation that they require. The public sector housing that they vacate should be made available for sale and full occupation.

In both my local authority areas — Thanet and Canterbury district council areas — about 150 to 200 elderly people fall into that category. In Thanet district council area, there is a parcel of land which is ideally suited for sheltered housing.

I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales can answer this point. If a local authority chooses to build sheltered housing on its own land for sale to a housing association, which in turn will let that property, will that qualify under the concession announced last week? The explanatory note on the regulations states:

"No proportion is prescribed in respect of dwellings built or acquired for sale or built under licence for sale."

Therefore, it seems entirely reasonable that a local authority should use 100 per cent. of its receipts to build for sale to a housing association to release unoccupied public sector housing for sale and full occupation.

That is the only point that I wished to make. I hope that my right hon. Friend can confirm that I am right in my belief and thereby enable me to support the Government.

10 pm

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): This is probably one of the most nonsensical proposals for local government that we have had to discuss. For a long time the Government have done their best to clobber local government with rate capping, the abolition of metropolitan county councils and the proposal to stop local authorities from using money that is rightfully theirs. Since 1981-82, when the new capital control system was introduced, the prescribed proportion has gradually been reduced in such a way that local authorities can no longer plan for the future. Perhaps next year they will be left with nothing.

I hope that the Secretary of State will address this point and say what is likely to happen next year. Will we retain the status quo as it will be after the regulations are passed? Despite people such as the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark), who is well known for his opposition to the Government's policies on local government, I fear that we shall not have enough support to stop the regulations from going through. Will we have the status quo next year, or will local authorities be left with nothing? The Secretary of State must give some sign of what will happen, because local authorities cannot plan capital expenditure if the Government continue to change their mind every five minutes.

It is nonsense to suggest that the spending of money which the Government encouraged local authorities to generate can affect the PSBR. Local authorities build capital programmes on their view of future needs, and then inject into them the possibility of using the capital receipts which the Government asked them to obtain. It takes a long time to build such programmes.

The regulations will affect the creation of jobs. It is estimated that £560 million would create 65,000 jobs. If the Government were really worried about unemployment, they could create jobs in the public sector industries. Central Government have failed miserably in the creation of jobs and have abdicated their responsibility for doing so to local government. But in abdicating responsibility, they have also cut the feet from under local authorities by removing money that is rightfully theirs.

The money involved in the proposed change is about £920 million; that will be the amount removed from the local authorities, which they could otherwise have used to regenerate the economies of their areas. For the second time since I have been a Member of Parliament, the local authority organisations — the Association of District Councils, the Association of Metropolitan Authorities and the Association of District Authorities — have come together, irrespective of political affinities, and denounced the Government's action.

Let me turn to some om the problems that the Association of District Councils says will arise in Amber valley, Blackpool, Charnwood, Cheltenham and Derby. These are not Labour-controlled authorities. They are controlled by the Conservatives. They are worried about the reduction in the amount of money that they will be able to spend. Hastings, Hertsmere, Ipswich, Kingston-upon-Hull, Preston, Redditch and Shepway are all concerned about the amount of money that is to be taken from them by central Government.

The housing investment programme allocation in Barnsley has been reduced to 82·2 per cent. of last year's allocation. That represents a severe cut in the amount of money that Barnsley will be able to spend. The proposed reduction in capital receipts means that the Government are reducing local expenditure by about £3·85 million. However, the vast majority of the funds to be made available are already committed to plans that have already been made. This is how local authorities work. Central Government seem to forget that local authorities have to plan their expenditure. Therefore, the result is already catastrophic.

Housing advances in 1985-86 will be severely restricted, to about £100,000. Virtually no loans will be made to housing associations. The Secretary of State referred to the Airey houses and to a relaxation in the provisions of the Housing Defects Act 1984. However, that Act relates only to owner-occupiers. Will the Secretary of State say something about the Airey houses that belong to local authorities? The decision has been taken in Barnsley, because of the condition of the Airey houses, to pull them all down. The capital receipts allocation was going to be used to replace the houses that had to be pulled down. What is to happen about those houses?

Furthermore, what will be the position of owner-occupiers who depend upon grants to restore their homes? The Secretary of State said last year that if these houses could attract a mortgage, local authorities would be able to lend money for this purpose. However, these owner-occupiers have found that building societies will not lend money on them. Grants are not available, so what is to happen about those houses which are to be pulled down by the local authority and what is to happen to those who are waiting for money from the local authority to repair their homes? Only very small mandatory grants will be made available for renovation, and no discretionary grants will be made available. The grants for the insulation of houses will be at the prescribed limit.

Will the Secretary of State also deal with the condensation problems that face every local authority? There are severe condensation problems in Barnsley. The local authority depends upon capital receipts to overcome those problems. No municipalisation will take place this year. In Barnsley there are many old private houses which the landlords do not want. They would willingly get rid of them and allow the local authority to take over the responsibility for repairs, but the local authority will be unable to do so because it depends upon capital receipts.

The greatest effect of the change in the allocation will be on the pre-war housing stock, because all improvement grants are to be stopped. All new building is to come to a stop. The sheltered housing schemes have also come to an end. The local authority has had to cut its slum clearance programme to 25 houses. Because of the rate of slum clearance dictated by the Government's policy, houses in Barnsley will have a life of 3,200 years simply because Barnsley cannot carry out slum clearance.

The effect on local government will be catastrophic, unless the Government allow local authorities to spend the money that is rightfully theirs. The Secretary of State brought representatives of the local authority down to London and slapped their wrists because they would not sell council houses. The Government gave them to understand that if they did sell council houses they could spend money upon putting right these defects. The Secretary of State has reneged on that promise. He has left Barnsley in a difficult position. The results will last for generations.

10.10 pm

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): You said, Mr. Speaker, that the shorter the speech, the more accurate and disciplined the mind; and at this later stage, knowing that the Front Benches would like to make their contributions, I shall be brief.

Two principles are involved in this proposal. The first is whether the Government should intervene in local government affairs, and the second is: if so, to what extent? Regrettably, Governments have always intervened in local government affairs. Unfortunately, the Conservative Government are interfering with local government more than we should do.

It is an increasing practice that there should be more centralised control of local government expenditure. Once we have embarked on this course of action it is difficult for us to go back. If my hon. Friends wish to support the Government's economic policy, but are reluctant about this proposal, we still have an obligation to go in behind the Secretary of State and support him in the vote. Having said that, it is only right that I should air my grave reservations about the concept of more central control and central Government intervention in local government affairs.

To what extent will local government lose its initiative to sell its assets as a result of Government interference? Much of tonight's debate has been about the sale of council houses, and I should like to introduce another aspect which, although it has not been mentioned, is as important, if not more so, than some of the matters that have been raised tonight.

As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will know, I have waged a campaign in the House for the best part of 10 years on the sale of vacant, derelict and dormant land in the ownership of local councils. It is wrong that there should be tens of thousands of acres of wasting assets in public ownership. I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State supports me in my campaign and agrees that the public sector should not hoard land which is vacant and dormant and which should be sold.

In 1971 the Secretary of State set up the land registers in the Department of the Environment. Since then, every six months, about 20 full-time staff update the register. It is particularly interesting that every six months the figure increases. In July 1982 there were 95,000 acres on the land register in public ownership which were vacant, dormant or derelict. In January 1983 the figure was 107,000, in July 1983 it had increased to 110,000, and in January 1984 it had increased to 112,000, and so it goes up.

Not all of this land is in local authority ownership. Some of it is owned by the water authorities, as my right hon. Friend knows, some by health authorities and some by the Coal Board. Some of it is owned by Government Departments—the Ministry of Defence, the Department of the Environment, the Department of Health and Social Security. I fear that the trend will not be reversed by this regulation and that if it bites it will make local authorities even more reluctant to sell the land that they are hoarding, and they will have even less incentive to do so. Far from allowing them the 50 per cent. which they now get, they will get only 30 per cent. of money so raised, and this is no way to encourage local authorities to sell a wasting asset.

I had hoped to be able to tell the House that because of the Government's initiatives the amount of dormant, derelict and vacant land in the country in local authority ownership had decreased dramatically since they introduced the registers. In fact, what I have told the House indicates that it has continued to increase. I am pleased to say that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary on 21 January indicated that he had made four directions to compel local government to sell wasting, vacant, dormant land. The House will be disappointed to learn that the amount that he has directed local authorities to sell is precisely 32 acres. Therefore, there remain some 12,100 acres on the register, and an order for 32 acres to be sold.

What concerns me is that the regulations will be an even greater disincentive to local authorities to sell wasting assets. When my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales winds up the debate perhaps he can tell the House why I am wrong and why he believes that these regulations will encourage particularly the large metropolitan districts and large urban areas to get rid of their wasting assets.

10.16 pm

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): The debate has been a thoughtful and concerned one. Hon. Members of all parties have spoken with deep concern about the likely injurious impact of the regulations.

Hanging like a pall over the debate and over the housing service is the Secretary of State's remark concerning the overall judgment of the proper level of expenditure that Britain can afford which I think is the language of public expenditure cuts.

My hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) outlined comprehensively the Opposition's case. My hon. Friends the Members for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), for Sheffield, Heeley (Mr. Michie), for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham), for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn), and for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay) made committed speeches, and they, like me are concerned about the slow progress in tackling urgent housing problems.

The hon. Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) supported the Government, and his was quite a rare speech. He supported the need to rein back spending of capital receipts. I noted, however, that he addressed the House with the aid of notes on postcards. The first postcard was a franked one, and his speech in effect showed scant real belief in the need to rein back public expenditure. I could interpret his speech as an attack on the public sector borrowing requirement.

Mr. Stern: The hon. Gentleman may not be aware that the cost of postage applies only when the franked postcard is used.

Mr. Jones: I think that it was a waste of House of Commons stationery and as an accountant the hon. Gentleman should have known better.

The hon. Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) said that the Government are increasingly interfering in local government.

The hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) made a speech which indicated great insight into the building industry. His was a devastating critique of Treasury accounting procedures. He predicted the seizing up of the ministerial car, as it were. He said that the Government's ministerial car, that is, the Government's engine, had poor clutch control. His was the best metaphor of the debate, and he indicated that the Government had a moral duty to the homeless. He said that the builders were dissatisfied with the Government. He predicted the bankruptcy of many builders.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) made a detailed criticism of the regulations and quoted eminent churchmen to aid his case.

The hon. Member for Bury, South (Mr. Sumberg) indicated that he would not support the Government. He, too, made a courageous speech. He said that he feared the impact of the loss of £600,000 of capital receipts in the town that he represents. He was worried about the effects of a 17 per cent. unemployment rate on his constituents. He said that the Secretary of State was a victim of Treasury policy.

The hon. Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop), another Conservative, scourged Ministers and called for a better Government. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark), yet another Conservative, spoke up clearly for those living in rotten housing. The hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman), also a Conservative, expressed concern for the fall in the budget of his housing authorities.

The Association of Metropolitan Authorities in England estimates that housing authorities face a £19 billion housing repair bill. The Association of Chief Housing Officers in South Wales estimates that about £8 billion is needed for a 15-year programme to update and replace housing. The Building Employers Confederation says that 20 per cent. of all housing is in need of basic repair or improvement.

A top level inquiry headed by a member of the royal family, the report of which was published in January, says that Britain faces a serious housing crisis, with the poor suffering most of all. There is evidence, the report says, of a decline in the condition of older housing and some of the newer stock, mostly in the public sector.

It is certain that in England and Wales there is a housing crisis. The debate has told us that, and hon. Members in all parts of the House are witnesses to it. Millions of our fellow citizens are living in frustrating or degrading conditions. Tens of thousands of building workers will lose their jobs because of the regulations. The Building Employers Confederation puts the figure at 150,000. The Association of Welsh District Councils says that more jobs will be lost. Despite that, billions of pounds belonging to local authorities in England and Wales stand ready to be used to tackle the housing crisis.

In the matter of fact, offhand tones of cool city accountancy, Ministers effectively tell the House that they intend further to restrict the already unsatisfactory attack on our housing problems. That happened today. Bad housing is a festering and growing wound in British society. It enhances our social divisions, it divides the north from the south, it is unjust and it is unforgivable at a time when Britain spends £17 billion on funding a dole queue of 4 million people yet holds untold wealth from the North sea.

Do Ministers really comprehend the human consequences of the regulations? I will describe briefly some of them as they exist in Wales. Aneurin Davies does not have a bathroom. His home is also without an inside toilet. His one sink does not have a proper waste pipe. A few doors away from Mr. Davies' Cardiff road, Aberavon, home, 64-year-old Jack James bathes in a galvanised bath in the living room. His toilet is one of a mini terrace of outside loos. In Abertillery, a pensioner was moved from his house because it had no electricity or lighting. For them and thousands like them, that is home in Wales today.

Housing officials and hon. Members far too often interview sobbing old ladies who suffer interminable delays in plans to stop up leaking roofs. Officials calculate that some elderly pople will die before their homes are made draught and waterproof. In Wales, more than 40 per cent. of our housing stock was built before 1919, compared with 29 per cent. in Britain as a whole. Clearly, those houses are in urgent need of repair. The problems with the Welsh housing stock can best be appreciated by a close examination of one particularly hard hit area. My hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd), in a compassionate and informed speech, referred to the problems faced by the Cynon Valley authority. The alarming figures which my hon. Friend quoted showed how out of touch Welsh Office Ministers have become in their assessment of the housing problems of Wales. It is insensitive to propose the implementation of the regulations in Wales. Government statistics are woefully inadequate to identify the real housing needs on the Principality. It is reasonable to assume that the Cynon Valley survey conclusions will be repeated elsewhere.

The regulations will hit the Welsh people hard. While the English proportion of receipts that can be spent is to be 20 per cent., Wales must suffer a proportion of 15 per cent. The previous proportions were equally wrong. England had 40 per cent. and Wales was down to 25 per cent. Are the proportions fixed at those levels because we trounce the English public schoolboys at Cardiff Arms Park? I hope that even at this late stage Ministers will be prepared to think again about the figures for Wales.

Mr. Simon Hughes: That last point is important, because it disproves the Government's economic argument that they wish to reduce the public sector borrowing requirement. If that was the case, they would have the same limit in Scotland, Wales and England. Because they do not, that makes it plain that there must be other reasons for their policy which they have not disclosed.

Mr. Jones: We are glad to have the full support of the sole member of the Alliance who is here this evening. I am grateful for his intervention.

In Wales the capital expenditure of districts on housing is being reduced in real terms by £80 million over two years.

There is a need for more jobs in Wales. Coupled with that is the need to tackle the very serious housing crisis. The House may know that one in five of our men are jobless. Of the 183,000 who are unemployed in Wales at least 18,000 come from the building industry. There are perhaps some 4,000 skilled building workers now jobless and 14,000 unskilled operatives on the dole. It is incredible that with the housing problems our nation faces the Government pay these workers £90 million each year in Wales to languish idle in the dole queues. That must be social and economic nonsense. A properly planned public building and renovation programme within Wales would cut our unemployment totals at a stroke. It would also be the proper, positive response to the calls from local housing authorities and the allied agencies for Government action.

The regulations are a kick in the teeth to people who are entitled to better housing conditions. In many ways, they are the most scandalous of cuts. There is already much underprivilege in Wales. The housing stock is old. Wales suffers a higher than average incidence of houses without basic amenities. House building and house repairs generate jobs. The cuts in expenditure create human misery for those who hope for a decent house and a decent family life. These cuts also foster the likelihood that jobless building workers will remain in the dole queue. The Government remain deaf to the clamour of a growing consensus across party lines that to expand housing provision would be acting in accordance with the principle of social justice. The degradation of housing in Britain is unforgivable, and the Government must carry blame for that. Their record is disgraceful. With the crucial exception of London, these cuts fall upon the most vulnerable of our people who live in the northern part of the British Isles. To deny the Welsh people both work and the right to warm, modern, decent housing borders on the criminal.

If these Ministers cannot do better, they should get out.

10.30 pm

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Nicholas Edwards): The hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) spoke of two people—Aneurin Davies and Jack Jones. If they are in houses without basic amenities today, they must almost certainly have been in houses without basic amenities while the hon. Gentleman was an Under-Secretary of State for Wales. During his five years in the Welsh Office, the Labour Government spent £60 million on housing improvement in Wales. This Government spent £230 million on housing improvement over three years. I am entitled at least to tell the hon. Gentleman that I am not complacent about the housing conditions in Wales, but have done a great deal more about the problem than he did when he had responsibility.

Since the first of this series of debates on local authority capital expenditure, events in the financial markets and the imminence of the Budget have given it even greater significance. During the unemployment debate on Monday, a number of hon. Members, including some of my right hon. and hon. Friends, referred to the damaging effects of a 14 per cent. interest rate. My right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) said he would like to see a lower tax burden, improved youth training schemes and a selection of the other measures that he favours. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer made it clear that he also wants to see interest rates come down and a lowering of the tax burden. The building societies have already said that mortgage rates will have to rise if we cannot get interest rates down. All that is relevant to this debate because the Government's spending plans voted for by the House on 6 December 1984 will be crucial when my right hon. Friend presents his Budget.

The Treasury Select Committee, a number of my right hon. and hon. Friends and numerous commentators have emphasised the importance of providing credible spending estimates and targets that can be realised. My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) was one of those who emphasised the crucial importance of control on local authority spending when it represents £33 billion out of a planning total of £132 billion, and when gross capital expenditure is over £5 billion.

The commentators are surely correct in saying that, having decided on expenditure totals, we should seek to ensure that they are delivered. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) took a more casual view. He said that the odd £1 billion here or there really did not matter. Indeed, he said that £15 billion should be spent. I think it unlikely that in his profession of investment analyst he takes quite as casual a view of balance sheets as he presented this evening.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: As usual, what my right hon. Friend says is misguided and wrong. What is casual about reminding the Government of the promise that they made to councils, when they sold their council houses, that they would be able to use their balances? There is nothing worse than being casual about broken promises.

Mr. Edwards: We also gave clear and specific undertakings about our economic policy and our spending plans, and the House of Commons voted for our public expenditure plans. It is a little surprising that my hon. Friend seems to ally himself with the happy and careless proposition of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) that the economy should be need-based rather than finance-based. No one can run his financial affairs on that basis, and neither can the nation.

My hon. Friend was sceptical about how much it would matter to people in other parts of the world if we spent another £1 billion or £5 billion, or indeed £15 billion. I refer him to one of the comments about the situation that I have read in the past week or two. The name of Mr. Bernard Donoghue will be known to many Opposition Members because he was an adviser at No. 10 Downing street during the period of the last Labour Government. He is now a consultant to a prominent firm of City stockbrokers. Earlier this month, he put his name to a circular that, under the heading stated:

"Mr. Lawson must reassure financial markets",

"Now the financial markets expect him to reassure them on March 19th with tight monetary guidelines based on convincingly conservative assumptions and with few fiscal risks."

He then talked about the importance of meeting PSBR targets.

I accept that many right hon. and hon. Members may not agree with Mr. Donoghue's view, but plenty of people in the financial markets will take that view, and the decisions that we take on the matter will affect the market.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bury, South (Mr. Sumberg) praised our right-to-buy legislation.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): As, like the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark), the right hon. Gentleman is well known as a financial expert and merchant banker, can he explain something to me? Six years ago the Government said that as the PSBR was reduced—and it has been halved in real terms—interest rates would fall. What has gone wrong?

Mr. Edwards: Even the hon. Gentleman should be willing to take some account of the pressure of the United States dollar on interest rates and the fact that at all times we have to operate in world markets in which vast sums of money are moving about.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bury, South was quite right to say that it was ludicrous for the Opposition to take credit for the receipts arising from legislation that they bitterly opposed throughout. Without those sales, we would not have been able to include the receipts in our housing allocations, and the amount that we could spend on housing would have been less. I fully understand my hon. Friends' anxiety to have a better system of control, which gives greater certainty and enables local authorities to plan their capital programmes better. I noted carefully the suggestions of my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman), supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale). We have already tried to meet some of the anxieties that they have expressed, and we have made arrangements to cover their point about low-cost home ownership.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): As the right hon. Gentleman says that he has studied these constructive proposals carefully, would he care to tell us the Government's view of the proposals in today's newspapers of the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) for a big expansion of housing and investment, which we back fully?

Mr. Edwards: Unlike the right hon. Gentleman, who was not in the House to hear the proposals of my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering, I do not intend to comment on proposals that I have not seen or read. I intend to reply to my hon. Friends who have taken part in the debate.

Several hon. Members have referred to repairs to defective houses under the Housing Defects Act 1984. My hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) was a little unfair to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. Of course Ministers considered the problems of defective houses. In Wales, I was able to meet the bids for an allocation for expenditure on privately and publicly owned prefabricated reinforced concrete dwellings and to undertake that those bids will be met in full. In England, a new indicator was introduced into the index used in the allocation process. Discussions have revealed that some local authorities face serious problems which have not been covered adequately by that index. That is why my right hon. Friend undertook earlier today to consider sympathetically requests from local authorities which might not otherwise meet their obligations under the Housing Defects Act. I must ask my hon. Friend to accept that our right hon. Friend means what he said, and that he will translate it into reality for authorities such as my hon. Friend represents.

Among the measures that we have introduced to help meet the problems is the improved forward indicators. The hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay) asked for assurances about the future. We have introduced those forward indicators to provide assurances about the future. A good deal of additional flexibility is provided by the ability of local authorities, under present legislation, to refinance their mortgage books. In Wales, we have encouraged local authorities to do that, and a substantial contribution has been made this year to reduce the capital overspend that would otherwise have occurred. That undoubtedly provides scope for local authorities to ease some of their problems.

My hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) raised a matter of great importance to his constituents. If he lets my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction have the full details of the problem faced by his local authority, they will be considered sympathetically under the exemption announced on 27 February. I hope that my hon. Friend will understand that, without the precise details, I cannot give him a more definite assurance. It may be possible to help, but we shall have to look at the details.

A number of hon. Members, even those who support stern control of public spending, have expressed secpticism about the Government's assertion that the use of accumulated receipts would prejudice our economic objectives. But almost all of them would be considerably disconcerted if there was a sudden unleasing of up to £3 billion in any one year. Indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering expressed concern about reports that the overspend might be as much as £1 billion. In fact, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said that the present estimate was about £750 million.

[Mr. Edwards]

These receipts have not been lying idle. They have not just sustained further borrowing, although it is true that with the Welsh local authorities they were used to sustain substantial additional borrowing. That is one reason for the size of the present overhang. They have been temporarily invested or spent on other capital requirements of local authorities.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) asked how much had been placed in the banks. Less than £1 billion of local authority investment is on deposit with the banks, and only a proportion of that will arise from local authority sales.

It has not just been stored in cash in the banks, as the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey suggested. It has been used. If a council sells a house and does not spend the money immediately, it either reduces its own borrowing or lends it to someone else. That helps to reduce the PSBR in that year. If it spends the money in a later year, it will have to retrieve it in order to finance expenditure, thus increasing the PSBR.

The Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee—my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) in particular—has argued that capital receipts from council house sales should be treated as a means of financing the PSBR rather than as negative public expenditure. The present treatment has now existed under successive Governments for many years. While I suppose it can be argued that these conventions and practices should be re-examined, it surely cannot be argued that these long-established rules and practices should be changed ad hoc to deal with the problem that has arisen over accumulated local authority receipts and that such a decision should be taken on a vote on orders between the publication of the public expenditure White Paper and the Chancellor's Budget. That would be an odd way of increasing the confidence of the market in the Government's public expenditure figures and intentions, which I understand is the desire of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee.

The hon. Members for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) and for Southwark and Bermondsey referred to press reports about what the Audit Commission plans to say in its next report. I understand that the report has not yet been agreed, let alone published. It would surely be surprising if it did not have critical things to say about the present arrangements, because I and the Government agree that these are unsatisfactory. That is exactly why we entered into discussions with the local authorities and others with the object of improving them. I made that point during the debate in December. I have made it perfectly clear that it is unsatisfactory to have a large underspend followed by a large overspend — as we had under the previous control system.

The Opposition have criticised my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister for encouraging local authorities to spend during a period when there was an underspend, but I well remember the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) asking local authorities to spend, spend, spend and break the bank. He did break the bank and had to call in the IMF. Of course we need to seek better ways of managing these matters. I listened carefully to the proposals of my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering.

I listened with a great deal of sympathy to my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham). Successive Governments under totally different control systems have faced this problem, which my hon. Friend described as poor clutch control. I would not disagree with that description. I am asr anxious as my hon. Friend to find solutions. My hon. Friend emphasised—which is more than can be said of the Opposition—the need to find a balance and to contain public expenditure. He was not simply demanding reckless expenditure without control. The use of prescribed proportions is the means that we have to control that public spending. I believe that, until we find a new system, that is the best means of avoiding the moratorium which my hon. Friend feared would come next year. If we do not take early and effective control and have a large overspend, we might have to take a decision at the worst possible moment — halfway through the year, when it would cause the greatest possible disruption to the construction industry.

Mr. Foot rose——

Mr. Edwards: A great many hon. Members have argued for more capital spending, but they have not—[HON. MEMBERS: "Give way."] I shall not give way to the right hon. Gentleman again. He has not been present during the debate. [HON. MEMBERS: "Give way."] Very well.

Mr. Foot: The right hon. Gentleman referred to the future of the construction industry. What does he think will happen to the construction industry under the proposals that he is defending? In more general terms, what will happen to unemployment in Wales during the next 12 months, considering the fact that during the past five years unemployment in Wales has more than doubled?

Mr. Edwards: I shall tell the right hon. Gentleman something about capital expenditure in Wales, especially the relationship between current expenditure and capital spending. The CBI argues for more capital spending, while at the same time arguing for cuts in current spending. That is something that the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) never does. He believes that one can spend regardless. The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) pleaded for more capital spending, but his authority is one of the worst offenders when it comes to overspending. It is now a rate-capped authority.

Between 1978-79 and the present financial year, local authority expenditure has increased by about 10 per cent. more than inflation. Had local authority current expenditure in England and Wales as a whole been limited simply to the increase in inflation since 1979, we would have had probably about £2 billion of additional resources which might have been diverted towards funding capital projects in the local authority sector.

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Edwards: I shall not give way again to the hon. Gentleman.

If proof is required—this is my answer to the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent—of the Government's willingness to divert resources to capital schemes whenever room for such a shift is created, it is necessary to look no further than Wales. As a result of the generally responsible and moderate spending policies of most Welsh local authorities, growth in current spending in Wales since 1979 has been well below half of that in England. [Interruption.] That better performance has allowed us to release resources for capital purposes in each recent year while maintaining—[Interruption.]

Mr. Gareth Wardell (Gower): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it possible to have some order in the House? The Secretary of State is making an important statement about the Welsh economy and housing. I should be grateful if we could have some silence.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): The hon. Member is right. A great deal of distracting and disorderly noise is coming from both sides of the House. I hope that hon. Members will give the Secretary of State the opportunity to make his speech.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The reason why no one is listening to the Secretary of State is that he is so boring.

Mr. Edwards: I know that the hon. Gentleman is bored with the fact that in every year we have been able to allocate additional capital resources to Wales because of the modest current expenditure policies of Welsh local authorities. As a consequence, capital spending per head is nearly double that of England. That is to meet the needs of Welsh local authorities and because they have made a genuine effort to contain their current spending. Had other local authorities been willing to do the same, there would be far more scope for additional capital spending.

When in office, the previous Labour Government watched helplessly while local government increased its current expenditure in real terms year after year. They were then forced to make a desperate effort to balance the books. Between 1974 and 1979, the previous Labour Government chopped over £4·5 billion, at today's prices, off the housing capital budget—equivalent to a cut in gross spending of about 50 per cent. in England and Wales as a whole. Under the Government of which the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent was a prominent member, the cut in Wales alone amounted to a staggering £265 million, or 60 per cent. That record shows that capital investment on housing declined remorselessly through the five-year period involved.

Dr. Cunningham: Despite what the Secretary of State says, when will this Administration get capital expenditure back to the level which they inherited from the previous Labour Government? Why will he not be honest and admit that in every year of the previous Labour Administration capital investment was higher than in every year of this Government?

Mr. Edwards: The point that I was making was that, if we fail to control public expenditure as a whole, we shall be forced into the position into which the previous Labour Government was forced, of suddenly making massive cuts in capital expenditure and reducing it by about 50 per cent.

The hon. Members for Copeland, for Islington, South and Finsbury, for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) and for Newham, North-West talked about the condition of the housing stock and the need to spend money on it. They are in no position to criticise the Government about the condition of the housing stock because the previous Labour Government did not just produce a total reduction of about 50 per cent. in five years: they did practically nothing about the housing stock which they have cried about in today's debate.

At today's prices, the Government have spent about £3 billion on improving the private sector housing stock, and the estimated level of expenditure on improvement grants in 1984-85 is likely to be about £750 million in England, and £80 million in Wales. That is a good deal more than was spent on private sector improvements—

Mr. Foot rose——

Mr. Edwards: I shall not give way to the right hon. Gentleman again because he was a member of a Government who did practically nothing about the condition of the housing stock. This Government will spend more this year on private sector improvements than was spent throughout the whole four years of the Government of which the right hon. Gentleman was a member.

Mr. Foot: Will the right hon. Gentleman tell us coolly and simply how many building workers have been thrown out of jobs in Wales since he took office?

Mr. Edwards: It is interesting that the right hon. Gentleman wishes to divert me from the fact that his Government grossly neglected the housing stock, about which they have complained today. I shall repeat the facts to the House. In our peak year, we spent more than £900 million, which is 10 times the amount spent by the Labour Government when they left office. To date in Wales under this Administration, 85,000 improvement grants have been completed. In England the total is 775,000. That is a record, of which we are proud and for which we take credit.

The hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs Clwyd) spoke about the conditions in her constituency. She dismissed one by one the wide range of measures introduced by the Government to improve the housing stock, and said that they were meaningless. Nevertheless, her authority has failed to use the resources and measures that we have made available. I am entitled to say to her that we have done more for the housing stock in her area than any Labour Government has ever done.

In my opening remarks—

Mr. Steen: Before my right hon. Friend concludes, will he deal with the question of vacant public land, and the lack of incentive which the regulations may give to authorities?

Mr. Edwards: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend about the desirability of releasing vacant land. There is still a genuine incentive to authorities to do so. Indeed, some authorities may face problems which will encourage them to release more land to have money available quickly for their priorities. The resources will then be available to them in later years when the sale of assets may not go forward at today's pace. They will have the chance to secure not only immediate objectives, but their priorities in the years ahead.

As I said in my opening remarks, the background to the debate is the uncertainties in the financial markets, the need to keep interest and mortgage rates down, and next year's Budget. To listen to some hon. Members who painted a bleak picture of investment levels, it would be easy to overlook the fact that, as The Economist pointed out this week, during the past four years,

"investments will have increased faster than in any recovery for the past 25 years."

It would also be easy to overlook the fact——

Mrs. Clwyd rose——

Mr. Edwards: I am reaching the conclusion of my speech.

Mr. Barry Jones: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Edwards: No, I am drawing my remarks to a conclusion. The total public and private fixed investment——

Mr. Barry Jones rose——

Mr. Edwards: I will give way when I have finished this point.

It would be easy to overlook the fact that total public and private fixed investment in the economy was up by 7·5 per cent. in real terms in 1984 to about £55 billion—a record figure — and that total investment in 1985 is likely to be about £60 billion. To those who are worried about jobs and about the construction industry, I say that we should be concerned with total investment, not just with investment in one sector.

Mr. Barry Jones: Is not the background to the debate the fact that last year in Wales, the right hon. Gentleman began only 700 council houses? Why was there such a pitiful number?

Mr. Edwards: If the hon. Gentleman knew anything about it, it would be clear to him that local authorities have not regarded the building of new public housing as a priority for many years——

Mr. Barry Jones: Because the Government will not let them.

Mr. Edwards: Local authorities have decided to spend their allocations on the repair and renovation of their existing housing stock. They have not chosen — they have the freedom of choice — to spend it on new housing because they know that it is not a priority.

Mrs. Clwyd rose——

Mr. Allan Rogers rose——

Mr. Edwards: I will not give way, because I wish to draw my remarks to a conclusion. The hon. Gentleman has not been present——

Mr. Rogers rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Secretary of State is clearly not giving way.

Mr. Edwards: Bearing in mind the fact that only six Labour Members were in the Chamber to hear the opening speech of their Front Bench spokesman, I do not intend to give way to those who have come late to the debate.

Mrs. Clwyd: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Secretary of State clearly did not understand that I took part in the debate, although he referred to some points that I made in it. Until tonight, I had always believed in the devolution of power from the centre——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order.

Mr. Edwards: I have already replied to the points raised by the hon. Lady, and I do not intend to elaborate.

In 1971, the Conservative Government, which operated a different control system, said this about capital expenditure in the Green Paper on local government finance:

"Without central Government controls aggregate expenditure could exceed the tolerable level."

Any Government at any time must decide the tolerable level of expenditure in the management of the economy as a whole. With all the implications for interest rates and our other economic objectives we cannot allow aggregate expenditure to run out of control. Therefore, I ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to support the Government.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, in respect of the Cinemas Bill [Lords], Notices of Amendments, new Clauses, and new Schedules to be moved in Committee may be accepted by the Clerks at the Table before the Bill has been read a second time.—[Mr. Neubert.]

Agricultural Research

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Neubert.]

11.22 pm

Mr. Brynmor John (Pontypridd): I am grateful for the opportunity to discuss tonight the subject of the agricultural research budget, because there is no doubt that British agriculture is entering a very troubled period. I believe that it faces immense change, not as a consequence of the need to rectify inefficiencies but because its very efficiency has contributed surpluses in some foodstuffs. Dairy quotas have already come, and cereal limitation is shortly to be tackled.

The farming industry knows, as the National Farmers Union has recently stated, that the pattern of farming is likely to change both in support and in market requirement. The country will want, instead of just maximum production, which is what it has asked of its farmers for the last 40 years, the inclusion of product quality, dietary needs and environmental safeguards. These in their turn will lead to new products and to new production systems.

Farming cannot cope with this change without help. It needs Government advice and help which is based upon research as to how it should diversify and into what crops so that it can meet the changed requirements which the country asks of it.

It is at this very moment that the Government have chosen to imitate a hard-hearted Hannah who, as hon. Members will remember, was chiefly distinguished for pouring water on a drowning man.

In the last public expenditure review, in January, cuts in expenditure on research in agriculture by the Department amounted to £10 million for 1986-87 and £20 million for 1987-88. I understand that, of that total, MAFF's share is likely to be £8·25 million in the first of those two years and £16·5 million in the second.

I emphasise that this is not the first time that the research budget has been cut, but the second time in as many years. The Department of Education and Science science budget, much of which is devoted to the Agricultural and Food Research Council, has already been considerably cut. In 1984-85, the AFRC will suffer the loss of 550 jobs, of which 100 will be made compulsorily redundant. By 1987-88, that number will have increased to 1,200 job losses. I emphasise that those figures do not take account of the latest cuts of which I am speaking tonight.

The stupidity of the logic of making these cuts is nowhere highlighted more than by comparing what is spent in research costs with intervention costs. Total agricultural R and D is about £200 million, and MAFF's expenditure on R and D in agriculture is about £120 million. For 1986-87, our scheduled intervention costs for over-production under the system, which, on all hands, is accepted as requiring change, is £1·160 billion. That is a forecast amount, but the actual amount that we shall be spending next year on intervention will be £1·315 billion.

Of that figure, as a result of last year's increase in grain and other products alone, £189 million has had to be added to the budget, and £189 million is more than the total research budget of MAFF and almost as much as the total agricultural research budget. Yet if we want to reduce these surpluses and gain control of a system of agriculture that seems to be out of control, research geared to competitive and efficient production, but compatible with welfare and environmental costs, is desperately needed. That alone will reduce the cost of food and costs to the producer.

For example, the Minister's response to the COMA report—announced in a written answer yesterday—talks about the exclusion of the fattest quality of meat. But that of itself is a negative concept. It should be accompanied by positive research which will enable, for example, sheep farmers to produce marketable lean lambs which meet customers' demands. That must be the way forward. If we are to create, and satisfy, a demand for leaner meat, we must not only penalise the fattest meat but create and stimulate an industry which produces leaner animals.

The £20 million cut of which I speak is about 14 per cent. of expenditure. It will, I understand, mean the loss in total of 2,000 jobs, of which 1,000 will be scientists. That would be harsh, but, frankly, if it could be shown that our expenditure on agricultural R and D was already excessive, it would be a price that would have to be accepted.

But that, alas, is not true. If these cuts go ahead, the spending on agriculture and food research and development will be lower per capita than that in any other country in the EEC, with the exception of Greece and Italy, which are hardly agricultural models to follow. We must remember, too, that, as well as being our partners, other EEC countries are also our competitors, selling agricultural products in the increasingly competitive markets which can be forecast for the next decade. They will have the advantage of a much better and bigger research backup.

The Minister, of course, will say that I am alarmist and that nothing has yet been said about job losses or the closure of establishments. That is true. The Government, in what is now an all too familiar pattern, having decided the ends, have neglected to indicate the means by which they will effect savings. Not the least cruelty in the whole process is the uncertainty about people's futures which has been aroused and which is being allowed to drift. The Minister will probably indignantly repudiate that by saying that the Priorities Board is already at work to solve the uncertainties by the allocation of resources between the different forms of agriculture and food research, taking into account future priorities. I will be asked why we should not leave it to the board.

I have no doubt that the Priorities Board will do the best it can, but it has already been given the answer to the sum. All it is being asked to do is to figure out the working to get to that answer. A sensible Government would have reversed the process, but the Government are not at all sensible when it comes to monetarism, even when the well-being of the country is being jeopardised, as it is here.

Nor can I accept that the Priorities Board should be charged with this task. It is not democratically accountable and it has no consumer representation. The Minister in answering the debate should say whether or not the report of the board will be publicly available. I suspect not. The passion which the Conservative party has for privatisation has led the Government to privatise matters which, like this one, are properly the responsibility of Government. Great anxiety has been expressed to me as to whom, if anyone, the board has consulted. None of the representatives to whom I have spoken has as yet been involved. We would welcome being told by the Minister in the response to the debate the date when the report of the Priorities Board is expected. I fear it will not be until late summer. If that is so, until that date both the AFRC and, more importantly, those engaged in the research will not know where the cuts will fall. That is a poor reward for the loyalty and devotion of the employees.

In the absence of firm data, I am forced to make certain assumptions in an attempt to press the Minister to be more definite. The first assumption is that MAFF research spending is divided almost equally between its internal research and research commissioned by the AFRC. If that is so, a fair working assumption would be that they will bear the cuts almost equally. I have already stated that in all some 2,000 jobs will disappear. Of these, I believe that it is fair to put a minimum figure of 700-800 on the jobs lost in the AFRC. Taken with its present job loss plans, which I mentioned at the beginning, the AFRC's job loss in the next few years will be 2,000.

Not only does a job loss of such magnitude represent a tragic waste of human potential, but it also puts in jeopardy the future of a number of establishments. Lord Selborne, the chairman of the AFRC, writing in Big Farm Weekly, has specified at least two as being at risk of closure. As to which they are, we must await the report of the Priorities Board. The most heavily supported by MAFF are the National Vegetable Research Station at Wellesbourne, the Poultry Research Centre at Edinburgh, the Glasshouse Crops Research Station, Sussex, and the East Malling Research Station at Maidstone. In Wales, is the unjustified threat to the Plant Breeding Station at Aberystwyth to be renewed?

"Ah," the Minister will say in one of the magic incantations that we now expect, "we want private money to come in, which means that all the jobs losses that are feared will not happen." It is impossible in the time scale to guarantee funding, certainly in an industry subject to a financial squeeze. In any event, the injection of such money would go to projects which are immediate and which would bear quick results. Private money will not be able to supplement Government money in the long-term research which is subject to the inevitable delays, vagaries and uncertainties. It is in that area that Government investment cannot be supplanted.

The long-term basis of agricultural research is now being destroyed. Even if it had its effects only in this country it would be criminal, but the truth is that it will also affect our ability to make a significant contribution to the conquest of the famine that affects much of the world. To do that in pursuit of savings which, in terms of global expenditure, are puny, shames us. The Minister must know that once a research programme is halted and a team broken up, it is difficult to put it together again.

For the sake of the highly qualified scientists, for the sake of our farmers who face an uncertain future without knowing how and where to direct their efforts, and for the sake of our reputation as a caring nation, I appeal to the Minister to reverse this harmful and unjustifiable decision.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mrs. Peggy Fenner): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) for raising this important subject and allowing us an opportunity to talk about our plans relating to agricultural research and development.

Let me say at the outset that the Government fully appreciate the contribution which research and development make to the well-being of our agricultural industry and the community at large. The scale of our commitment is evidenced by the considerable sums of public money — to which the hon. Gentleman, to do him credit, referred—devoted to the agriculture programme by the Agriculture Departments and the Department of Education and Science. In 1983-84, expenditure on agricultural research and development was £160 million and, although it falls outside the strict terms of this debate, hon. Members may like to be aware that a further £40 million of Government funds were spent on food and fisheries research. This total expenditure of over £200 million of national resources is a clear indication of the importance that we attach to these subjects.

The objective of the research and development programme is to advance scientific knowledge relevant to agriculture and food in order to increase the efficiency of the industry while at the same time protecting the environment and preventing adverse social effects. I make that point because the hon. Gentleman seemed to suggest that this was a whole new area that required additional research. It has always formed part of research into this work.

The more basic research is carried out by the research councils with funds provided by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science, from the science Vote. The funds from my own Department are devoted to work of more immediate importance to the industries, and those which are the responsibility of the Secretary of State for Scotland support the basic and applied research of Scottish agricultural research institutes and the development work of the Scottish agricultural colleges.

The Agricultural and Food Research Council is the main contractor for work commissioned by my Department on agricultural research and development. As hon. Members will no doubt be aware, the AFRC is a body which operates under a Royal Charter and it carries out its work by running or grant-aiding research institutes and by awarding research grants to teams of scientists in the universities. About half of its income is received from the science Vote and half from commissioned work. In 1983-84 the council received £45·8 million in grant in aid and £51·3 million from MAFF commissions.

In Scotland, as I have indicated, the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries is responsible for administering the seven Scottish agricultural research institutes which form part of the Agricultural and Food Research Service. The institutes contribute significantly to the agricultural research and development effort, particularly in relation to the soils, crops and livestock in the climate of northern Britain. The Department is also responsible for administering the three Scottish agricultural colleges which undertake development work in close association with their advisory and educational activities.

My own Department also carries out a major programme of agricultural research and development. About one third of the total effort of the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service is devoted to research and development. We run experimental husbandry farms and experimental horticultural stations which evaluate research results and develop and integrate them into production systems that can be applied in commercial practice. There is also a network of central and regional science and veterinary laboratories, and a cattle-breeding centre, which are all concerned to a greater or lesser degree with research and development over a wide field. In addition, there is a good deal of local investigation of particular problems encountered by the industry. All this amounts to a considerable investment of public resources, costing some £40 million a year.

To achieve a fully co-ordinated approach to agricultural and food research and development, a priorities board was established in 1984 to advise the Agriculture Departments and the AFRC on research and development priorities and the allocation of research budgets. The board is small, with an independent chairman, Sir Kenneth Durham, chairman of Unilever, and a majority of independent members representing customer and scientific interests. Although the board is advisory, the Government expect that its advice will normally be accepted.

The hon. Gentleman wanted me to say whether the board's report would be made public. If its advice is sometimes not accepted, perhaps it would be as well for it not to be made public. However, when the Government appoint a board to advise them, it is expected that its advice will normally be accepted.

Representatives of the Agriculture Departments and the Agricultural and Food Research Council are on the priorities board and are therefore fully involved in the formulation of its advice. We believe that the board, which can take a view of national needs over the whole range of agricultural and food research and development has a major role to play in guiding the direction of the research effort. The hon. Gentleman did not give the board credit for being in a position to so advise the Departments.

It is against that background of a close and effective research partnership that I wish to set the Government's plans for future expenditure on agricultural research and development.

As my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture announced on 22 January, provision for expenditure by the Agriculture Departments on research and development has been reduced by £10 million in 1986-87 and £20 million in 1987-88. There are no reductions in planned expenditure for 1985-86. The reductions in 1986-87 and 1987-88 are provisional and will be influenced by the scope for industry support of research carried out by the public sector. They should not be seen as casting doubt on the Government's appreciation of the value of agricultural research. Rather, they represent the view—I am sorry if the hon. Gentleman does not share it—that it is not unreasonable that the industry should bear part of the cost of a service from which it benefits. The financial arrangements that I outlined earlier indicate the scale of the Government's commitment to the research and development effort. We believe that there is scope for a change in the pattern of funding, so that the industry is more fully involved in contributing to the work which is being done and in determining the nature of that research effort.

The Agriculture Ministers have asked the priorities board to consider and advise on the allocation of resources between the different sectors of agriculture and food, taking account of future priorities for the direction of research and the scope and prospects for increased levels of industry funding. When we have that advice we shall consult the industry about the mechanisms which might be appropriate for securing the greater involvement that we wish to achieve, and we shall be taking our decisions about the future direction of the research programme.

The poposed reductions in expenditure are shared as the hon. Gentleman suggested — £8·25 million to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in 1986-87 and £16·5 million in 1987-88 because of the share with the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland.

The revised expenditure plans and the move towards greater industry participation could clearly have significant implications for the Agricultural and Food Research Council and for the resources devoted to in-house research and development. There are likely to be some changes in relative priorities, and the industry is likely to be involved in areas in which it has not previously participated. At this stage, it is not possible to be precise about the scale and nature of these changes. We have made no change in the funds earmarked for research and development in the coming financial year to allow us to consider, in conjunction with all the parties involved, the way forward which will ensure maximum effectiveness of the revised arrangements.

The move towards greater industry participation accords with the initiative taken by the Advisory Board for the Research Councils in establishing a working party on private sector funding for the research councils. The working party, chaired by Professor Peter Mathias, is aiming to establish the facts about the present funding of scientific research by charities, industry and commerce and to consider what scope there might be for increasing the flow of such funds to the research councils and higher education.

The AFRC's recently published corporate plan recognises that if the scale of the council's research for the industries it serves is to be maintained it will be necessary to draw its support from elsewhere. The council already receives more than £2 million per annum from the private sector and over the planning period 1985 to 1990 will aim significantly to increase its funding from industry. We support this approach most strongly.

For the AFRC, the funds which we hope will be available through contributions from industry will take their place alongside the grant-in-aid from the science Vote and the revenue from other commissioned work. It will be for the AFRC to manage its resources within that total funding. I accept that concern has been expressed about the future of staff and institutes, but I do not think that it would be helpful to speculate on such aspects tonight. Decisions on these points depend on decisions yet to be taken on priorities and on the level of industry contributions. We recognise the importance of these decisions and will aim to provide clear guidelines for the future as rapidly as possible.

The hon. Gentleman gave figures which he said showed that we shall be below the levels of funding of EC countries except for Italy and Greece. There has been much debate about the appropriateness of the various indicators of relative spending on agricultural research and development. All of the methods have their limitations, but they can draw attention to some interesting questions. Different approaches can draw different conclusions. It is beyond doubt, however, that our agricultural research and development effort has been supported well by the Government. Even after the adjustments, we shall still make a major contribution to the costs of that research programme. That contribution will stand comparison with all of our competitors.

I appreciate that we are to some extent breaking new ground in our efforts to involve industry more fully in the research and development effort, but we believe that this is the right way forward. When there are constraints on public expenditure, it makes good sense to encourage those who are likely to benefit from the work which is being undertaken to share in its costs. I recognise that the proposed expenditure reductions and the issues which have still to be resolved on industry funding give rise to uncertainties for all those involved in the research and development effort. It should be remembered, however, that the Government will still be making a major contribution to agricultural research and development and that we shall be seeking the active co-operation of industry in our future plans. I am sure that through the arrangements that we are aiming to establish we can maintain a strong and effective research effort which will be of benefit to the industry and the country as a whole.

Oral Answers to Questions

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Agriultural Development and Advisory Service

1. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Minister of Agriculture Fisheries and Food what representations he has received about the proposed cuts in the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service funding outlined in the White Paper on public expenditure.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Michael Jopling): A small number of representations have been received expressing concern about the proposed cuts.

Mr. Kirkwood: Does the Minister acknowledge that one of the reasons why the agriculture industry has had such success in increasing productivity is to the research and development work and advisory service of ADAS? Does he further acknowledge that the industry is under a great deal of pressure at the moment to try to conform to more environmental regimes of farming, to increase animal welfare and to deal with the whole question of high input, high output, farming? If the right hon. Gentleman acknowledges those things, does he agree that it is inapposite and inappropriate at this time to cut the ADAS budget in the way that he is proposing?

Mr. Jopling: I gladly acknowledge the esteem in which ADAS is held and the quality of service for which ADAS is well known. I believe that it was right to ask Professor Bell to report. He recommended that the beneficiaries of services provided by ADAS should contribute to the cost of those services. I consider it only right that the industry should be given the opportunity to help to maintain the service that it requires.

Sir John Farr: Does my right hon. Friend recognise that the quality of the advice of ADAS is excellent and that, as a result, it has won the confidence of agriculture? Will my right hon. Friend also bear in mind that the similar advice that one can get on a commercial basis from companies with a financial interest is not of the same quality or value to the average farmer?

Mr. Jopling: Many farmers prefer to get advice from ADAS, which they believe to be more likely to be independent than the advice that they can get from commercial sources.

Mr. John: Does the Minister agree that the chief advantage of ADAS is to the smaller farmer? Will not the scheme of charges that is now proposed inhibit the very people who benefit most from claiming such advice?

Mr. Jopling: That is not necessarily so. I ask the hon. Gentleman to look again at Professor Bell's report, in which he suggested that the information technology of the latter part of this century should be brought into the service. We shall be investing a good deal of effort in finding modern ways of bringing advice to farmers, particularly small farmers.

Mr. Kennedy: Will the Minister explain why the proposed cut in Scotland, which, as he knows, operates under a tripartite arrangement with the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland and the agricultural colleges, is almost twice that proposed for England and Wales? It is a cut of 41 per cent., at £3·5 million.

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman ought to do his homework. The planned expenditure of £40 million by my Department on advisory services in 1987-88 will be reduced by £16·6 million, and the expenditure of £8·2 million by the Scottish Department will be cut by £3·4 million, which is the same percentage in each case.

European Community (Agricultural Prices)

2. Mr. Strang asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the European Commission's latest agricultural price proposals and package; and if he will make a statement on the progress made to date by the Council of Agriculture Ministers in considering those proposals.

5. Mr. Latham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the latest position regarding the progress of the Common Market price negotiations.

Mr. Jopling: With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall answer this question and question No. 5 together at the end of Question Time.

Milk Quotas

3. Mr. Hunter asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any plans to amend the guidelines governing the allocation of secondary milk quotas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: I do not think it would be appropriate to change the guidelines now that the tribunal has virtually completed its work.

Mr. Hunter: With a constituency case in mind, may I ask my right hon. Friend seriously and urgently to consider the familiar argument that dairy farmers who cannot economically diversify into other areas of production should receive more beneficial treatment than farmers who can diversify? Will he explain why, despite its compelling logic and natural justice, this principle has not been taken on board?

Mr. Jopling: I am at a disadvantage in that I do not know the exact case to which my hon. Friend refers. However, I have been able to use the outgoers scheme. I hope that before long those small producers who experience the kind of difficulties to which my hon. Friend has referred will have milk quotas returned to the level of production that applied in 1983 before milk quotas started.

Mr. Ashdown: Is the Minister able to tell the House why he has decided to remove himself from the capacity of providing a final review of appeals and tribunals which hand out secondary milk quotas? Is this not the Minister's own decision? Is it not a requirement which has been laid upon him by European legislation? Because of the number of anomalies now coming to light, which I grant are not many, would it not be better for the Minister to have the capacity to review those decisions?

Mr. Jopling: I recognise that there may be certain categories of producers who do not fall within the provisions laid down by the regulations but who nevertheless are in need of an additional quota. With the help of the tribunal, I am attempting to identify those categories. However, as the hon. Gentleman knows, the problem is to find additional quota to give to them. There is only one place from which that could come—from other farmers who have a quota.

Mr. Hicks: Where is the consistency for the smaller, exclusive dairy producer? On the one hand, he has been led to believe by my right hon. Friend that he will achieve a milk quota equivalent of at least a 40-cow herd; on the other hand, as a result of his appearance before the tribunal, he is being cut to less than that equivalent output.

Mr. Jopling: Again, I do not know the case that my hon. Friend has in mind. If he is referring to those cases where the tribunal has cut the amount of secondary quota that was awarded by the panels, I should point out that the tribunal is a judicial body over which I have no control. Farmers were warned early on during the tribunal hearings that some secondary quotas were being cut. Therefore, they went to the tribunal with that risk in mind.

Mr. Strang: Will the right hon. Gentleman acknowledge that the areas where livelihoods and jobs are being hit hardest by the quota policy do not have much of an alternative but to grow grass? As the farms are relatively small, they cannot therefore earn a decent income from beef or sheepmeat. Will the right hon. Gentleman do his best to protect those areas and bear that observation in mind, especially when considering the suggested free market in quotas?

Mr. Jopling: Bearing in mind the answer that I gave a few moments ago, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will acknowledge that I have tried to help the smaller farmer because of the difficulties created by milk quotas. I have always made it clear, both in the House and outside, that I am sympathetic towards the possibility of getting more flexibility into the transfer of milk quotas. I have always been attracted by the possibility of leasing quotas. I intend at a very early date to push that possibility with the Council of Ministers and with the Commission in Brussels.

Mr. Cockeram: Does my right hon. Friend accept that the doubts and lack of decision in the milk industry have gone on for too long and that it is time the tribunal and the quotas were finally clarified? Farmers cannot be expected to go on any longer not knowing their ultimate quota.

Mr. Jopling: Yes, I agree. The tribunal has virtually finished its work. We have almost reached the end of telling farmers what their secondary quotas are. As the House knows, there will be a cutback on wholesale awards in England and Wales, which we believe will be at least 35 per cent. I hope that we can get the matter tidied up shortly.

Mr. Nicholson: The right hon. Gentleman spoke earlier about helping small farmers. I remind him again that in Northern Ireland he has only 1 per cent. of what he required in the milk buy-out scheme, even after a second bite at the cherry to buy out further quota. How far along the road has he proceeded, and has he any solution to the problem?

Mr. Jopling: It is true that the take-up of the outgoers scheme has been a good deal less in Northern Ireland, and that has made it more difficult to meet the problems of the small farms there. We are giving urgent attention to that matter.

Mr. Ralph Howell: Can my right hon. Friend confirm that there is now a milk register in all the countries of the EC?

Mr. Jopling: I should not like to answer for some countries in the Community. I sometimes think that the responsibility for dealing with these matters in one country is enough for any man.

Mr. Home Robertson: What has been the good of running an elaborate scheme of appeal tribunals to assess the need for secondary quota if their recommendations have to be scaled down by 42·5 per cent. in Scotland and at least 35 per cent. in England and Wales? Will the Minister now accept the need for an expanded and more flexible outgoers scheme to provide a quota to satisfy the clearly proven need?

Mr. Jopling: We would not have needed a cutback on wholesale awards if I had originally made a larger cut than 9 per cent. on milk production at 1983 levels. I had to make a judgment at that time as to how much it was fair to add to the 6·15 per cent. cutback. I took the view that 2·5 per cent. was right. When I asked the National Farmers Union if it had a better figure in mind, it was unable to give me a more suitable figure, so I acted on my judgment.

Mr. Watson: Does my right hon. Friend accept, at least in principle, the need for greater transferability of quota between one farm and another, including, if necessary, a more reasonable system for the allocation of ownership of quota between tenants and landowners?

Mr. Jopling: I understand the problem to which my hon. Friend refers, and so did the NFU in its response to the consultation paper that we recently put out. But, in terms of what can be negotiated in Brussels, we are more likely to obtain progress on greater flexibility by moving towards leasing than by moving towards sale and purchase.

Norwegian Pout Fishery

4. Mr. Wallace asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps his Department is taking to monitor the Norwegian pout fishery in the North sea for the purpose of checking the percentage by-catch.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John MacGregor): The fisheries protection service, under the direction of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, has conducted extensive sampling of catches in the Norway pout fishery since October. Up to the end of February, 64 vessels had been boarded at sea, and the catches from a further 15 vessels had been checked on landing. Of the 79 vessels checked, 80 per cent. had less than a 10 per cent. by-catch of the species concerned, mainly haddock and whiting. Only one was over the 18 per cent. limit, and a successful prosecution resulted.

Mr. Wallace: The amount of monitoring that is going on will be recognised, but I am sure that the Minister will equally acknowledge that there is still a great sense of grievance in the fishing industry at the increased by-catch. I am sure he is aware that a boat, under the auspices of the Scottish Fishing Federation, is conducting its own monitoring exercise. If the result of that shows that damage is being done to white fish stocks by the current pout fishery, will he give due weight to that experiment and ensure that it increases his resolve to resist any extension of the present 18 per cent. by-catch rule beyond 31 May?

Mr. MacGregor: As the hon. Gentleman knows, we secured substantial changes in the proposal last year without any support whatever. If the proposal for an extension is put forward—and that is not known at this stage—it will have to be considered in the light of the monitoring of fisheries under the present rules and in the light of the latest scientific advice. Obviously, we shall look at all the evidence. Our paramount consideration, which is also the paramount interest of our fishermen, is to ensure that there is adequate protection of the juvenile component of the North sea white fish stocks.

Mr. Donald Stewart: I welcome the Minister's figures for current monitoring, but will he bear in mind that a 10 per cent. by-catch was presented to fishermen as the final settled common fisheries policy? The increase to 18 per cent. was regarded as a sell-out. It is therefore essential that no extension of that is permitted. If, as the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) suggests, there is any attempt to raise it, Scottish fishermen will make an unholy effort to obstruct that.

Mr. MacGregor: With regard to the common fisheries policy, I think that it has always been understood that changes can be made on conservation aspects. Last year I made it clear to the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) that I thought that United Kingdom fishermen were unlikely to suffer any reduction in their effective fishing opportunities, particularly in the fishing of whiting — which is what people were concerned about—as a result of the change. I think that that has proved to be so, because we did not reach our full whiting quota last year. We have managed to obtain a substantially increased whiting quota this year, which suggests that the conservation effects are not as people originally suggested. However, I shall certainly monitor the position very carefully.

Mr. Home Robertson: Does the Minister accept that it is vital that the edible fish stocks that have been re-established, largely as a result of sacrifices made by British fishermen, should be protected? In the light of the evidence which the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries in Scotland obtain, and in the light of that secured following the exercise carried out by the Scottish Fishing Federation, will the hon. Gentleman undertake to do everything possible to protect those fish stocks from over-fishing?

Mr. MacGregor: Yes, and I agree that the adequate protection of our stocks is a key consideration. That is one of the points that we shall have most in mind in approaching any changes within the common fisheries policy.

English Vineyards Association

6. Mr. Steen asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he last met the chairman of the English Vineyards Association; and what subjects were discussed.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mrs. Peggy Fenner): Ministers from this Department have not met the chairman of the English Vineyards Association, but this Department is in regular touch with the association.

Mr. Steen: I hope that my hon. Friend will arrange to meet the chairman of the English Vineyards Association. Is she aware that English wine comes from English grapes grown in the 200 or so commercial vineyards in this country, whereas the only thing British about British wine is the water added to imported syrup or grape must? When she meets the chairman, will she tell him what she intends to do to ensure that the British public are not continually deceived into thinking that they are being patriotic by buying British wine, just because of misleading wine labelling?

Mrs. Fenner: I must disagree with my hon. Friend in that respect. It is for local authorities and the courts to decide whether the public are being misled and whether labels comply with food labelling regulations and the Trade Descriptions Act. My hon. Friend will know that the labelling of British wine is covered by a voluntary code of practice to prevent confusion with English wine from English vineyards. The labels on British wine are marked, "Made from imported grape juice."

Sir Peter Mills: Does my hon. Friend realise that there is no wine lake in Devon, and that the growing of grapes might prove to be a good alternative crop while we have surpluses in other things? Just as we in Devon produce the finest cider, we might also produce some Chateau Devon.

Mrs. Fenner: In 1984, English wine production was about 1,350,000 litres from 325 hectares. Another 106 hectares have been planted out but are not yet producing. Perhaps my hon. Friend should be sorry that there are not any in Devon.

Surplus Food Stocks

7. Mr. Canavan asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the total volume and value of surplus food stocks currently held (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) in the European Economic Community as a result of the common agricultural policy.

Mr. MacGregor: On 28 February intervention stocks of beef, breadwheat, butter and skimmed milk powder in the United Kingdom were 321,820 tonnes, valued at their purchase price at some £450 million. On 30 November 1984 intervention stocks of these products and sugar held in the Community as a whole were 7,847,000 tonnes, valued on the same basis at £4·2 billion.

Mr. Canavan: Is it not an unforgivable crime against humanity for the British Government to support the policy of hoarding millions of tonnes of surplus food stocks while at the same time over 30 million people in more than 20 African countries are facing the threat of starvation? If the Government are too narrow-minded to give up membership of the Common Market rich man's club, will they at least consider taking emergency unilateral action to release more food stocks to help starving people in the Third world?

Mr. MacGregor: I hope the hon. Gentleman will agree that it is as a result of the very successful and effective efforts of British farmers that we have moved in 10 years from being a major net grain importer to being a major grain exporter. It is only that that has enabled us to contribute substantially to the food aid programme. The hon. Gentleman will know that substantial quantities of grain are supplied both by the Community and by the United Kingdom and that the European Council agreed in Dublin to provide 1·2 million tonnes of grain to the drought-stricken African countries before the next harvest. We have also done a good deal this year. The United Kingdom is playing a big part in both respects.

Mr. Body: Much as we may blame the common agricultural policy, does my hon. Friend agree that in this country we now have a whole range of national aids in the form of grants, subsidies and tax allowances, nearly all goading farmers into increasing output, whereas in the rest of the Common Market the national aids are directed in the main to other objectives, including helping smaller farmers and new entrants into farming?

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend should consider the changes that have been made in the capital grants scheme in the United Kingdom in the last two or three years, where considerable reductions have been made in the areas where there has been a surplus. He will also note that we have geared those changes so that we are helping and protecting the smaller farmer as against the larger farmer.

Mr. Andy Stewart: Can my hon. Friend assure us that if all the Members of Parliament who received cotton seeds this morning were to plant them, we would not have over-production of cotton?

Mr. MacGregor: I suspect that not many Members of Parliament have yet got as far as realising that they were in their postbags this morning, so I think I can give that assurance.

Mr. Geraint Howells: Has the Minister had any consultation with his counterparts in Europe about abolishing the intervention scheme for beef? Is he in favour of introducing a deficiency payment scheme similar to the one operating within the sheep industry to help beef producers and housewives?

Mr. MacGregor: Of course, the variable premium scheme achieves precisely that. I think the hon. Gentleman will know that we have made it clear that we shall put up just as stern a fight as we did last year to ensure the continuance of that scheme if we can possibly achieve it.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is preferable in some respcts to have surpluses of food, as we have in Europe, as opposed to deficits, as there are in some of the countries which the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) associates with and supports?

Mr. MacGregor: It is a sensible safeguard to have some surpluses and to have a system which ensures supplies to the consumer of commodities where production can vary from year to year. As I am sure my hon. Friend recognises, the problem is that our farming industry has been so successful in some commodities that we are in danger of having regular surpluses well beyond our requirements. It is to deal with that problem that we have to try to achieve reforms within the Community.

Mr. Deakins: Is the Minister aiming to increase or decrease cereal production in the Community in the coming year?

Mr. MacGregor: We are endeavouring to get a long-term realistic price policy so that producers can respond to market signals. That is why we have been arguing that we should go somewhat beyond what the Commission has been proposing this year and try to get a policy for a longer period than one year.

Sir Paul Hawkins: I appreciate my hon. Friend's tendency to try to help small farmers, but they do not receive the aids that small business men receive. Will my hon. Friend make more positive gestures to help small farmers whose difficulties in managing the grants——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is about the EC.

Sir Paul Hawkins: Perhaps my hon. Friend will answer on that basis.

Mr. MacGregor: I have had some experience of both aspects of the question. Within the European Comunity system specific aids go to small farmers, and here at home there is considerable concentration on the small farmer which is as extensive as that on small businesses in general.

Mr. John: Has the Department made an estimate of the stocks of cereal and livestock which will be surplus at the end of the decade, since 50 per cent. more beef and between 60 and 200 per cent. more cereal is now in storage?

Mr. MacGregor: That is difficult to estimate, because we do not know what changes will take place in the price review. An extensive review of policy generally is now taking place in the Commission. We shall have to await the outcome of that. It is clear that if we continue with the same policies that we have operated over recent years the stocks of both commodities will be too high.

Danish Fishing Allowance

8. Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to reduce the 18 per cent. by-catch allowance to Danish industrial fishing boats to 10 per cent. and then to 5 per cent.

Mr. MacGregor: The Council regulation which provides a derogation allowing a white fish by-catch of 18 per cent. subject to a limit of 8 per cent. on species other than whiting, when fishing for Norway pout in the northern and central divisions of the North sea will expire on 31 May 1985. The permitted white fish by-catch will then revert to 10 per cent. for all species unless a decision is taken to the contrary.

Mr. Mitchell: Does the Minister concede that the pout box is there to protect the breeding grounds and the young, immature white fish which could be caught up in industrial fishing? Does he agree that a by-catch of 18 per cent. is a threat to the stocks and to our fishing industry? Does he further accept that the increase in the quota from 10 per cent. — which was assumed by our industry to be an integral part of the common fisheries policy settlement —was rushed through by the Commission in a way in which we never rush through conservation provisions? Does the Minister therefore accept that not only must the by-catch limit be cut and properly policed, but that there is a case for ending industrial fishing altogether?

Mr. MacGregor: I do not think that the increase in quota was rushed through, because we argued about it for five months. As a result of those arguments we managed to agree on substantial changes, including better sampling techniques, to enable us to ensure more rigorous enforcement, as has happened this year. The key consideration is the conservation of the stocks. That is what we have most in mind, and that is what we shall be examining if another proposal is made.

One of the reasons why we did not receive as much support as we might have expected last year is that the evidence shows that the quantities of haddock and whiting discarded in human consumption fisheries in recent years equate to, and in some years exceed, the quantity taken as a by-catch in industrial fisheries.

United Kingdom Fishing Industry

9. Mr. Torney asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action he proposes to protect the United Kingdom fishing industry from the dangers to the industry resulting from the entry of Spain into the European Economic Community; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: The terms of Spanish entry into the Community are still under negotiation. We have so far been successful in maintaining a Community negotiating position on fisheries which safeguards the present balance of the common fisheries policy and the interests of the United Kingdom industry.

Mr. Torney: Is the Minister aware that the Spanish fishing fleet is larger than the whole of the Common Market fishing fleet put together? Is he further aware of the deep fear among British fishermen about what will happen to their catches and their livelihoods when Spain enters the Common Market? What action is the Minister taking to defend the British fishermen in the negotiations? Is his Department represented in the negotiations? What action will he take to reassure British fishermen?

Mr. Jopling: I agree that the problem is the size of the Spanish fishing fleet and the failure of the Spaniards so far to bring it into line with fishing opportunities. The hon. Gentleman should bear in mind that the bigger part of the Spanish fishing fleet operates, and will continue to operate, in third country waters away from the Community. It is in our interests to ensure that every encouragement is given to Spain to restructure its fleet. At the same time, we must consider the cost to the Community of achieving that.

Mr. Hicks: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the fishing industry in the south-west in particular feels very vulnerable, especially as in the past agreements on paper have not always existed in reality?

Mr. Jopling: If Spain and Portugal are to enter the Community, it is essential that we strengthen the existing policing and the inspectorate. The current exclusion of Spanish vessels from the Irish and Celtic seas—the so-called Irish box—in our view should continue for a long transitional period.

Dr. Godman: When the Secretary of State talks about the restructuring of the Spanish fleet, he is presumably talking about the reduction of the fleet. What is the likely reduction of that fleet; that is, the part of the fleet that can fish in European waters? Is the EC to give compensation to Spanish fishing interests, and will part of that compensation be given to Spanish fishermen whose employment disappears when their vessels tie up at the quay?

Mr. Jopling: I referred a few moments ago to the fact that in restructuring the Spanish fleet we shall have to consider what the cost will be to the Community. We are insisting that the numbers of Spanish vessels operating in waters of existing member states should remain subject to clear and enforceable limits for a very long period, if not for the full duration of the current common fisheries policy.

Mr. Kirkwood: Will the Minister give us an idea of the timetable for the negotiations which he is working on at the moment? Will he give us an assurance that if he cannot get a deal that is acceptable to the British industry he is prepared to block the accession deal?

Mr. Jopling: The Community's current position is that the basic transitional period should be 10 years, with a review in 1993. Transition could be ended before 10 years if the Council so agreed, but in the absence of specific decisions control arrangements would go forward for a further period, possibly up to another five years.

Mr. Forth: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that if satisfactory arrangements cannot be arrived at in this matter we will not accept the accession of Spain to the Community on unsatisfactory terms?

Mr. Jopling: As my hon. Friend will know, these are all matters that are currently within the negotiations. Following on the previous question, if it proved possible to agree satisfactory arrangements applying right up to the end of the present common fisheries policy in the year 2002, it would clearly be worth going for that if we cannot get a shorter agreement.

Mr. Mark Hughes: Will the Minister comment upon the decision by the European Assembly this morning that the Falklands and perhaps, consequentially, Ascension, Saint Helena, Martinique, Guadaloupe and every other part of the Community should have a 200-mile zone to buy off Spanish fishing resources in the eastern Atlantic?

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman will know that these matters do not come within my own departmental responsibility, but I will draw his comments to the attention of my right hon. Friend.

Meat Marketing Scheme

11. Mr. Maclean asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to be in a position to comment on the proposed changes to the meat marketing scheme.

Mr. MacGregor: Many of the recommendations in the recent review of meat promotion—I think that this is what my hon. Friend was referring to — which was carried out for the Meat and Livestock Commission by an independent review team concern the MLC's work and organisation. These are matters for the MLC to decide. A few involve the Government's responsibilities. On these we await an approach from the MLC in the light of its consultations with the industry interests concerned.

Mr. Maclean: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Given the controversy that the Webb report has already generated, does my hon. Friend think that agreement can be reached among the meat producers and others involved in the meat industry on the next steps to be taken? If so, when?

Mr. MacGregor: I know that the commission is seized of the need to make decisions as quickly as possible. The commission is anxious and keen to carry out the consultation procedure properly, and this takes time. I hope that the various interests can reach a broad measure of agreement—I am sure that my hon. Friend is with me on that point — with the MLC on any new arangements that would require parliamentary approval. We would need to have detailed discussion with the commission when the commission makes up its mind. I cannot, at this stage, say when that will be.

Sir Hector Monro: Does my hon. Friend agree that, in terms of meat production and consumption, it is essential that we continue with the beef premium, the suckler cow subsidy and the hill and livestock compensatory allowance, all of which are crucial to providing beef for the housewife in the short and long term?

Mr. MacGregor: As I have said to the House before, we entirely agree with my hon. Friend's point about the beef variable premium scheme. That is what we shall endeavour to achieve in the price review negotiations on which we have embarked. On the hill and livestock compensatory allowance my hon. Friend will know that we have recently completed agreement on the new structures programmes, and I see no reason why they should not continue.

Lamb and Beef Prices

12. Mrs. Kellett-Bowman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the average consumer price of lamb and beef in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Fenner: The prices of different cuts of meat vary widely. Information collected by the Department of Employment in the course of constructing the retail price index indicates that the price of a leg of home-killed lamb in January 1985 was 169·1p per lb, compared with 159·1 per lb a year ago. The price of chuck braising steak, for example, was 170p per lb in January 1985, compared with 168·5p per lb in January 1984.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. Ignoring the different cuts, and taking the average price per pound of a carcase of lamb, is it not true that the price of a pound of lamb is cheaper in this country than in any other country in Europe and that, similiarly, the price of a pound of beef is cheaper in Britain than in any other European country, except Holland? Is that not a tribute to the sheepmeat regime and the beef variable premium, which we must retain?

Mrs. Fenner: I agree with my hon. Friend that the beef and the sheepmeat variable premium schemes have helped to keep down the price of meat to the consumer. The schemes have benefited producers while reducing the need for costly intervention.

Mr. Maclennan: I recognise that the sheepmeat regime has given the consumer a good deal. Will the Government press strongly during the negotiations in Brussels to ensure that the seasonal scale of the sheepmeat regime is altered to the advantage of our farmers?

Mrs. Fenner: We are trying to do exactly that.

Mr. Home Robertson: Is the hon. Lady aware that the Minister's reply yesterday was less than totally reassuring about the Government's commitment to defend the beef variable premium and the sheepmeat regime? Since these measures are almost unique in the common agricultural policy, in that they are to the benefit of not only the producer but the consumer, may we have a cast-iron guarantee that they will be retained?

Mrs. Fenner: The hon. Gentleman could not have been listening. My hon. Friend the Minister of State has already said today that we shall be pressing strongly for the retention of the beef variable premium scheme.

British Food Quality Mark

13. Mr. Gale asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his policy on the new British food quality mark scheme recently launched by the Food from Britain organisation.

Mrs. Fenner: The Government welcome this important marketing initiative on the part of British food producers. It shows that they understand the importance of achieving high standards of quality.

Mr. Gale: Will my hon. Friend give every encouragement to an increase in the portfolio of goods carrying the mark? Will she pay particular attention to the excellent quality of fruit and vegetables available from the county of Kent?

Mrs. Fenner: My hon. Friend will know that I have a slight bias towards the county of Kent. The Government have a commitment of £14 million during the first five years. The long-term success of Food from Britain will depend also on the support that it receives from industry.

Mr. John: Does the Minister recognise that the other St. Michael has already given the scheme the thumbs down by saying that it is not good enough for Marks and Spencer? Will she have urgent consultations to see that the scheme truly raises standards in this country?

Mrs. Fenner: I believe that it truly raises standards. The other St. Michael has exceptionally high standards.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Does the Minister accept that many countries to which we export food rightly insist upon more information about the content of the food being provided, and that she should now insist on it in view of the announcement that she made at a press conference a few days ago? Will she again consider nutritional food labelling to improve the information given to British people as well as those abroad?

Mrs. Fenner: We are discussing nutritional food labelling with the food industry. We do not intend to make it mandatory, as with fat labelling, but we should like to see a format specified by regulation so that it can be recognised by the consumer.

PRIME MINISTER

Public Service Broadcasting

Q1. Mr. Key asked the Prime Minister if she is satisfied with the arrangements for financing of public service broadcasting; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): The current BBC licence fee application will be settled on the basis of the present arrangements. As far as the longer term is concerned, I have made it absolutely clear that we do not rule out the possibility of changes.

Mr. Key: While thanking my right hon. Friend for her answer, may I ask whether she agrees that it is important to bear in mind that there are already a large number of pensioners and low income households which find it hard to pay the existing fee? Will she also resist calls to fund the BBC out of general taxation, which would remove its independence and tend to put it in the hands of the Government of the day?

The Prime Minister: I understand my hon. Friend's anxiety about increases in the licence fee. He will be aware of the recent Peat Marwick Mitchell report, which suggested a number of improvements in efficiency, which my right hon. and learned Friend will be taking into account before he makes his decision. I have no intention of putting the BBC's licence fee, or any part of it, on to the general body of taxpayers.

Mr. Fauld: Is not the flaw in the right hon. Lady's policies that she knows the price of everything but is unaware of the value of anything?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman should address his remarks to the BBC.

Mr. Brinton: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the main problem which the BBC and the Government face with the BBC's request for an increase, which many of us regard as excessive, is that the BBC has failed to address itself to the question—let alone attempted the answer—as to what the licence payer should be expected to pay for in 1985 in these days of multi-choice broadcasting? Will she consider a wide-ranging inquiry into the whole future of public service broadcasting?

The Prime Minister: I understand my hon. Friend's anxiety. The BBC's licence fee is in the nature of a compulsory levy on people who have television sets. I have taken note of his other suggestions.

Engagements

2. Mr. Martin asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 March.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today, including one with President Mubarak of Egypt.

Mr. Martin: During the course of the Prime Minister's busy day, will she consider the problems at the Springburn British Rail engineering workshop, where the work force is to be reduced from 1,500 to 500? Since the turn of the year about three major redundancies have been announced in my constituency and some young people are even getting married without ever having had a decent job. Will she come to Springburn and tell us that her policies are working?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the amount of work for British Rail workshops has diminished as changes in the business on the railways and in the type of equipment which they use occur. With regard to his wider question, we are doing everything that we can to increase the youth training scheme and to give more young people technical training so that they may be better able to find jobs.

Q3. Mrs. Peacock asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. Peacock: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Kirklees metropolitan district council appears to be misguided when, having given away £35,000 to support striking miners, it now finds it necessary to increase the rates by 35 per cent. to save local authority jobs, given that that will put in jeopardy many jobs in my local industries?

The Prime Minister: Such a rate increase puts an enormous burden on small businesses especially, because it has to go on to their costs and therefore on to their prices. That makes them less competitive and can deprive the area of jobs. It is also an enormous increase for domestic ratepayers.

Mr. Kinnock: I know that the Prime Minister will share my concern and that of millions of other people about the increase in crimes such as mugging and robbery, the increase in drug-taking and the acts of hooliganism such as those last night, which horrified the people of Luton and the whole country. Since concern clearly is not enough, what is the right hon. Lady's personal view of the main causes of these afflictions of society?

The Prime Minister: It is not for me to give a personal view on that. The crime figures for 1984 show that there has been a large overall increase in the number of notifiable offences recorded. This is in spite of the increased police manpower and better training and equipment.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to what happened last night on the football field. There is a question on the Order Paper which my hon. Friend the Minister responsible for sport will answer at the end of Question Time. However, I will comment on sentences. There was extremely important guidance from the Court of Appeal. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has made it clear—and he has been supported by the Court of Appeal—that sentences that fail to reflect society's abhorrence of serious crime can undermine public confidence in our criminal justice system.

Mr. Kinnock: I am sure that the Prime Minister was not trying intentionally to evade my question. The problems of breakdown in behaviour are so great that none of us can simply watch them increase. Everyone, most of all the House of Commons and everyone in it, must have a direct opinion on what are the main causes. Does the right hon. Lady agree that we need action to identify and deal with the causes of these afflictions and the breakdown in behaviour in society? Does she agree, further, that asking the police and the courts to bear even greater burdens is no answer and that issuing yet another White Paper undertaking yet another inquiry is no answer for the old who are frightened, for parents who are anxious and for young people who have to grow up in this society?

With those considerations in mind, will the Prime Minister engage in activities to get at the root causes of these problems so that we can arrive at the right cures to them? I assure her that if she undertakes — [HON. MEMBERS: "Too long."] This is a basic matter of national concern. It deserves a real response. If the right hon. Lady is prepared to take action to get at the causes, I assure her that she will have the full co-operation of the Opposition in taking steps to provide the cures.

The Prime Minister: As the right hon. Gentleman will be aware, there have been many theses and inquiries into the causes of crime. Despite all of them, crime has increased under all Governments and in all countries. The causes vary from lack of parental discipline and lack of teacher discipline to background—in fact, to everything. Having said that, it is not exactly easy to cure it. We have to tackle it by way of increased numbers of police and increased equipment. I believe that what the Court of Appeal said in the case of R. v. Wood in January 1984 is very true:

"It seems to us, that the time has come for the courts to impose sentences which may deter those who are minded to use violence at or near football grounds."

Mr. Kinnock rose——

Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Kinnock: This is a national problem, which faces us all. It requires national answers that involve us all. The right hon. Lady is still talking about symptoms. What will she do about the causes? Why will she not accept offers of help in identifying those causes and in curing the problem?

The Prime Minister: When one has said that contributory causes are family background, parental discipline and teachers' discipline, it does not help to solve the problem. It may help the right hon. Gentleman to get through Question Time, but it does not help in solving the problem.

Sir Edward Gardner: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, when dealing with punishment for serious crime, there must be a distinction between offences which do not involve violence and offences which do involve violence? Does she agree that for offences involving violence, only in rare cases should the offender escape imprisonment?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. and learned Friend, and I believe that that is what the Court of Appeal was saying in the case that I cited.

Mr. Donald Stewart: Will the right hon. Lady take time to consider the fact that a rating revaluation is taking place in Scotland for the second time and that there has been no similar revaluation in England? As this means a 17 per cent. increase in rates—almost four times the rate of inflation—and is defended by the Secretary of State for Scotland on the ground that it will protect Scottish ratepayers, to avoid an unfair advantage being given to one part of the United Kingdom will she order its postponement until similar protection is offered to English ratepayers?

The Prime Minister: As the right hon. Gentleman is aware, the system for revaluation is different in Scotland from that in England. Had I interfered, he would have been the first to complain.

Q4. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 14 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Has my right hon. Friend seen the alternative Budget proposals put forward by the deputy leader of the Labour party, in which he calls for a 98 per cent. maximum rate of taxation and describes his proposals as penal? Does she agree that the Labour party has learnt nothing and forgotten nothing during its six years in opposition?

The Prime Minister: Yes, Sir. Now we have it directly from the Labour party that it wishes to reimpose penal taxation rates up to 98 per cent. That is confiscation. It is a tax on enterprise and initiative and it will not help the country, jobs or industry to recover.

Q5. Mr. Marshall asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Marshall: Further to the question of the right hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart), is the Prime Minister completely unaware of the outrage felt in Scotland about revaluation? Will she now instruct the Secretary of State for Scotland to postpone the revaluation either until he carries out his promise to reform the rating system or until revaluation takes place in the rest of Britain?

The Prime Minister: The difficulty that arises from revaluation is the variation between the amounts raised from industrial and commercial ratepayers and those raised from domestic ratepayers. That is only a small part of the problem. The real problem is the high rate of expenditure and the comparatively few domestic ratepayers. That means that rates are not a proper tax on the accountability of the local authority.

Q6. Mr. Colvin asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Colvin: Will my right hon. Friend find time today to confirm that teachers' pay has increased by 9 per cent. ahead of prices since 1979, and that if we wish to improve what is currently on offer to individual teachers the way to do so is to reward merit, which would involve not paying any more to those teachers who deny children examination opportunities and who also threaten schools for the handicapped, 10 of which are under serious threat?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend that teachers' pay should be restructured to take into account performance and success in teaching children, which, after all, is the fundamental job. I agree also in condemning some of the strikes that there will be this week and next week that affect special schools. That is one of the most despicable and disgraceful things that a teacher can do. For example, this week teachers are on strike at a boarding school for 300 partially sighted children, among others. That is disgraceful.

European Community (Agricultural Prices)

The following questions stood upon the Order Paper:

2. Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the European Commission's latest agricultural price proposals and package; and if he will make a statement on the progress made to date by the Council of Agriculture Ministers in considering those proposals.

5. Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the latest position regarding the progress of the Common Market price negotiations.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Michael Jopling): I refer the hon. Members to the reply I gave yesterday to my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Sir P. Mills) on the outcome of the meeting of the Council of Agriculture Ministers earlier this week.

Mr. Strang: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the announcement that the Council is prepared to fund the conservation of wildlife in our rural areas is welcome in principle? Can we have an assurance that we shall have an end to the payments under management agreement that involve paying out large sums of money to landowners, on some occasions indefinitely, not to plough up land or do something else to it that they have no intention of doing anyway? Will he give us an assurance that money is not being used for that purpose?

Mr. Jopling: The intention of this power, which we have been given with the blessing of the Council of Ministers and the Commission, is to ensure that where traditional forms of agriculture are endangered they can be preserved. I do not know what the hon. Gentleman is going on about. I remember that, at the end of the time when the Labour Government were in power, they attempted to take legislative steps to do the same thing on Exmoor.

Mr. Latham: Why did yesterday's long answer contain no suggestion that Ministers intend to press for the total abolition of the milk co-responsibility levy? Has not this impost long since lost all meaning with the new quota regime?

Mr. Jopling: I have always made it very clear to the Council of Ministers and the House that I believe that if it is the intention to help dairy farmers a much better way to do so is by reducing the co-responsibility levy — which is ineffective — rather with giving them price increases.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): With regard to the environmental aspect of the Minister's statement, as we shall have to enact legislation to obtain EC money, and as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and her colleagues defeated clause 4 of my Private Member's Bill, which would have permitted that, will the Minister accept my invitation to reinstate clause 4 on Report?

Mr. Jopling: I understand that the Committee, for what I believe are extremely good reasons, decided to delete a clause from the hon. Gentleman's Private Member's Bill and it is not intended to reinstate it. He is mistaken, because the provision that was agreed on Tuesday in Brussels does not envisage, at this stage, Community money being available for these projects, although the Commission has agreed to examine within the coming months the ways in which this scheme can be brought more broadly within the Community system.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): Does my right hon. Friend agree that we are clearly moving away from the policy objectives of the past 20 years, aimed at maximising production? Would it not be helpful to the farming community if my right hon. Friend could state, within the context of the CAP negotiations, what exactly are his policy objectives and those of his Department and farming generally in this country?

Mr. Jopling: I have made the Government's policy objectives on the current price-fixing clear. I hope that I shall have another opportunity to explain them soon. We shall hear what my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House says shortly. My hon. Friend is right ; we are no longer looking for maximum production. We have major, damaging and expensive surpluses. The Government want a new sense of realism in the CAP so that the growth of those surpluses can be controlled properly.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): In respect of that realism, does the Minister agree that the first possible date for evaluating the effect of the disciplinary system on agricultural prices cannot be before March 1987, because the first crop year to which it will apply is 1986-87?

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman is right to mention the new feature of our negotiation, which is covered by the budgetary discipline and financial guidelines agreed at Fontainebleau. Those powers and constraints became effective for the first time on Tuesday in Brussels with regard to the new structures directive. We were given guidance by the ECOFIN Council to keep within 5·25 billion ecu. We succeeded.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Would my right hon. Friend like to take this opportunity to tell his partners in the Community that he will not accept the package of measures, which alter significantly the nature or the level of the beef variable premium scheme? If he is not prepared to do that, does he realise that many farmers will be deeply worried?

Mr. Jopling: My hon. Friend has heard me say outside the Chamber in the past 24 hours that we shall do everything possible to attain the continuance of the beef variable premium scheme.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): What additional resources will be put into the British hills and upland sector as a result of the structures package?

Mr. Jopling: The new structures package gives a scheme which runs another five years after the previous five-year scheme. It is business as usual for assistance that can be drawn on for hills and uplands.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle (Lincoln): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his efforts to win CAP money for the conservation of the countryside and its protection merit praise? Will he persevere in those efforts and carry them through to success?

Mr. Jopling: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's kind words. It is our continuing objective to get Community money as part of these schemes. At the moment, the arrangement is that they can be funded only nationally. I assure my hon. Friend that we shall continue in our endeavours.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that clause 4 of the Wildlife and Countryside (Amendment) Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) is indistinguishable from the stance that the right hon. Gentleman has negotiated in the Community? If he agrees, why does he not accpet clause 4? By rejecting it, he is merely undermining the agreement that he has negotiated and which the public relations people in his Department have spent the past 24 hours advocating as a great win for the British Government.

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman might not think that this is a successful move, but many conservation bodies throughout the country have applauded it warmly and welcomed what we have achieved. As for the clause that the hon. Gentleman mentioned, I invite him to go away and read what my hon. Friend the Minister said on Second Reading, and the rest of the debate. He will see that there are two quite separate issues here and that the reasons for voting out the clause were extremely good.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): Following the supplementary question of my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg), may I ask whether my right hon. Friend is aware that there is considerable anxiety about people in Israeli-occupied territories, such as the citrus growers of Gaza, being denied access to the EEC for their produce while Israel, which goes rampaging around the middle east, appears to enjoy favourable terms? Will my right hon. Friend examine that matter personally?

Mr. Jopling: As my hon. Friend will know, the conduct of the negotiations for the enlargement of the Community is not my direct ministerial responsibility, but I shall draw his remarks to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary.

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): Is the Minister prepared to use his veto in the Council of Agriculture Ministers, if, as seems highly likely, that Council, by a majority, decides to increase agriculture prices in the coming year far in excess of those recommended by the European Commission, and in defiance of the financial guidelines that have been recommended in the House?

Mr. Jopling: I have made my position clear, which is that I believe that there should be price restraint at this time. I have given general support to the Commission's proposals and, indeed, I have said that in some cases price reductions should be even more stringent. With regard to talking about vetoes, I am not prepared to conduct negotiations with the hon. Gentleman in the Chamber.

Mr. Brynmor John (Pontypridd): Reverting to the structures agreement, the principles of which we agree, does the right hon. Gentleman accept that only when we see how much money is spent can we judge whether the welcome that was given overnight is justified? Is it true that we shall need primary legislation even for the national power that we now have to deal with the environment and farming? If that is true, what legislative vehicle will the right hon. Gentleman use? He has told my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) that he will not use my hon. Friend's Bill. What legislation will he bring forward, and when will it be brought forward, so that we may have some actual results? How much money will the right hon. Gentleman spend on that national initiative? May I finally ask him about the Community examination? Has the Community now agreed in principle—and, in particular, has the Commission agreed — that Community money should be expended on the environment, or is it merely a cursory examination, to be rejected at the end of the year?

Mr. Jopling: With regard to the money available for the structures directive, the hon. Gentleman might like to know that the Commission's original proposals were that it would cost over 8 billion ecu and we have now fitted those provisions within a budget of 5·25 billion ecu. Therefore, that is a move towards realism. We believe that it is likely that we shall need primary legislation to bring about the environmental provisions. We are not yet able to do so, and, of course, it will ultimately depend on the views of the House, in dealing with legislation, as to how much money will need to be available. With regard to the environmental schemes, the hon. Gentleman will realise that we are already using part of the funds from my Department in an experimental scheme in the Broads.

Luton Football Match (Crowd Violence)

3.42 pm

Mr. Graham Bright (Luton, South) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the crowd violence and rioting in Luton yesterday which coincided with the football match between Luton and Millwall.

The Parliamentary-Under Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Neil Macfarlane): I have already discussed last night's violence with the chief executives of the two clubs concerned. We need to establish all the facts. There is to be an inquiry by the Football Association, and my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has asked the chief constable of Bedfordshire for a report. It would be wrong for me to prejudge those reports. As a separate matter, at the request of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, I am calling for a report from the Football Association within a week on what action it intends to take to deal with those clubs some of whose followers have a history of violence. When that report is available, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister intends to meet the officers of the Football Association.

Mr. Bright: Does my hon. Friend agree that when clubs have a track record of violence, which is the case with Millwall, adequate provision should be made to forestall trouble, preferably by means of ticket only matches, which unfortunately was not the case yesterday? Does my hon. Friend further agree that there should be much more co-operation, in that clubs should give information of the number of supporters who are likely to go to away matches? I understand that in this case there was some under-estimation. Will my hon. Friend do whatever he can to urge magistrates to dish out some jolly good punishments to those who were arrested yesterday, and will he join me in offering condolences to all those policemen who were severely injured?

Mr. Macfarlane: I certainly wish to associate myself and my hon. Friends with the sentiments expressed in the latter part of my hon. Friend's question. Sentencing procedures are a matter for individual courts, and my hon. Friend will not expect me to be drawn on that point.

My hon. Friend's point about the importance of appraisal before each match was graphically illustrated in my letter of 3 February 1983 to all 92 professional league football club chairmen. I said that this would require "careful and detailed preparation and planning, especially with the police. This will involve a rigorous on-site assessment by both clubs well in advance of all matches involving sides with a history of violence by a minority of their supporters."

I must now establish the facts, together with my right hon. and learned Friend, to find out exactly what went wrong with that pre-match planning because it seems to me to be the most important element in all these types of activities.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): Is my hon. Friend aware that last night I attended the Luton-Millwall match and that consequently I was prevented from returning to the House to vote on a three-line Whip? I witnessed scenes which can only be described as terrifying. Is my hon. Friend aware that my constituents are very angry about the destruction of their homes, their shops, their town and their football club? They demand nothing less than revenge on those who inflicted that damage.

Is my hon. Friend aware that urgent consultations must take place between him and the Home Secretary—I am sorry that the Home Secretary is not in his place this afternoon — on the question of harsher and stiffer penalties? Is he also aware that the only way to deal with these hooligans is to inflict upon them the physical pain which they last night so readily inflicted upon others? Does my hon. Friend appreciate that the time for talking, commissions and inquiries is over and that we must take action?

Mr. Macfarlane: I must point out that my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office, who is responsible for the police force, is sitting with me on the Front Bench. I am grateful for that. I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) has underlined the anxieties which many people in many cities now feel as a result of the activities of a minority of so-called football followers.

As for individual assessment by the courts, my hon. Friend must not expect me, from my Department, to be responsible for the conduct of those sentencing policies. They are very much a matter for the magistrates. But his comments will no doubt be noted outside the House. I well understand my hon. Friend's anxieties. That is why I am not conducting another inquiry. During the past few years there have been many inquiries and conferences. I am conducting an urgent appraisal of what went wrong yesterday evening and am endeavouring to find out what took place.

Mr. Joseph Ashton (Bassetlaw): Why was it that the National Coal Board did not have to pay for the police on the picket lines, while football clubs have to pay for policing inside football grounds? Is the Minister aware that this problem will not be overcome until there is proper crowd control and proper segregation, for which most clubs cannot afford to pay? The Chancellor of the Exchequer takes 42p in every pound by means of the football pools betting duty, which brings £200 million a year into the Exchequer. When will the Government use some of that money to enforce law and order inside football grounds and protect the spectators?

Mr. Macfarlane: Money from that source is used to enforce law and order inside football grounds and protect spectators. In recent years there has frequently been a subsidy to cover the cost of policing inside football grounds. I hope that the Football Trust, which has presented the better part of £20 million to football over the last 10 years, can play its part. I welcome what it has done so far.

The hon. Gentleman referred to police duties both outside and inside football grounds. I must remind him that the cost of policing is a matter for the football authorities and the individual clubs to decide with the local police force.

Mr. Rob Hayward (Kingswood): Is my hon. Friend aware that the last city which Millwall supporters broke up was Bristol, particularly causing severe damage to the Bristol, South constituency, represented by the Opposition's Chief Whip, and that the general view now held in Bristol is that it is about time the Government took action? It is no use my hon. Friend saying that the Government are asking for action from the Football Association. The Government have the power, as they proved during the coal strike, to take action against people intent on violence.

Mr. Macfarlane: There is a joint responsibility in which, as I have acknowledged over the years, the Government have a part to play. But the umbrella organisation — the Football Association — and the Football League and the individual clubs also have a major role in all the activities.

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridgeshire, North-East): In view of the previous question and Millwall's reputation for having violent supporters, does the Minister agree that there is no excuse for the police being as unprepared as they were yesterday? Does he accept that there is a relationship between the convenience of a sports ground and the behaviour of supporters? Will he do something to allow sports grounds to make their pitches more agreeable places to visit?

Mr. Macfarlane: I understand the hon. Gentleman's concern, and that is something at which we shall be looking closely in the light of the chief constable's report. We must find out what discussions took place between the two clubs and the police force responsible for policing in the Luton area last night.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): I thank my hon. Friend for his prompt action in calling for reports from the Football Association and the police as a result of this disgraceful affair which some might call sport. Will he give serious consideration to banning the sale of alcohol at English football grounds? The impact of that in Scotland has dramatically reduced crowd misbehaviour, and he should think seriously about bringing in legislation now.

Mr. Macfarlane: I am well aware of the success that has been achieved in Scotland as a result of the inclusion of that ban in legislation. The interdepartmental working group of the four Departments of State which wrote up the report on football spectator violence last year acknowleded that. I can only hope that if legislation is to be introduced at some future stage, in the interim clubs will not fail to remove alcohol from sale inside and outside the stadium.

Mr. Roger Stott (Wigan): The Minister will probably not be aware that my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) and I were at St. Pancras station at 4.10 pm yesterday, and that even at that early time there were at least 200 or 300 Millwall supporters, most of whom were drunk and many of whom were throwing beer over passengers, behaving in a loutish, hooligan fashion and terrorising most of the people on the platform. It was fairly obvious to those at St. Pancras last night that if that lot got on a train and were deposited at Luton there was bound to be trouble.

If it is possible for the Government to assemble a large police force to stop striking miners from going to persuade their colleagues in Nottingham or others on picket lines, it should have been possible for the police to turn out at Luton last night and prevent some of those hooligans from getting off the train and doing what they did to the constituents of the hon. Member for Luton, South (Mr. Bright).

Mr. Macfarlane: That is a matter for close co-operation between the transport police and the county constabulary. That is one of the things I shall want to look at closely. I accept the deep distress that many must have suffered, but that is not an isolated matter. We have to look at many things and that is one of the things that we shall consider in the report on spectator violence. I hope to make an announcement shortly.

Mr. Mark Carlisle (Warrington, South): Does my hon. Friend agree that what happened last might is not the Government's responsibility, nor that of the clubs, but is that of individuals who involve themselves in blatant criminal behaviour? Will he make it clear that society as a whole requires and expects that those who behave in that way will be severely dealt with?

Mr. Macfarlane: Yes, I certainly underline my right hon. and learned Friend's comments. Over the past three or four years we have emphasised and underlined that aspect. That is why in 1982 we passed the Criminal Justice Act, which provides a range of new sentencing powers, and they must be used.

Mr. Denis Howell (Birmingham, Small Heath): Why has the Minister's statement today referred to the responsibility of everybody else but not of the Government? As the Minister has been saying throughout the day that last night's problems and last week's problems in Chelsea were in every way predictable, why is he taking initiatives today which he should have taken last week?

Where is the Home Secretary in all this, especially as he has special responsibility for the metropolitan area, which includes Chelsea and Milwall? Why has he been impotent and silent in the past few months, when this problem has been gathering momentum once more? What resources do the Government intend to provide in the form of financial assistance to grounds to make them safe?

As the Home Secretary and the Prime Minister mobilised the entire national police force to deal with the miners' strike, why do they not do the same to deal with these rampaging mobs, which are a national scandal? Will the hon. Gentleman point out to the Football Association that, although we have every sympathy with football and the clubs concerned, we expect severe action over the clubs around which these criminals mobilise their activitives?

During the past year I have twice stated—and my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition did so again during Prime Minister's Question Time—that this is a national problem that requires a national solution. On behalf of the Opposition I have offered the Government every support in introducing new legislation to take effective action and have offered to make our experience available to the Government, so why have they not responded in any way?

Mr. Macfarlane: That is an astonishing series of comments from the right hon. Gentleman. Many of these problems took root during his 11 years of office. He well understands some of them, so it ill behoves him to start making criticisms about lack of action. The Government have always tackled this problem seriously, in partnership with the football authorities. It must be tackled in partnership with them. In 1982, before the World Cup, I set up a liaison group with the Football Association and the other interested bodies. I also circulated in 1983 the blueprint of precautions to be taken by the 92 league clubs.

[Mr. Macfarlane]

Last year, in consultation with the 23 other Council of Europe Ministers, I created the European agreement. Many of those proposals are working.

However, we must find out what went wrong last night and last week, and why the problem is largely confined to London. I shall leave no stone unturned to ensure that the game retains itself as Britain's foremost sport.

Mr. Kinnock: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. As many hon. Members on both sides of the House will want to take part in Monday's debate on the NHS limited list, the Government's decision not to provide a full day's debate for the motions is quite unjustified. Will the right hon. Gentleman give the matter further consideration so that the interest in that issue can be fully reflected in a whole day's debate?

Last week the right hon. Gentleman agreed that the proposed closure of one third of Britain's network of skillcentres was an important topic for debate in the House. Is he yet in a position to say when that debate is likely to take place in Government time?

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that 50 directors of the major theatres in Britain met this week to pass a vote of no confidence in Arts Council policies? In view of that, and of the many other expressions of genuine concern, will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that the Government provide time for a debate in the House on the multiple problems now facing theatres, and the arts in general, as a direct consequence of Government policies?

Can the right hon. Gentleman assure the House that there will be a debate on foreign affairs in Government time in the near future?

Mr. Biffen: I note what the right hon. Gentleman has said about Monday's debate on the National Health Service limited list. Of course, since he makes the request, that must be a matter for further consideration through the usual channels. As things are planned, the debate can run until midnight. I hope that, on reflection, he will be persuaded that that is just and equitable.

As to a debate on skillcentres, I am unable to elaborate on what I said last week. The right hon. Gentleman will appreciate that this is the time of the Budget which takes up a great deal of immediate parliamentary time.

I note the right hon. Gentleman's comments upon the Arts Council policies and the excitement they have caused among certain elements. Since most of the problems that affect the arts world are attributed to the mean-mindedness of the Treasury, it is possible that they will feature in the debates following the Budget.

I take account of what the right hon. Gentleman said about the necessity for a debate on foreign affairs. In the context of the recent change in the leadership of the Soviet Union, it would be appropriate to have such a debate, and I hope to arrange it fairly soon.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): When will we get a statement on the bid for the House of Fraser company? Is it not desperately unfair to Lonrho that its bid some time ago was referred immediately to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission while consideration of a bid by some strange Egyptians has been delayed while they mop up shares in the market?

Mr. Biffen: I hope my hon. Friend will appreciate that I should like to give him a tentative rather than an authoritative reply. I believe it will be indicated this afternoon that the bid now on offer will be allowed to proceed and that the constraints upon Lonrho have been lifted.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Is the Leader of the House aware that last week 15 local authorities in England were unable to set a rate for the forthcoming financial year because of the rate-capping legislation that was forced through the House and the damage that that legislation and the cuts it will impose would do to those communities, one of which is the borough I represent in the House? Is the right hon. Gentleman further aware that yesterday, on behalf of all the rate-capped authorities that have been unable to set a rate——

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): Unwilling.

Mr. Corbyn: —Councillor David Blunkett, the leader of Sheffield council, wrote to the Secretary of State for the Environment asking for a meeting collectively of those authorities with the Government so that the Government's response to the massive support in those communities could be made publicly and openly? Does he not believe that there should be an urgent debate on this key area of Government attacks on the poorest people in the country?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman presented the case that those authorities were unable to set a rate. He was interrupted by my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg), who said that they were unwilling to do so. My hon. Friend was right in his analysis of the situation. No provision has been made for such a debate next week. Since the matter refers to an authority which is also part of the constituency of the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn), he might try to push his initiative with an Adjournment debate.

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): In view of the importance, both to the providers of financial assistance and to prospective investors, of the recent White Paper on investor protection, can the Leader of the House confirm that we can expect a debate on the White Paper before legislation is introduced in the next parliamentary Session? Can he say when that debate is likely to take place?

Mr. Biffen: It would certainly be desirable that there should be a debate on the White Paper before we proceeded with legislation, but I fear that I cannot be specific about the likely date.

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, East): Is not the latest outburst of crowd violence at soccer matches an indication of the general discontent in society? Is it not a fact that our young people are being brought up in a land of no hope? May we have an early debate on the whole question as it affects society?

Mr. Biffen: There are many football clubs in major urban areas which suffer social deprivation which have a spotless record on the behaviour of their supporters. I do not think we should make easy generalisations about the topic. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that it is a matter of real interest. I take note of the request for a debate, although I cannot take the matter further this afternoon.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I make few demands upon my right hon. Friend. Will he give further thought to the request by the Leader of the Opposition for a full-day debate on the limited list? It is of great interest to many hon. Members in all parts of the House.

With regard to requests that have been made before, will my right hon. Friend find time for an early debate upon the Public Accounts Committee report on the De Lorean affair, in which I have a personal interest, and also on the Silberston report and the need for the House to have a full debate so that Ministers may be aware of the views of the House on the need to renew the multi-fibre arrangement?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend may not think that he makes many demands upon me. His good opinion is something I for ever nurse, albeit mostly in vain. He would not expect me to go further in response to him than I have done in response to the Leader of the Opposition on the debate on the limited list, but it is an important point.

With regard to the De Lorean debate, I gave an indication that we were looking forward to such a debate when I made the business statement last week.

As to the point about the multi-fibre arrangement, I note my hon. Friend's interest in the topic, but again I cannot go beyond what I said last week.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): With regard to Monday's limited list debate, is the Leader of the House aware that in evidence to the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments on Tuesday this week an official of the Department of Health and Social Security openly admitted that the Scottish list was completely inadequate because it had been drawn up in a hurry? That being the case, does the Leader of the House—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I am grateful for the support; it is uncharacteristic. Does the Leader of the House think it reasonable to ask the House to approve the Scottish list when the DHSS itself is admitting that the list is wrong?

Mr. Biffen: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising the point. It is one of substance. So that we may have numerical perspective, I should point out that we are talking about a difference between the list for England and Wales, on the one hand, and the Scottish list, on the other, of approximately three items out of something like 6,000. I shall draw the point to the attention of the relevant Minister so that he may deal with it in Monday's debate.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): Will my right hon. Friend's acute political antennae tell him that Monday's debate on the limited list may proceed more smoothly if the Secretary of State starts by announcing details of an appeal procedure which on Tuesday he half hinted he had in mind?

Mr. Biffen: I shall make certain that my right hon. Friend is apprised of that point.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the House that there is to be another statement and then two important debates, which must end at 10 o'clock. I ask hon. Members to put their questions briefly. I shall do my best to call them all.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): In view of the extensive effort of Home Office Ministers to rubbish the report of the Commission for Racial Equality on immigration control, can the Leader of the House give a clear assurance that he intends to provide time for the findings and recommendations in the report to be debated in the House?

Mr. Biffen: I shall certainly consider that as something appropriate for discussion through the usual channels.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): Will my right hon. Friend accept that the football violence that we have been experiencing is the responsibility of three Departments — Transport, the Department of the Environment and the Home Office? I believe that the House is entitled to a full debate on the subject because it is of national importance. Many of us close to Football League clubs feel that we have an input. We have read all the reports and statements. None of them is impressive. We feel that we could add to them, and we should like an opportunity to do so.

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) has already asked about the possibility of a debate on the subject and I take to heart the fact that his voice is joined by that of my hon. Friend. I give no undertaking, but I note the interest in the topic.

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside): Will the Leader of the House consult the Foreign Secretary about early-day motion 504, which deals with military manoeuvres in south Korea?

[That this House condemns the Team Spirit 1985 manoeuvres in South Korea which include the mobilisation of 200,000 troops from the United States of America and South Korea; believes that these moves destroy the dialogue which was instituted between North and South Korea by talks on the peaceful re-unification of the Peninsula; and calls upon Her Majesty's Government to support tripartite talks to achieve this objective.]

This Government's policy, like the previous Government's, is to support the peaceful reunification of Korea. The current war games have stopped the dialogue between the north and south of Korea and have caused tension in that part of the world.

Mr. Biffen: I shall draw the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary to that motion.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his flexibility in rearranging Monday's business so that we may have a five-hour debate on the limited list is welcome? When can we expect to consider the Report stage of the Social Security Bill?

Mr. Biffen: I cannot say. The importance of that legislation is fully recognised. I hope that I will be able to give some hopeful news soon.

Mr. James Lamond (Oldham, Central and Royton): Now that the Prime Minister is scrambling aboard the peace and disarmament bandwagon, why does not the Leader of the House do himself some much needed good by inviting the right hon. Lady to make regular statements to the House about how the various peace talks in Stockholm, Vienna, Geneva and elsewhere are progressing? Why does he not encourage the right hon. Lady to make regular statements about her policy on that topic?

Mr. Biffen: I shall inform my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister that she has enlisted a new and unexpected member of her fan club.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): Is my right hon. Friend aware that many Government Members believe that he does not need to do himself that type of good? Is he aware of the Swann report, published today? Is there any prospect of having a debate on it?

Mr. Biffen: The moment that I am released from my present toils a statement will be made on the Swann report.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Will the right hon. Gentleman take on board the need, adumbrated by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition, for a specific debate on the problems facing the arts and heritage world? It is not good enough to try to push off such matters into a generalised debate in the lost limbo of the Budget.

Mr. Biffen: I take note of that. My earlier references to the arts world and the Budget were made hopefully—but they were not much more than that.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Is my right hon. Friend aware that violence, which already takes place on the football fields, has spread to my surgery? At my last three surgeries in Leicester my wife and I have been subjected to severe disruption and threats. My ethnic community officer has been almost beaten up. Will my right hon. Friend please provide time for a debate so that right hon. and hon. Members may be protected in their surgeries when they are trying to do a job to help the community and their constituents?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend has made a serious point. We spend quite a lot of time talking about the privileges of this place and the House will wish to reflect upon my hon. Friend's remarks. I hope that he will not think that I am being dismissive, but I can see no early opportunity of a debate in Government time.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Will the right hon. Gentleman have a rapid word with the Secretary of State for Education and Science and ask him when we are likely to have a statement on the future of the British subscription to CERN, the high energy physics centre at Geneva?

As a matter of parliamentary foresight, can the right hon. Gentleman cast his mind forward to Thursday when a response will be announced to the Foreign Affairs Select Committee report on the Belgrano? Would it not be useful to have a detailed reply to the book published yesterday by Mr. Clive Ponting? In the absence of a detailed reply to the charges of deception, will the Government, the Prime Minister and Ministers sue?

Mr. Biffen: On the first question, lightning itself could not be faster than the transmission of the hon. Gentleman's words to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, who is on the Front Bench.

On the second matter, I have not much more to add to what was said in the recent debate on the sinking of the Belgrano. I take note of what the hon. Gentleman says about the modalities that might surround the publication of the departmental Select Committee report.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): As one who pressed for an enlarged debate on Monday, I am grateful for the extension of the debate to five hours.

Does my right hon. Friend agree that there is considerable anxiety in the rural areas about the proper objectives of agriculture policy? Will he consider arranging a general debate on agriculture so that we can express views about the proper range of British agriculture policies?

Mr. Biffen: Since I have a broadly similar constituency interest in the topic, I appreciate the interest in the Government's future policies. My hon. Friend might take an early opportunity to discuss the matter when we debate the common agricultural policy. We cannot discuss domestic policy without taking that into account.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) asked for a debate on the Commission for Racial Equality report on immigration control procedures. The Leader of the House said that he would consider that possibility. Was that a slip of the tongue since two or three weeks ago he said that he was already considering the possibility of such a debate? When will that debate take place?

Mr. Biffen: I shall carry on considering.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Does the Leader of the House recognise that by dropping the proposed debate on the limited list on Monday—which is desirable in itself to give the Government time to come up with a proper review procedure agreed with the medical profession — he would also provide an opportunity for a proper pre-price fixing debate instead of a truncated debate ending at 7 o'clock?

Mr. Biffen: The House has accepted the motion which sets the terms for debates on Monday. A reasonable and equitable judgment has been made about what are always difficult and competing claims.

Ethnic Minority Children (Education)

4.17 pm

The Secretary of State for Education and Science (Sir Keith Joseph): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement about the final report, published today, of the committee of inquiry into the education of children from ethnic minority groups. Also published today is a guide to the main issues in the report written at my invitation by the chairman, Lord Swann, which I am arranging to be sent to all schools. Copies of both documents are available in the Vote Office.

The Government are profoundly grateful to the chairman and members of the committee for their long and dedicated labours on an issue of crucial importance. We believe that we have a duty to the House, to the ethnic minorities, and to the nation as a whole, to declare immediately where we stand on this issue.

The Government accept the committee's finding that many ethnic minority pupils are achieving below their potential and recognise the concern that is felt about this among their parents. We shall strive to improve the position through three broad lines of policy.

First, under-achievement is not confined to the ethnic minorities. Many in the majority community could be doing far better, and I am determined that they too should be helped, wherever they are at school. As the House knows, our policies for schools are designed to raise the performance of all pupils and to tackle the obstacles to higher achievement which are common to all. These policies apply to all pupils irrespective of ethnic origin. As they bear fruit, ethnic minority pupils will share in the benefit.

Secondly, we are determined to give ethnic minority pupils the same opportunity as all others to profit from what the schools can offer them. We are tackling the obstacles to opportunity, notably by promoting good practice in the teaching of English as a second language.

Thirdly, we want the schools to preserve and transmit our national values in a way which accepts Britain's ethnic diversity and promotes tolerance and racial harmony. Whether or not a school contains ethnic minority pupils, its ethos and curriculum should promote understanding and respect among all its pupils for the different ethnic groups which now contribute to our national life.

These three lines of policy are being supported by a number of measures. I have referred to the steps the Government are taking to raise pupil achievement generally. The need to take account of the ethnic diversity of our society has been written into the new criteria which will govern initial teacher training and the GCSE examinations, and will be incorporated in the objectives for the relevant subject areas of the school curriculum which we are formulating in co-operation with the education service. The same need lies at the heart of a group of projects, totalling some £1 million in 1985-86, which will be supported through the new education support grant scheme, and of some urban programme projects. I shall propose to the local authority associations that from 1986-87 onwards the in-service training grant scheme should include training dealing with the need to respond to ethnic diversity. Meanwhile in English language and mother-tongue teaching the good practice endorsed by the committee will continue to be encouraged and disseminated by Her Majesty's Inspectorate and supported by grants made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary under section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966. These measures are essentially designed to change attitudes; they will not entail an increase in local authority expenditure as a whole.

Policy for the good education of ethnic minority pupils needs information which is adequate to measure and secure progress. Some local authorities already collect information on pupils on an ethnic basis. As the committee's interim report recommended, I have been exploring with the education service and the ethnic minorities the collection of ethnically based statistics on school pupils. There are legitimate concerns and practical difficulties. I hope that soon, however, this work will come to a successful conclusion so that all local authorities can operate acceptable and mutually compatible schemes which respect confidentiality. The committee recommended that, without positive discrimination and without any reduction in the required level of qualification, an increase in the proportion of ethnic minority teachers should be sought. The Government accept this recommendation. I intend to consider with the education service and the ethnic minorities how it might best be pursued. I shall consult about the possibility of establishing acceptable arrangements for the collection of statistics on ethnic minority teachers and students in teacher training, as the committee also recommends.

We badly need more hard information about the effect on achievement of factors in and out of school. I intend to commission research which will look at these factors and at the extent to which they contribute to under-achievement among pupils of all backgrounds. Ethnic minority pupils would be one part of such a study.

The report contains many detailed recommendations which I will consider in consultation with those concerned in the education service and outside it. I shall also consider what might be done in these matters in further education, which was outside the committee's remit. But, to forestall unfounded fears or hopes, the Government wish to make it clear that they cannot accept four recommendations in the report. We do not intend to change the present statutory requirements for daily collective worship and for religious education in maintained schools. Nor do we wish in any way to call in question the present dual system of county and voluntary schools. It remains our policy not to extend mandatory student awards to any form of study which precedes higher education, and we see no immediate prospect of legislation to amend section 11 of the 1966 Act.

These four matters are not at the heart of this issue. It is the policies and practical actions which I have outlined that offer the best prospect of mobilising the combined efforts of the education service to the vital but difficult task of reducing under-achievement at school and promoting good education in our multi-ethnic society.

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): The Opposition welcome the Swann report as a valuable guide to what must be done to ensure that all our children fulfil their potential at school. However, is the Secretary of State aware that parents will be expecting action from him, not just the elegant waffle that we have just heard? They will want to know what—in contrast to the Government's very weak response to Rampton—the Government are going to do about the Swann report. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that they will want to know what the Government intend to do to provide genuine equality of opportunity in our schools; to ensure that the school curriculum reflects the values of our multicultural society; to root out the racism which, as Swann shows, blights the prospects of many black and Asian children? Does the right hon. Gentleman understand the simple point made so clearly in the Swann report that initiatives in this area will require extra resources? We cannot ensure a good education for all our children without paying for it. As usual, it is bricks without straw.

Sir Keith Joseph: The Government have already announced a large number of policy changes concerned with the objectives of the curriculum, examinations, teacher training and records of achievement, to list only a few. All these things are highly relevant to under-achievement in all our population, including ethnic minorities. Those changes will come into effect over the next two or three years and will, I hope, be of benefit to all.

The hon. Gentleman has allowed himself to speak in far too absolute a fashion about what he calls "racism". He does an injustice to the teaching force, whose members are dedicated to the service of individual children and in whom I have seen precious little evidence of any racist prejudice. I ask the hon. Gentleman and the House to accept that, apart from the general policies to reduce under-achievement to which I have already referred, the Swann report is asking us to deal with the most difficult of all issues—attitudes. I have announced that we are taking what steps seem practicable, emerging from the Swann report, to tackle those attitudes and I do not think that resources are in any way the prime need.

Mr. Mark Carlisle (Warrington, South): As the person who was responsible for asking Lord Swann to take on the chairmanship of this committee, I wish to add my thanks to those given by my right hon. Friend to Lord Swann for his willingness to take on this job. I suggest that, had he realised at that time the enormity of the task that he was entering upon, he might have been slightly more hesitant.

I welcome what my right hon. Friend has said about his decision not to interfere with the role of the voluntary schools. Does he agree that if we are to achieve in education equality of opportunity for all people of all ethnic groups—as the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) said—the most important recommendation of all relates to the teaching of English to those for whom it is not their first language?

Sir Keith Joseph: I agree with my right hon. and learned Friend. I doubt whether even he guessed, let alone warned Lord Swann, what an enormous task he was being asked to undertake. I agree, too, about the prime importance of the learning of English and that is why it featured among the first things that I said in my response.

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridgeshire, North-East): Will the Secretary of State promise that as a result of this long, detailed and good report we shall, within the course of the next year at least, have an opportunity to debate it in the House? I totally agree with him that this is a question of attitudes. Would he make it easier for teachers to gain some understanding by, for instance, making it obligatory to have a probationary or training period in schools which contain children from the ethnic minorities? Finally, I ask him particularly to look again at the Swann report recommendation on the educational under-achievement of West Indian children and to recognise that general solutions are useless when it comes to specific problems.

Sir Keith Joseph: My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will be made aware of the hon. Gentleman's suggestion about holding a debate. There are Supply Days and the Opposition may wish to contribute a day of their own to the debate. I shall follow up the hon. Gentleman's suggestion that probationary teachers should spend a period in schools with ethnic minorities. On West Indians' special needs, the Swann committee reveals a certain paradox. There is a differential record of achievement among different groups of ethnic minorities and, indeed, within those groups.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Is my right hon. Friend aware that, during my 23 years of teaching in London comprehensives, I taught children from overseas with 65 foreign languages between them? In my last school of 2,000 students, 700 of the children were black or coloured. The job done by the teachers was admired by people in all circumstances who determined that their work was free from racial prejudice of any kind. I welcome the credit my right hon. Friend has given to the teaching profession in doing that job.

Will my right hon. Friend accept that there will be a warm welcome across the country for his determination to refuse the Swann suggestion that morning assemblies should be changed and his determination that religious education should be strongly maintained? Is my right hon. Friend aware that the best way to overcome racism in any school is to give every child equal treatment? There is no other way. I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement that we want more teachers from ethnic minority backgrounds. I advanced that idea many years ago. Does my right hon. Friend accept, however, that every teacher, from whatever background, must be well qualified and well able to do the job?

Sir Keith Joseph: I agree with my hon. Friend, but I think that this country faces a particular problem to which the Government are addressing themselves — under-achievement in the majority community as well as in the ethnic minorities. That is why the Government introduced the low attainers programme, with extra money from the taxpayer. That is why we shall commission more research, as I said in my statement.

Mr. Sydney Bidwell (Ealing, Southall): I understand that the right hon. Gentleman, with his background and record, would have the same desire as I have to want children of ethnic minority communities to have a fair crack of the whip. I suggest that educational opportunity cannot be isolated to the narrow confines of education—it has, above all, something to do with home life. The right hon. Gentleman has talked about wanting the children of the majority community to achieve more. In areas such as mine, white children are sometimes in the minority, not the majority. Better homes, increased expenditure on housing and facilities to do homework are needed, because such areas are grossly overcrowded. There cannot be equality of opportunity without facing those issues. The right hon. Gentleman's Government is seriously remiss in that respect.

Sir Keith Joseph: There is some common ground between the hon. Gentleman and me, but I hope that he will agree that what the Government can do is relate education to what people can do for themselves.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): Does my right hon. Friend accept that not just the Opposition have an interest in debating this important subject? It is already clear from exchanges across the Floor of the House that misunderstandings about the report are growing and leading to danger. Does my right hon. Friend also accept that perhaps the central feature of the whole report is the statement that attention must be paid to the curriculum and the operations of schools that have virtually no ethnic minority pupils? Does my right hon. Friend accept that many schools where the most useful, exciting and demonstrably effective work has been achieved are substantially ignored by the education press and many people making educational policy, because those schools cater for children for whom achievement is measured in much lower grades than the normally accepted targets? Because our system gives far too much credit to academic achievement alone, these demonstrable achievements are neglected.

Sir Keith Joseph: I respect the sensible ardour of my hon. Friend who was a member of the committee. I should be grateful if he would add to what he has said by telling me, in any form he wishes, the names of some of the schools whose work he thinks is underestimated. In that way I shall learn from him.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Although there will be general agreement with the Secretary of State that we need more information, will the hon. Gentleman accept that the fact that he has not announced substantial new resources to deal with under-achievement will be regarded as a great tragedy? Will the right hon. Gentleman accept that in places such as my constituency, where half the schools in the inner city were built before 1903 and many schools are overcrowded, understaffed and underequipped, under-achievement is clearly linked with the unemployment, housing and poverty crises gripping the inner cities? Bradford council states:

"To learn well, a child must feel that her or his background, family origins, religion and cultural patterns are respected. A child with low self-esteem cannot learn."

That is the problem of under-achievement. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree with that proposition?

Sir Keith Joseph: I think that the hon. Gentleman is deceiving himself if he thinks that the prime need is for resources. Indeed, the Swann committee does not say so. We face a considerable paradox, because substantial proportions of the ethnic minorities are achieving as well as—we are not satisfied with that standard either—substantial minorities in the majority community. The problem is that there is under-achievement in the majority community and differentially under-achievement in the ethnic minorities. The prime problem is not resources but the fact that some people manage to succeed on all sorts of terms with present resources, and some do not. We must ferret out what is happening. Further research is sought to help us.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): May I reassure my right hon. Friend that in Leicester, which has a large ethnic minority community, Asians, especially those of Moslem faith, are performing extremely well. They are not under-achieving in any way. Will my right hon. Friend examine the major problem, which I believe lies with the parents of these children, who need to be taught English as soon as possible? I am pleased that morning worship will continue to be encouraged in all schools.

Sir Keith Joseph: I hope that my hon. Friend will not fall into the fallacy of attributing one single factor as the cause. The Swann report contained healthy comments explaining that a single explanation will not suffice.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that about 20 per cent. of Leicester's population are Asian citizens and that its education system requires congratulation? The city has absorbed those people in the face of the Government's refusal to provide additional resources, as needed, to cope with problems which are obvious when a city contains people from other cultures and backgrounds who speak different languages. Bearing in mind that the city is being rate capped and that the county education authority is run by Conservatives, who refuse to assist in that authority's work, will the right hon. Gentleman suggest some form of positive action to assist, rather than simply say, "Well, everyone is the same. People perform as best they can"? Will the right hon. Gentleman bear in mind especially the fact that Asian school leavers are discriminated against, as the Select Committee on Employment clearly found?

Sir Keith Joseph: Extra resources are provided under section 11, through the rate support grant, and in various other ways to deal with the type of problem to which the hon. and learned Gentleman referred.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): I deeply respect the deep and valuable cultures and traditions which many of the ethnic minorities have brought to this country, but does my right hon. Friend accept that if he were to move towards a coherent, stable and integrated society the probability is that the majority of people in the United Kingdom would wish public money to be spent in such a way as to encourage one mother tongue, which is English, one culture, which is the culture of these islands, and the teaching of one history, which would be British history?

Sir Keith Joseph: I think that in general that is the Swann report's message. We are being told, and I think the whole House will agree, that the maintained education service should work as my hon. Friend says, while respecting the cultures of each separate group and the willingness of separate cultures to protect their continuity. It is true that the Swann report recommends that some attention should be paid to encouraging the mother tongue so that it may be a bridge towards the mastery of the English language. I ask those interested to read the cautious words in the Swann report about the mother tongue in the state system.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I welcome the statement and the interest shown in raising under-achievement throughout the community, but should not attention be paid to home liaison, especially for first generation parents? As the report is not dealing with further education, is it not necessary to help parents to achieve the best objectives for their children?

Sir Keith Joseph: Yes, indeed. There is great scope, but it must be delicately done. I am glad to say that there are a number of such individual projects up and down the country from which I hope we can all learn.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): Does my right hon. Friend accept that almost the most welcome part of his statement is his evident determination to treat the main problem as one of under-achievement, rather than under-achievement amongst ethnic minorities? We wish him to direct his principal effort towards under-achievement in general.

Sir Keith Joseph: I am grateful to my hon. Friend.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall endeavour to call those hon. Members who have been rising, but I ask them to be brief.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Lithlithgow): Forgive my curiosity, but before the press conference this morning did the members of the committee all see and agree the abstract, which will be much more widely read than the full report? The abstract reflects Lord Swann's clear recommendation in para.4.11 that all schools should adopt clear policies to combat racism. Formidable a chairman as he is, are we sure that the other members of the committee agreed the all-important abstract?

Sir Keith Joseph: The responsibility for the brief guide written by Lord Swann falls on my shoulders, as I asked him to write it. As he says in the brief guide, he wrote it without consultation with the Committee, and no doubt each member of the Committee would emphasise a different factor. In his guide, the chairman explains the background to the report.

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): Why is the right hon. Gentleman so complacent about the extent of racism and racial prejudice in our society, which, in the view of the report, undermines the potential for achievement of ethnic minority children? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree with the report that schools must be much more sensitive to the needs of ethnic minority pupils? Will he say something about the Swann report's implications for teacher training,; in particular, that there should be some form of racist awareness training to ensure that racial prejudice does not exist among teachers?

Sir Keith Joseph: I distance myself from the kind of comments that the hon. Gentleman would evidently like me to make, because I think that the word "racism" is used as a relatively superficial alibi for what is a whole range of rather complicated issues. That is why it is necessary to have a little more research to discover why under-achievement affects not just ethnic minorities, to different extents, but the majority community. We need to understand that, and "racism" does not begin to explain under-achievement in our society.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): The Secretary of State has undervalued resources. As Newham has a considerable ethnic minority school population, will he consider the case for individual resources for that borough if it is put up? On the point about British traditional values, do we not value human resources, and should we not therefore care for our teachers so that they can care for our pupils? Would that not be a much better way to combat the under-achievement of all our children?

Sir Keith Joseph: I am tempted to reply that teachers owe something to the children as well. I do not believe that their present behaviour——

Mr. Spearing: The community owes something to the teachers as well.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): Is the Secretary of State aware that if he emphasises the problem of under-achievement across all groups in our society it makes his view that there are sufficient resources even more perplexing? If we study the schools in the inner city areas which ethnic minorities attend, we see that they are the schools which are becoming increasingly starved of resources as cuts in education and local authority spending take place.

Will the right hon. Gentleman also address himself to another reality of education in inner city areas with massively high unemployment, which is that it is difficult for children in our schools to believe that education is relevant if at the end of that education they see no opportunities for employment? With unemployment rates of well over 50 per cent. in my constituency, many children find it difficult seriously to believe that schooling has any long-term benefit.

Sir Keith Joseph: The hon. Gentleman should be aware that there is no link to be seen from the statistics between the amount of money that is spent and the value added to the children's education.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): Oh, come on.

Sir Keith Joseph: The hon. Lady says, "Come on", but there is no link. Secondly, while accepting that unemployment is a misery in many areas, I must say, that if children emerge from school unadaptable and illiterate, they will have less chance of obtaining the jobs that will return.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): Granted what the Secretary of State has said about under-achievement in general affecting children over the whole community, is he aware that for a significantly large proportion of black parents the fact that their children leave our schools less able to compete in our society than white children causes the most enormous anxiety? Is he aware that in his statement this afternoon he has not shown that he fully appreciates the magnitude of the anxiety felt by black parents?

Secondly, will the right hon. Gentleman comment on some of the recent initiatives taken by the Inner London education authority on the lines of some of the report's recommendations before the report was made known?

Thirdly, while many of us understand that the Government will not make more money available for education, and the right hon. Gentleman has said that money makes no difference, will he look hard at the effects of the cuts in education, because there is a danger that many of them will have a disproportionately serious impact on the most disadvantaged—in many cases the black children—in our schools?

Sir Keith Joseph: The hon. Gentleman will find at the beginning of my statement that I paid tribute to the anxiety that many ethnic minority parents feel about under-achievement. There is differential under-achievement within different ethnic minorities. That is the interesting and hopeful factor that I emphasise to the House. I have often enough paid tribute to some of the work being done by ILEA, but I am not sure that I wish to pay tribute to every aspect of the work to which the hon. Gentleman refers.

Mr. Radice: Is it not a matter of astonishment that the abstract issued by the chairman has apparently not been approved by all members of the Committee? Is it not time that the Secretary of State quoted fairly from the Swann report, which makes it clear in paragraphs 2.3 and 2.4 that social deprivation and racial discrimination are major factors in ethnic under-achievement? As so often, the right hon. Gentleman pays lip-service to the principle of the report but is not prepared to do anything about it or to provide resources to see that it is implemented.

Sir Keith Joseph: If there is any criticism of the brief guide on the grounds which the hon. Gentleman mentioned, the fault is mine, because I asked the chairman at the last moment to produce a brief guide and there was not time, even if he had wished, to go through the processes of the committee. The brief guide carries within it an explicit statement that it is the chairman's summary, and it does not pretend to be a document to which every member of the committee would agree in every emphasis.

The Swann report refers specifically to racial prejudice in connection with housing and employment. There are general references in respect of education, but I do not believe that those references are justified by what I know of the schools service.

The hon. Gentleman plays a record when he refers to resources. There is a limit to resources. The presence of ethnic minority pupils is taken into account in the distribution of resources.

Supplementary Estimates 1984-85

4.52 pm

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I seek your guidance—I shall do so briefly in view of the time—on what I regard as a vital issue of order relating to the Supplementary Estimates which the House will be required to approve tonight, without debate, at 10 o'clock?

Included in the Estimates is a provision for an additional sum of £364 million for the Common Market through the operation of advance payments in relation to our legal obligations. This new policy—basically, of member states offering the EEC a massive overdraft facility—is a controversial political issue, and you will be aware, Mr. Speaker, of the arguments which could be advanced but which I cannot raise on a point of order. Is it in order for a new, costly and controversial policy to be introduced by means of a non-debatable Supplementary Estimate? Our long tradition in the House is that Estimates should reflect agreed policies and legislation and not make new policy.

While Back Benchers know that they have your sympathy and concern at all times, Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether the Standing Orders preclude you from helping us? Is there any body or person to whom we could present this major constitutional issue, which undermines the power of Parliament and gives the Government, for the first time, the power to create new, costly policies without debate and discussion?

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. At a time when many projects in Scotland have been turned down—I must not mention them when raising a point of order—it seems an outrage that funds of this magnitude should be agreed to on the nod. The House should have the right to debate the matter and say whether the expenditure should be approved.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker, which was raised so well by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor).

It is totally contrary to the conventions of the House that a major policy initiative should be introduced in what must be seen, whatever one's views on it, as something of an underhand and undercover manoeuvre through the Supplementary Estimates procedure. I ask you to defend the rights of hon. Members in all parts of the House by ruling against the unconstitutionality, in parliamentary terms, of such a measure.

This Supplementary Estimate may itself be unconstitutional in terms of our relationship with the treaty of Rome and the European Assembly. Under the treaty of Rome, it is the European Assembly, and that Assembly alone, which has the power decisively to accept or reject the EEC budget.

If it is possible for the national Parliament of a member state to circumvent the rulings of the European Assembly by introducing an overdraft facility in this way, in plain man's language, it is the equivalent of a bank manager suddenly granting an overdraft of £364 million without the authority and consent of the bank. I suggest that, in European legislation terms, this is an unconstitutional procedure, and I ask you to consider that when you rule on my hon. Friend's point of order.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I will quote a short extract from some remarks made by the Prime Minister, who is normally right and was probably right when she said——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot be responsible for what is said from the Government Front Bench.

Mr. Marlow: Article 199 of the treaty of Rome provides that the revenue and expenditure shown in the budget shall be in balance. It is not right, therefore, to raise loans for budgetary purposes. To do so would be contrary to that article. Thus, it would be wrong for this House to agree a loan to the European Community when, to do so, would be in conflict with an article of the treaty.

The European Community has promised to pay to this country last year's rebate of £600 million. It would seem improper for us to agree to this expenditure in advance of that repayment being made. To make a loan before getting our money back is a matter which should exercise the minds of hon. Members and, accordingly, we should have an opportunity to debate the issue.

Mr. Speaker: I assure the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) that I have given careful thought to the points to which he made reference. He was kind enough to give me advance notice of his point of order, and that enabled me to look into the matter with great care.

I am, of course, bound by the Standing Orders. I must make it clear that the decision whether to vote the sums included in today's Supplementary Estimates will be a matter for the House, and therefore it will be possible for hon. Members to vote against them if they do not like them.

The issues raised by the hon. Member may be considered by Select Committees, and some of those issues have been reported on by the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service. Questions about the propriety of authorising a new policy by way of a Supplementary Estimate, to be included in a Consolidated Fund Act, can be drawn to the attention of the Committee of Public Accounts.

It is also open for individual hon. Members to propose to the Liaison Committee that it should recommend particular Estimates for debate on Estimates days. Today, however, the House must reach its decision on the Supplementary Estimate, in accordance with Standing Order No. 19, and that precludes debate or a separate Division, I regret to say, on the amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member and his hon. Friends.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Class IV, Vote 5, Energy Industries

Industrial Support

Relevant document: Energy Committee Fifth Report, House of Commons Paper No. 234, Session 1984-85.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That a supplementary sum not exceeding £20,000,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges which will come in the course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1985 for expenditure by the Department of Energy in connection with the energy industries including related research and development, selective assistance to industry, energy conservation, oil storage, and certain other services including grants in aid and an international subscription. —[Mr. Buchanan-Smith.]

4.58 pm

Mr. Ian Lloyd (Havant): When my Committee presented its fourth report on the Winter Supplementary Estimates, we indicated as clearly as we could that we should be most concerned were another Supplementary Estimate to be placed before the House, unless the Government made a more frank statement on their policy of using BNOC's participation agreements to support the price of oil.

That forms the main basis of our fifth report, which I have the honour to present today. In doing so, the House will expect me now to alter the emphasis which I would otherwise have placed on our further analysis and the conclusions we reached in the light of the statement made by the Minister of State yesterday afternoon.

In that context, I shall make three preliminary observations. The first is that my Committee, in its report, did not recommend the abolition of BNOC, and I think that is clear. My personal judgment is that the Government's action is fully justified by the evidence presented to us and that it resolves an awkward dilemma, though I fully understand that some members of my Committee on the Opposition Benches will not share that judgment or conclusion. They march to a different drummer on this issue, although I like to believe that, for the most part on most energy issues, we march in step.

Secondly, the House will waste a valuable opportunity this afternoon—one that is rarely granted to us—if we are tempted to indulge in what I can only describe as an ex post facto, yahboo debate in which we endeavour to score party political points on the basis of who said what, when and where. There is, alas, all too much opportunity to do that, and no doubt we shall have further opportunities when the BNOC legislation is eventually placed before the House.

Thirdly, I hope the House will take note of the fact, which is not without significance, that the Government have responded directly, rapidly and unequivocally to a Select Committee report. It may be, as one City editor described it this morning, a "milk and water report," but I hope I may be permitted the ironic reflection that if this is the action that follows a glass of milk and water, heaven knows what the Government might have done had we presented them with a stronger drink. Although our recommendations may have been limited, if not muted, the evidence was of outstanding interest and significance, and the analysis was rigorous and effective, despite the limited time in which we had to work.

We have been considering the tip of a large and substantial iceberg, and, to a large extent, the size and significance of the iceberg beneath the surface of the two Supplementary Estimates compelled the Committee to examine it. In relation to modern national budgets, when Treasury officials can cheerfully lose £100 million in what they describe as a rounding-up procedure, £70 million may be small beer——

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): Rounding down.

Mr. Lloyd: I would say that rounding in either direction is unforgivable. We considered a significant manifestation of energy taxation policy, and it is that to which I shall direct the bulk of my remarks.

Before doing so, however, the House may find it useful if I summarise the essential findings of our report—the milk without the water. First, the procedure still imposes sustantial strains on my Committee, and I pay credit once again to its members and staff for the speed with which they worked. The time compression is simply too severe and it must be reconsidered.

Secondly, it became clear, despite strenuous denials to the contrary, that the de facto position was one in which the Government, paying BNOC's piper, were calling the tune. How could it be otherwise? BNOC, while it continues to buy at a regulated price and sell below that on the spot market, could be losing up to $1 million a day. We saw no easy escape from that dilemma while the current policy prevailed. Indeed, we said precisely that.

Thirdly, it was evident that, despite strenuous demands, whatever the mechanics of the consultation process may have been, the Government took the view that price stability meant stability at a price which was acceptable to them and to OPEC. Of course, that is and always has been the highest obtainable price for oil. The Government's interest is at its most manifest in the fiscal sphere, where they admitted that direct taxation on North sea oil would produce about £12 billion in 1985-86. They admitted further, but not without some pressure, that this was merely the first bite at an extremely succulent cherry, for by the time the oil is further refined, distributed, sold and, of course, taxed, in normal circumstances it would provide a further $45 a barrel, which would be divided roughly into $37.50 to the Government and $7.50 to the companies after their costs have been met.

I know from experience long ago that the concept of economic rent is puzzling not only to the vast majority of the public but to many economists and others. I recall an occasion when the late Sir Dennis Robertson—one of the three wise men appointed by Prime Minister Attlee — in his celebrated lectures on economic rent at Cambridge, drew on the board a temple similar to the Greek diagram Pi, and next to it a rather forlorn figure looking like Winnie the Pooh after a night out. He used to say, "This is what I mean when I say that rent may not enter into costs." It was a vivid illustration, but what we know is that the economic rent concealed by this process is vast and that, from the nation's point of view, it certainly enters into costs.

The calculations are complicated by the detailed fiscal effects of oil trading, and as we are net exporters of oil —almost all of which is defined as landed for fiscal purposes — the total taxation produced by about 2·8 million barrels a day from the North sea cannot be far short of $37 billion, or about £34 billion per annum. That will continue substantially unchanged whatever happens to BNOC. The price of oil would have to fall a long way before that large figure was affected significantly.

Fourthly, the Committee concluded, and the Government admitted, that, despite the size of that sum —perhaps I should say that fiscal plum—the national interest of the United Kingdom must be determined by much broader criteria. That is certainly true of the OECD as a whole, for within the OECD only Norway and Britain are partial beneficiaries of the OPEC umbrella under which we shelter. The American domestic economy does not choose to shelter under a high energy cost system. The charts and figures—I wish I could display them to the House — in the massive document entitled, "Energy Prices and Taxes", published by the International Energy Agency, are both revealing and important. If we take the year 1980 as an index of crude oil import prices, expressed in national currencies as 100, by October last year—a mere four years later—the figure for western Europe was 160 and that for the United States had fallen to 85.

The result is seen most clearly in petrol prices and taxes. All have increased, but the United States and Canada remain by far the cheapest at about 30 US cents per litre, while Britain has slipped down the league table to 53 US cents per litre. Indeed, it is noteworthy that the tax on petroleum in the United Kingdom alone, and in most western European countries, is greater than the total cost of petrol in the United States and Canada.

It is no wonder that our economies are, by comparison, sluggish and unresponsive. We tax energy generally and oil in particular to the point where we create a major disincentive to economic development. The knock-on effects of this policy are not confined to oil. Oil sets the ceiling as the premier and most flexible fuel. Priced at its current level after tax, it enables other forms of energy to be sold at prices far above those which the market would otherwise determine and sustain. The result is that the entire energy base of western Europe, including ours, is distorted not only by the oil taxation mammoth that it must carry but by the artificial relationships between other forms of energy, such as coal and natural gas, and industrial costs generally.

That is a deeply entrenched policy, and its influence and scope will not disappear overnight with the transformation of BNOC. The Government's welcome abdication from the oil price market is, nevertheless, a step in the right direction. The Government have no more right to interfere with or influence the price of oil than they have to influence the price of tin, rubber, steel, coal or any form of energy. The transformation of the pattern and scale of energy supply in response—that response must be rapid and effective—to changing technologies, demand, costs of supply or changing conditions of any sort, is best achieved if rigidities are not inserted into the market mechanism either by the bureaucratic procedure of the cartel or by the bureaucratic procedure of the state. Inevitably, there is interference by both sectors, and that distorts real costs, investment and demand, and it does all that in the interests of so-called stability, which, on close examination, merely proves to be a euphemism for high prices. The economy becomes sluggish and unresponsive, unemployment is higher than it need be, and the optimum distribution of energy supply between different systems and different markets is distorted, sometimes beyond all recognition.

That is often described in an even more exaggerated and tendentious euphemism as "an energy policy." It is nothing of the kind. Essentially, it is a policy to distort and often to inhibit development and change. To put it another way, it is the wolf of political opportunism and reaction parading thinly disguised in the sheep's clothing of a spurious economic rationality.

It is now clear that North America and Japan, which we properly watch carefully, are pursuing policies designed to achieve low real energy costs. That may not be a sufficient explanation of their undoubted economic growth and success over the past decade, but it is certainly a most vital condition of that success.

That is the iceberg beneath the Supplementary Estimates. It is large, significant and, above all, dangerous. We ignore it at our peril. Our industrial survival, especially in manufacturing industry, in a starkly competitive world, demands low, competitive real energy cost levels. In turn, that demands two things. The first is unfettered industrial efficiency in the energy industries — they must be enabled to respond quickly to the futures that they individually perceive—and the second is a healthy fiscal self-restraint on the part of Governments. They would be wise to let energy fructify within the system and let the economies of the West get up speed. If they do that, there will be a plethora of future fiscal opportunities for avaricious Chancellors. If they do not, they will have only themselves to blame, and no other policies will enable them to compensate, for the consequences. We have proved that throughout Western Europe.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): We all welcome this debate. When it was announced that the debate would take place, it was thought that it would concentrate entirely on the Select Committee report, which has been unfairly described as having milk and water proposals. However, I am sure that hon. Members will take the opportunity to comment on and question the announcement made yesterday by the Minister of State, Department of Energy about the future of BNOC.

As the first hon. Member who is not a member of the Select Committee to speak in the debate, I thank the Committee, as no doubt the whole House will wish to do, for the speed with which it undertook its worthwhile work and the detailed evidence. The Committee has also reported speedily, thus enabling us to have the report when we debate this matter.

The report raises some highly pertinent questions about the operations of BNOC and Government policy, particularly in the two-month period since the last report on an almost identical Estimate, although with different sums. On that occasion a number of hon. Members said that there would be considerably more disquiet than that which they were expressing if, within a short time, the Government had to return to the House for sanction for further funds to subvert BNOC. Although the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd) made a spirited speech in which he made a number of pertinent points, the atmosphere of the debate, particularly on the Conservative Benches, might have been more hostile if the Minister had not made his statement yesterday.

No doubt hon. Members will take the opportunity to examine the merits of the abolition of BNOC, but this was done with great haste and I wonder why it was done now and not three months ago or at some time in the future. When he wound up the debate in December last year, the Minister said:

> "The Government's policy on oil prices has been stated more than once. It is to avoid destabilising moves in the short term. To the limited extent BNOC can influence events, its aim has been to promote stability." — [Official Report, 18 December 1984; Vol. 70, c. 232.]

Just before time cut him off, the Minister went on to emphasise that at that time there was a firming-up of oil prices, and he referred to the winter weather. With spring approaching, is this the most appropriate time, from the point of view of securing stability, to announce this measure? What is more, in the immediate aftermath of the miners' dispute, we all expect that the demand for oil will be decreasing.

If it is the Government's policy, as stated by the right hon. Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Buchanan-Smith), to ensure stability, at least in the short term, once BNOC has been abolished, it will be interesting to see whether stability will be better secured through the auspices of the agency. If there is a policy, we are entitled to ask whether we should now expect that same policy to be implemented without BNOC. Three months ago the Government were looking to BNOC to carry out their policies. What method will they now propose to achieve that end?

At the time of the legislation that put BNOC into its present position, the then Secretary of State for Energy, now the Chancellor of the Exchequer, said that the trading corporation would exist for the specific purpose of security of national oil supplies. I noted in the statement yesterday that the Government consider that it is essential to retain powers which would enhance security of supply if that proves necessary. What mechanism do the Government propose to use in the absence of BNOC if there were a need to ensure security of supply by activating participation agreements or calling in royalties in kind?

Why was it necessary to wind up all BNOC's operation? If the Government think, with some justification in the light of the report and of the market in recent months, that BNOC was not maintaining a worthwhile role as a trading operation, why did they have to throw the baby out with the bath water? Would it not have been possible to maintain BNOC and redefine its terms of reference to undertake those matters which the Government will now give to a newly created body? Why do we have to go through the rigmarole of winding down one body and setting up another when a change in the terms of reference might have been a more appropriate way to go about it?

Yesterday's announcement could be used as a smokescreen to divert our attention from some of the other important points raised in the Select Committee's report. The hon. Member for Havant, who is Chairman of the Committee, has not allowed himself to be diverted by that. I look forward to the Minister's reply to his pertinent questions. However, there are still fundamental issues on which we have not had a clear answer from the Government.

The first one, which has already been mentioned, is price. The Committee considers that matter in some detail at paragraphs 7 to 15, 21 and 22. In response to the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North (Mr. Skeet) last June, the Secretary of State for Energy said that the Government's attitude to oil prices was that they would be determined by the law of the market. For some time the Government have sheltered behind the excuse that they are in no position to influence prices or long-term trends. I accept that many complex factors determine the price of oil, but in paragraph 21 the Select Committee concluded that the United Kingdom, as the world's fifth largest oil producer, was a substantial player in the oil market and, to some extent, a price maker rather than a passive price taker. Many of us share that view.

If the Government are able to influence prices, the debate should be about whether they should influence prices and, if so, to what extent. As the hon. Member for Havant said, we should consider how much taxation adds to prices. I agree with him that our industry deserves lower energy prices. We were all told about, and looked forward to, the great advantages of North sea oil. For all the benefit that our industry has gained, that asset could have belonged to any other nation. British industry has had to pay as much for oil as anyone else. Indeed, some of our competitors on the continent have obtained North sea oil more cheaply.

We have also had to bear some of the penalties of North sea oil. Now that the sterling exchange rate against the dollar is so low, we tend to forget the years when sterling was high because we were a petrocurrency. That caused problems for British industry in terms of international competitiveness. A reduction in taxation—which is not a subsidy—would benefit British industry.

Pricing oil highly brings revenue to the Exchequer, but the Select Committee concluded that lower prices would assist our manufacturing industry and, to some extent, help to create jobs. This is not an issue on which the Government can afford to be neutral. They cannot say that it is a matter for the law of the market. The price of oil has important consequences for many aspects of our economic life and we should welcome the Government coming clean and telling us what they believe oil pricing policy should be.

We are also unclear about the Government's policy on the level of oil production and, indeed, whether there is one. The prospect of benefits from North sea oil coincided with the Yom Kippur war of 1973. We looked forward to being self-sufficient. We are now producing more than 120 million tonnes annually and are probably 30 per cent. above self-sufficiency. The decision to go to that level of production was taken without any debate in the House, and perhaps without any debate in the Government. The management of oil is so important to our economic well-being that there should have been a much more open and constructive debate on whether that policy was in the nation's best interests.

There has been no discussion of the consequences of restraining production on the exchange rate or the balance of payments. There is a feeling that the Government have quietly allowed themselves to be committed to a policy of maximum production, for Exchequer ends. As the Select Committee said, although the PSBR is important, it should not dominate Government thinking on oil pricing. Nor should it dominate their thinking on the level of production. People are increasingly questioning whether we should impose limits on production to extend the life of North sea oil. The time has come for that debate.

It is regrettable that the only genuine chances that we have had to debate this important subject recently have been the two Supplementary Estimates debates, lasting three hours each. No doubt we shall have another opportunity in debates on legislation concerning BNOC, but I do not believe that they will enable us to debate the wider issues. I challenge the Government to present a White Paper on their oil management policy on pricing and depletion so that the House, industry and the country can have a proper opportunity to discuss how we manage the nation's most important asset.

5.25 pm

Mr. Michael Portillo (Enfield, Southgate): Like the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace), I congratulate the Select Committee and my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd), who presented his case clearly today, on a capable report. With the announcement yesterday of the abolition of the British National Oil Corporation, we shall never quite know whether the Government jumped or whether they felt the push of the Select Committee in the small of their back.

I have taken a close interest in BNOC for a long time, and I recall that when the Conservatives came to power in 1979 two arguments for retaining BNOC were put forward. The first was that the Government needed an insider in the oil industry because oil production was new to Britain and, it was argued, the complexities of the industry were such that the Government could not understand the industry without being a player on the field. I always distrusted that argument. The complexities of the oil industry are not so much greater than any other as to require the Government to be involved in it. The second argument had more merit. It was that BNOC might play a role in protecting our security of supply. That is an important matter, but the more I considered the proposition, the more I concluded that the participation agreements of BNOC could not achieve that security of supply.

The participation agreements are simply not flexible enough. BNOC is committed to buy or sell oil many months in advance, but a supply crisis in oil can arise in a few days. Moreover, the participation agreements cover about half of the nation's oil, and yet it is possible to have a shortfall of about 5 per cent. and for that to constitute a major problem. Furthermore, the participation agreements cover only crude oil, and the substance that we need to power our cars and factories is not crude oil but the products of oil. BNOC never had control over the supply and movement of products of oil.

Fortunately, as the security of supply is so important, the Government have adequate powers to take any steps that they need to take in an emergency under the Energy Act 1976. BNOC never added greatly to the Government's powers. Indeed, its existence made Britain more prone to oil disruption, because we came to rely on it to take care of us during supply crises. During the problem of the summer of 1979, when there was a world-wide shortage of oil products, especially petrol, and when my right hon.

Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) was Secretary of State for Energy, the Government relied on BNOC to keep things ticking over smoothly. For the reasons that I have just given, BNOC was not able to achieve that, and I suspect that the Governments of France and Germany took more direct action to ensure that their oil companies kept them supplied. Although other European countries had no BNOC and no oil of their own, there were fewer petrol queues on the continent, and it was oil-rich Britain which seemed to bear the brunt of the problems.

As soon as that security of supply argument lapsed and was discredited, another argument arose in its place. It was that it would be difficult for the Inland Revenue to levy taxes on oil unless there were a reference price clearly established by BNOC. I never believed that argument, either. It seemed to me that other countries, such as the United States of America, had no need of a national oil corporation and were still able to levy taxes on their oil companies satisfactorily. It seems that that argument has now fallen from sight.

I do not intend my following remark as in any way an aspersion on the staff of BNOC, who have performed their duties with great dedication and distinction. However, BNOC was not only an unnecessary invention but was rather harmful in its effects on this country. It was trading about half the oil being produced in this country. Therefore, it was the price setter for North sea oil. At the same time, it was state-owned. We cannot altogether blame foreign Governments who were confused by that. I accept the assurances given by Ministers that the Government did not set the price of North sea oil, but where a state-owned company is also the oil price setter it is unreasonable to expect foreign Governments to understand that fully. The subtleties of the relationship between the Government and BNOC are sometimes puzzling enough to people in this country, and clearly they can be perplexing to people in other oil-producing states.

In fairness to BNOC, one must say that it was put in an impossible position. If its prices reflected market conditions, it would be accused of forcing the pace—either forcing prices upwards when the market was moving in that direction, or being the leader in bringing prices down. If, on the other hand, BNOC held back and lagged behind the market, it was liable to run up the losses on which the Select Committee has just so ably reported.

Therefore, Britain was also put in a difficult position. It seemed that we were being invited either to join in an international price-fixing cartel or to hold back from joining in that cartel and risk incurring the wrath of other oil-producing countries if we did so. We were being drawn into either collusion or collision with OPEC. It is interesting to note that much more important oil producers than ourselves, such as the United States, were never so embarrassed, because they never had a national oil corporation to put them in such a position.

Therefore, I am sincere in extending congratulations to my right hon. Friend the Minister of State on the courageous decision that he announced to the House yesterday. It is a courageous decision, and the right one, too. I hope that he will not mind if I say that I have three reservations about his decision. The first is that in his statement yesterday he seemed to lay great emphasis on the recent change in oil trading conditions. The reason why that concerns me is that there were deeper flaws in BNOC, which go back much further than the past few weeks or months. The reason why I stress that is that if the trading conditions change again, as well they may, I hope that there will not be a clamour, to which the Government might accede, for the BNOC, in its old form, to be reinvented.

My second reservation or disappointment is that the Government will continue to take royalty in the form of oil. I understand the oil taxation reasons for that, but it means that the agency that replaces the BNOC will still trade about 250,000 barrels a day. Is my right hon. Friend sure that in those circumstances the agency will not still be regarded as the market maker in the oil industry, with all the problems that can flow from that?

Thirdly, I should like to ask my right hon. Friend why he feels that he needs to retain the participation agreements at all. My own strong feeling is that he will never reactivate them. If one day we find ourselves in a supply difficulty, I am sure that he will wish to use much more direct means to ensure security of supply in this country, and will not have the time or leisure to reactivate the rusty mechanism of the participation agreements.

Finally, I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his sense of timing. I should have thought that almost any time during the past six years would have been an easier time to abolish BNOC than the day on which he chose to announce it—yesterday—with the pound low against the dollar, with oil markets weak and just a few days before the Budget. That reassured me that the Government retain a highly developed sense of theatre.

5.35 pm

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): I join other hon. Members in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd) on his chairmanship of the Select Committee that produced the report on BNOC as well as on his robust call for a strategy of lower energy prices on a market basis, for which I believe world conditions now allow. I hope that we shall hear more support from hon. Members for the development of such a strategy. We have left the unpleasant era of constant upward pressures on all energy and fuel prices. A positive policy should now be developed for lower prices of all fuels. That is possible, and I look to my right hon. Friends in the Government to develop such a policy as from now.

My hon. Friend the Member for Havant said that he hoped that this would not be a yahboo debate. The "yah" may be here but the "boo" is not. There is not one Back-Bench Labour Member here. The only person from the Labour party who is here is the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands), who is on the Front Bench, to join us in saying goodbye to BNOC. Perhaps that will enable us to have a better discussion. Certainly we have heard some interesting contributions, including the excellent words of my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo), who some years ago was an invaluable assistant to me in the Department of Energy.

I cannot remember the name of the hon. Member who, at the time of the resignation of Dr. Dalton as Chancellor of the Exchequer, shouted out, "They shot our fox." However, the phrase came to mind yesterday when I heard my right hon. Friend the Minister of State announce that BNOC, which, I am afraid, has come in for a good deal of criticism, has got into considerable difficulties and is beginning to cost the taxpayer awkward amounts of money, was to be no more. As I said yesterday, it is a right decision, that what is BNOC today—it is a different body from the BNOC of the early 1980s and the late 1970s —should be brought to an end. My only query is why we are doing it so late in the day.

My view was that the trading arm of the old BNOC should be kept on for an experimental period to see whether we needed a body in Government that could influence oil movements, and until we were sure that there were fundamental changes in world oil market conditions. That became apparent a long time ago. The case for ridding ourselves of an organisation that shaped official prices and made us vulnerable to foreign criticism and foreign pressures was a strong case a good while ago—at least a year ago. The delay in introducing the new policy has been a matter for regret. It has been costly and has meant that the taxpayer has had to bring forward valuable and scarce funds. It has not done us any good diplomatically either as it has created a great deal of acrimony and difficulty with other nations—obviously those within OPEC.

It is not the replacement of BNOC by the new agency which my right hon. Friend the Minister of State mentioned yesterday which is the most important matter. I do not have strong feelings on whether we should have a new agency of the sort that was described. I suspect that such a body may be useful if we have another sudden violent interruption in world oil supplies and have to influence movements in oil at an early date before we can even take steps under the Energy Act. It may be useful, but I do not believe that that is the most important part of what the new announcement implies.

I should also like to echo the words of my hon. Friend the Member for Southgate who referred to the staff of BNOC. They have worked with great skill under very difficult conditions, but gradually they have found themselves fulfilling a role which was never designed for them. Not merely were they shapers of the entire price structure of North sea oil but finally they were the instrument, apparently, of official wishes to keep in line with the surface activities of the OPEC cartel on pricing. When the BNOC trading arm was originally left in place, it was not intended that it should be involved in shaping prices. It certainly was not intended that it should be used as an instrument for supporting the OPEC cartel. The intention was that its role should be to influence major oil movements, both imports and exports, if and when another crisis occurred.

Even at that role it had not, frankly, been very good. As my hon. Friend the Member for Southgate reminded us, in the summer of 1979 the Conservative Government inherited an organisation which had, unfortunately, been committed, in a previous period when there had not been a crisis to substantial oil exports. Therefore, the managing of oil markets in the summer of 1979 was made very much more difficult for the Government.

If I may correct my hon. Friend the Member for Southgate, the Government did not rely on BNOC to see things through smoothly. It could not do that. BNOC was too committed elsewhere. That created severe difficulties and brought home the need for an organisation that was different from the BNOC which we had inherited. Therefore, the real gain resulting from the announcement made by my right hon. Friend the Minister will be not so much a change in the institution but the end of price intervention and the end of the attempt to run an official price mechanism for North sea oil. I hope that we shall be assured that this will happen. I have strong views about this. In an era of soft oil prices, which has been the normal state of the oil market since oil was first discovered, with the single exception of the past 13 or 14 years, the kind of intervention that appears to have been practised over North sea crude has, far from stabilising the market, destabilised it.

I should like to know whether the Minister and other hon. Members agree with the assessment that has appeared several times in the excellent journal Petroleum Intelligence Weekly. In its issue of 14 January it said:

> "Far from upsetting fragile world markets, the abolition of a BNOC sales price, or slashing it to spot market levels, might reduce the volume of potentially de-stabilizing spot trading in North Sea crudes. Aligning BNOC with spot market prices could largely eliminate the incentive for integrated producers to sell their availabilities on the spot market . . . and replace with supplies bought from others on a spot basis."

That is an expert and shrewd inside view of what was happening in the oil market as a result of BNOC continuing to pay an artificially inflated price for its participation. The effect was to drive more and more people on to the spot market in order to establish a lower reference price, which led to the destabilising of oil markets.

Because of this and many other decisions that have been taken by OPEC, it greatly saddens me that during the last year there has been prolonged agony while oil prices worldwide have been adjusted to more normal levels. International crude oil prices have not yet settled down to the level at which I believe they will settle, but that pattern could have been achieved much earlier, which in turn would have helped the pound to settle a good deal earlier if we had not intervened and if there had not been the destabilising consequences of that intervention. I believe that it was a very great mistake. It has prolonged our difficulties and has led to the the commitment of public funds not, by the standards of the overall budget, on a huge basis but nevertheless on a significant basis — funds which are desperately needed in many other areas.

Furthermore, the policy of maintaining an artificial price made the United Kingdom a scapegoat and a point at which OPEC pressure could be applied. As my hon. Friend the Member for Southgate said, without the BNOC official price we should not have been subjected to these considerable pressures. In the United States of America, which produces three or four times more oil than this country, there is no American national oil corporation. Therefore, it is not forced into this embarrassing position.

The losses that we are discussing, for which the taxpayer will have to pay, could, I believe, have been avoided. We are considering a tale of error. That tale of error has now been redeemed by this belated decision of the Government to dismantle the oil price structure and do away with the residual BNOC which was the instrument of that price structure. However, I do not believe that such a position should have been allowed to continue for as long as this. It is regrettable that we should have to authorise the use of taxpayers' money to make good the deficiencies. This should not have been allowed to happen. Nevertheless, I am glad that my hon. Friend has now made a decision that will prevent this country from getting into such a very difficult and unwelcome position in future.

5.46 pm

Dr. Michael Clark (Rochford): I welcomed yesterday's statement by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Energy and I should like to support the comments that have been made by my hon. Friends. As a Government agency, the British National Oil Corporation tried to maintain oil prices, but it tried to do so without many tools at its disposal. It had no storage facilities. It was faced with the difficulty that output from the North sea was inflexible. Furthermore, it did not sell oil forward.

I believe that oil prices should be lower. The British economy would benefit from lower oil prices. Therefore, I welcome the departure of BNOC. However, I understand the need of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the revenue from North sea oil. Furthermore, the oil companies need a proper return both to pay for their past investment and to allow them to continue with present and future exploration.

On 6 December 1984 I had the opportunity to ask the chief executive of the British National Oil Corporation this question during a hearing by the Select Committee on Energy:

"is it not true to say that this Government has a policy of free enterprise and market forces and therefore would you not agree that these aims can best be served by not having a BNOC organisation?"

The reply of the chief executive was:

"Your question should be directed to the Government and not to us."

The Government have now answered that question, even though they did not answer it during the further evidence that was taken at later sessions. However, witnesses appeared before the Select Committee who defended the existence of BNOC, notably my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, and also witnesses from the Treasury and BNOC. Therefore, I was very surprised yesterday when I heard the statement, because some of the arguments advanced for the retention of BNOC seemed to be convincing. At least I thought that those witnesses who gave evidence to the Select Committee had convinced themselves that the organisation should remain in being.

May I look briefly at some of BNOC's objectives and examine to what extent they have been met during the last few years. First, although not necessarily in order of importance, BNOC seeks to trade profitably. During its last full trading period its turnover was £7 billion and it made a profit of £500,000. The return on turnover was 0·007 per cent. — hardly a licence to kill. During the last six months when BNOC was buying at term price and selling more than 75 per cent. of its oil at the spot price it made a loss of £65 million. In fairness, if the aim of the corporation was to keep up the price of oil, which it will not admit was its aim, perhaps it should take some credit for doing so, because the Treasury evidence was that if the dollar price of oil fell by about 1 per cent. it would cost the Exchequer £150 million a year, and that the oil price might fall by 6 or 7 per cent. with the demise of the BNOC. Therefore, £65 million in half a year, or £130 million in a full year, is a small price to pay for keeping oil prices up and maintaining the price. But since the corporation will not claim that its role is price maintenance, it is difficult to give it credit for having achieved that. It claims that it should sell at a profit, and in that it has clearly failed.

The second objective is to provide maximum benefit to the United Kingdom economy. Many of my hon. Friends would agree that the United Kingdom economy can benefit best by having cheaper oil. High raw material and fuel costs adversely affect companies' trading positions. If the price is too high, companies can be driven out of business and they will stop trading. It is far better to have lower raw material and fuel costs and to retain companies in business, allowing them to export and to employ people in Britain. If the Exchequer wants revenue, as my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd) said, there are other ways of getting it. We can tax the profits that companies make rather than price them out of business by high prices.

The manufacturing sector of our economy has suffered greatly over the past 10 years, and perhaps longer, as a result of high fuel costs. Over the past 20 years manufacturing industry has lost 3 million jobs and its contribution to the gross domestic product has fallen to 25 per cent. Lower oil costs for the manufacturing sector would make it healthier. I hope that even at this late hour the lower oil prices that will follow from the abolition of the corporation will be an encouragement to Britain's manufacturing sector.

The chemical industry has done moderately well over the past few years and that would also benefit from lower oil prices. It will have greater opportunity to compete, export and expand.

But we must remember that even if the price of oil should fall from now on, with the present exchange rate there will be quite a windfall in sterling terms. I hope that the Chancellor will take advantage of that next week when he is setting our Budget. However, I doubt whether the existence of BNOC helps the United Kingdom economy in many ways. In that respect, it is perhaps as well that it is going.

The third objective of the corporation is security of United Kingdom oil supplies—a point dealt with by my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo). It is vital that we have secure supplies in Britain and that we have the participation agreements that give the corporation the opportunity to exercise its right to buy 51 per cent. of the output of North sea oil. But those agreements will remain even when the corporation has gone. The security of supply that the corporation was able to give was not a physical security of supply; it was one based on the legislation of the participation agreements. That legislation will still exist when the corporation has gone. There is no need to have the corporation just to have security of the supply of oil in Britain, as my hon. Friend the Member for Southgate said.

We are left with only two objectives that will have to be achieved by the new agency that takes over from the corporation. The first is the sale of oil—oil provided in kind for royalties. That will continue to come from those fields that went on stream before April 1982, but it will dwindle and ultimately the agency replacing the corporation will not have that responsibility.

Secondly — the fifth and final objective of the corporation — there is the management of the Government pipeline system. That is a proper duty for a Government agency. Therefore, I am pleased that the new agency will take on that role.

BNOC has had to operate between a free oil market and OPEC. The corporation has tried to influence prices but has set term prices for shorter periods than were directly related to market values. The fact that the corporation has made a loss proves that it cannot determine prices, nor can it achieve their stability. In practice, OPEC sets the prices by varying output in a way that the corporation cannot, due to the inflexibility of North sea production.

At the same time that OPEC has been setting prices it has been blaming BNOC for either undercutting prices or overproducing. It seemed that whatever the BNOC did it was subject to criticism from OPEC. The free market has now come into being in the North sea and that is a good thing. It is a good thing that the corporation is going, and I congratulate my right hon. Friend and the Government on their brave decision yesterday.

It is important that North sea oil should be free from price fixing or price maintenance, whatever we wish to call it. I wish the new agency well, but in doing so I hope that it will not be called the Oil and Pipeline Executive Committee because its initials will lead to a lot of confusion.

5.56 pm

Mr. Peter Rost (Erewash): I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd) for his distinguished leadership of the Select Committee on Energy. I am enjoying the opportunity which seems to come rather too rarely these days to the Back Benches of being able wholeheartedly to congratulate the Government on a measure which appears to meet with unanimous and enthusiastic support from the Conservative Benches.

The decision of my right hon. Friend the Minister of State is surprising, paticularly because it is such a prompt response to the Select Committee's report. We hope that it will establish a precedent. We welcome the response, particularly bearing in mind that the Select Committee did not even recommend the abolition of BNOC, although one or two of us would have liked to do so. We felt that it was not necessary to recommend its abolition. Simply by trying to establish its role in an impartial way, and emphasising what we discovered, seemed to speak for itself.

It was apparent from our inquiry that the corporation no longer had a role which was worth keeping. We have performed a function which Select Committees should try to perform more often. Rather than trying to draw dogmatic conclusions or make powerful recommendations, they should simply emphasise and draw attention to the facts in as impartial and informed a way as possible. That should produce in a responsive Government the right sort of response. That is what appears to have happened here. There has been the realistic recognition that what was after all a relic of Socialist bureaucracy no longer has a role, even if it had a role in days gone by.

In saying that, I, too, wish to emphasise that there is no criticism of the BNOC management. I, like my colleagues, have had many opportunities of meeting them. One almost felt sorry for their impossible role. They were expected to operate in a straitjacket of statutory and political knots. It was unfair that people with tremendous expertise and ability should have been without a role in which to develop their talents. However, I have no doubt that each and every one of them will find new opportunities in their specialist field of oil and energy. I wish them every success.

There can be no doubt that BNOC was originally given a role to protect this country's security of supply. One can perhaps understand the Labour Government's reasons for trying to do that. Circumstances were then quite different in the energy market. However, it became increasingly clear that there was no need for BNOC if that was its only function, as security of supply was adequately protected by other legislation. The Government have sufficient powers to protect security of supply should that ever prove necessary.

Once that role had become obsolete, there was very little left for BNOC to do until it was suddenly discovered that the oil price was weakening, that there was a glut rather than a shortage, and that Britain was a major producer and thus under some moral obligation to help OPEC support the artificial price. Therefore, BNOC was given a new role in life—to attempt to hold up the price of oil, together with other producers. One can understand the Government's thinking, even if one does not quite follow their logic. That was the role that BNOC was given, even if it was never openly admitted.

During this inquiry and the previous inquiry the Select Committee could not find any evidence to show that BNOC had any influence over the price of oil. We tried hard to probe and to find evidence that BNOC influenced the price of oil in world markets. On the contrary, it became clear, at least to me, that, far from helping to prop up the price of oil in recent months, BNOC had contributed to its weakness.

I maintain that in the role that it had to play BNOC had a destabilising effect on the price of oil. Indeed, I very much agree with the theme developed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell). We would probably all agree that oil companies, with decades of experience, are far better at marketing oil than BNOC could ever be, not only because of their experience, but because they have the marketing resources that are needed. They have the financial resources and the storage facilities to store rather than sell immediately. They also have the downstream marketing pipelines which can absorb, at least in the short term, a temporary embarrassment of surplus oil.

On the other hand, BNOC was placed in the ludicrous position of having to buy the oil at a fixed price and sell it almost simultaneously on the spot market in Rotterdam, regardless of the price or of how weak or strong the market. Therefore, BNOC was a major factor in contributing to the short-term collapse of the spot price in Rotterdam and to the widening differential between that and the fixed OPEC price.

The weakness in the oil market in the past few months has been entirely due to that differential. The spot price went down, and that had a destabilising impact on the whole pricing structure. The forced sales of BNOC on that spot market largely contributed to that collapse. If BNOC had not had such a large quantity of oil to sell, and if, instead, the oil companies had been left to market their own, there would still have been sales on the spot market, but they might have been managed more discreetly. They might even have held off, if only for days, and tried to judge sales so that they met demand more effectively. But of course that did not happen.

The Government have recognised that in a realistic and sensible way. I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Minister on having taken a courageous and prompt decision to abolish BNOC. It is no longer required in order to maintain security of supply, and its role in helping to maintain the price of oil was never proved and could have been counter-productive. I hope that BNOC's successor will be able to perform the role that it is given more effectively, and that the marketing of oil in a free competitive market will produce a more stable market. Only time will tell whether we are right, but the Government's courageous decision will no doubt be fully justified.

6.6 pm

Mr. Rob Hayward (Kingswood): The nature of this debate has been changed somewhat because of the announcement made to the House yesterday afternoon. Had the statement not been made yesterday, there was a danger that the members of the Select Committee would have told my right hon. Friend the Minister that his evidence to the Select Committee both before and after Christmas reminded them of the Shakespearean comment:

"The Lady doth protest too much, methinks."

We were not really convinced that there was a genuine case for the Government to intervene, nor for BNOC and the Government to intervene. Indeed, I am also reminded of that same Shakespearean comment when I look at the Labour Benches. Yesterday the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) said:

"We shall oppose this legislation tooth and nail." — [Official Report, 13 March 1985; Vol. 75, c. 306.]

I believe that that phrase was also used in another place. May I ask whether the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney is the tooth or the nail?

During the debate, several hon. Members have paid tribute to the services of BNOC. Again, I am reminded of a quotation which is perhaps appropriate. It comes from Tacitus, and I hope that is summarises the feelings of hon. Members. Tacitus said:

"You were indeed fortunate . . . not only in the distinction of your life but also in the lucky timing of your death."

The timing of BNOC's death may also have benefited my right hon. Friend the Minister.

Yesterday, Opposition Members expressed anguish and surprise at the announcement, but I think that that was due to the fact that in the past 12 months we have been distracted by the coal industry dispute. Consequently, we have failed to address ourselves to the changing nature of other energy resources available to the United Kingdom as well as to other parts of the world. Whereas a Minister could reasonably, some 12 months ago, have argued that there was an acceptable role for BNOC, the circumstances have changed markedly. The change has lasted over a protracted period. That justifies reviewing the circumstances in which BNOC is operating.

I am surprised that we have heard so few quotations from the report of the Energy Committee. I should like to draw the attention of hon. Members to some comments in the report. These comments were made prior to yesterday's statement. In paragraph 22 it says in bold type:

"it is clear to the Committee that stability currently is a euphemism for action to impede a fall in the price of oil and that the distinction between 'stabilisation' and 'shoring-up' is merely semantic".

Later it says:

"The Committee recommends that the Government come to the House prepared to define stability and to answer the fundamental—and non-hypothetical—question of for how long they are prepared to try to achieve short-term stability while oil prices are falling when it has not even been proved convincingly"— here I refer to the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost)—

"that BNOC is an effective mechanism for achieving this purpose. The House cannot be asked to continue to vote Supplementary Estimates which have provided substantial tranches of public money in an attempt to achieve stability, or, in our view, to impede the fall in the price of oil, unless the Government makes clear what its policy is and provides more convincing evidence that it has achieved a measure of success."

Inherent in those statements are the contradictions which the committee identified in the operation of BNOC in its relationship with the Department of Energy. The Committee was making the point that the contradictions could not and should not continue. There had to be an alternative solution open to the House.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash said, the Committee did not put forward specific recommendations. Some members of the Committee asked several of the witnesses whether BNOC as it stood, in the light of the state of the oil market, had a realistic future. I share the view of my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo), who said that as the Government had announced their intention to abolish BNOC we should not in a rash moment return to that organisation because it would seem appropriate for a short time. We should continue to have the courage of our convictions, as announced yesterday, that it is worthwhile operating continuously without BNOC.

The conclusions of the Committee in relation to BNOC as a potential agent were highlighted in a series of paragraphs beginning with para. 23, which says:

"In the light of all the evidence the Committee feel that so far as the setting of the official price is concerned the Government has been playing the key role and that it should openly acknowledge doing so."

Paragraph 26 says that the Committee

"is not convinced that as presently constituted and as it currently operates BNOC can perform this role."

More crucially, in paragraph 28 it says:

"Under a more flexible, market-related approach to pricing . . . the chances of losses being incurred are greatly reduced."

It was those losses which we were originally to debate this afternoon, because the Committee felt that it was not acceptable that in Supplementary Estimate after Supplementary Estimate the House should be asked to approve the expenditure of £45 million, £20 million or whatever, without a clear statement of the policy that the Government were pursuing.

That is summarised in paragraph 29, where the Committee says:

"Only if clearly defined national issues are at stake should taxpayers' funds be employed for this purpose."

That goes back to the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Southgate that it is necessary to act in such a way only when there is a national emergency. Participation agreements will not provide a satisfactory option in those circumstances. We will have to operate in the oil market as we do in other markets such as defence procurement, where we call on national suppliers to cope with national and international emergencies. There is no point in asking for participation agreements to be effective in a few months or a few weeks. We go to defence suppliers for immediate supplies of whatever equipment they are able to provide in a national emergency. There is no reason to believe that we cannot do the same with the oil companies.

In fact, the Committee commented at the beginning of paragraph 29:

[Mr. Rob Hayward]

"The risks of short-term fluctuations in the oil market are risks which should generally be borne by the oil companies and not by taxpayers."

We were of the view throughout the taking of evidence that it was not a justifiable reason in current circumstances for not putting the burden of fluctuations in the oil market on to the oil companies, since they seemed to cope effectively with other aspects of the industry.

We heard yesterday during questions, some of which I could reasonably describe as vitriolic, from Opposition Members now absent that the abolition of BNOC would be a disaster, that the pound would slump and that spot oil prices would go up and down like a yo-yo and would go out of control. What has happened in the last 24 hours? The pound has been virtually static. If anything, oil prices have risen marginally, despite the announcement of the proposal that BNOC should be abolished. If there were to be a problem, one would have expected that in the first hours of uncertainty after the announcement there would have been great fluctuations. If the fluctuations that have taken place are the worst that we shall have to face, I am more than satisfied with yesterday's announcement of the intention to abolish BNOC.

I accept the request that has been put to the House for the granting of the Supplementary Estimate. I believe that it will be the last one that will be put while we are Members of this Parliament. I hope that the changes announced by the Minister of State yesterday will reflect the changing circumstances of the last few months and years and that we shall see a sensible operation on the spot oil market, borne by the oil companies and not by the Government.

6.17 pm

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): The temptation to break into the cosy unanimity is too great to resist. There was a reference to tooth-and-nail opposition by the hon. Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward). I hope that he will persuade his Whips to include him in the Committee which will consider the necessary legislation so that we can demonstrate how it will be fought tooth and nail. I assure him that we shall fight it in the most vigorous way imaginable under the procedures available to us.

I should like to pay a compliment to the Chairman of the Energy Committee and his team for the report, although I have found the comments today of hon. Gentlemen who were members of the Committee rather strange. With respect to the Chairman and to the members of the Committee, the evidence in the report does not lead one to the conclusion that the British National Oil Corporation should be abolished. Not only does the evidence not come to that conclusion, but almost all the witnesses who were called before the Committee did not produce evidence to that effect. Let us go through them.

The Committee first called a distinguished academic from Oxford, Mr. Mabro. I have read his evidence. What did he recommend to the Committee? He recommended that Britain should have an integrated national oil corporation with upstream activities, and with production and exploration responsibilities as well as the role of a state trader. I think I am right in saying that. I do not think the Chairman could deny that that was the evidence that Mr. Mabro gave to the Committee.

None of the Treasury witnesses — Mr. Cassell, the deputy secretary, or the assistant secretary — gave any indication that BNOC should be abolished. I have read their evidence avidly; I have read it word for word. I do not think that one could draw such a conclusion from their evidence.

Of course, the star witness was the Minister of State himself. He may say that it was his guise to keep a straight face and not let on to the Committee that what he was up to was the abolition of BNOC. I have always believed him to be an honourable and open man in most respects. Not only did I read the Minister's evidence, but I listened to him giving it and to his cross-examination. I challenge the House to quote a single word of his which gave any serious sign that the Government believed that there was a case for the abolition of BNOC.

Written evidence was given by the oil companies. Britoil ummed and aahed in a weasly way. Shell said neither one thing nor the other. The small oil companies — Westar, for example — submitted a eulogy full of glowing praise for BNOC. Little evidence was given to the Committee to justify the decision announced yesterday.

We must remember the Minister's remarkable speech on 18 December. The market has not changed dramatically since then. The problems faced by BNOC at the end of December were not that different from the problems that it was experiencing in January and February. The best testimony of the role, purpose and important functions of BNOC was the Minister's speech to the House on 18 December. In three months that position has not altered fundamentally. The Minister then allayed my fears that he might have been up to no good and that he might announce the abolition of the corporation within three months.

Mr. Hayward: Does the hon. Member accept that when evidence was taken in November and December the oil market had changed dramatically since the summer? The Committee debated whether the actions that were taken were justified in view of the timescale. It is three months since that debate, and we can now see a direct pattern which is more consistent than it appeared in December.

Mr. Rowlands: That is just possible. In January and February prices were firming up and creating less of a problem. The OPEC deal was also made. The Minister's case to the House on 18 December was that BNOC's important function did not depend on the market at any one time. His statement was one of broad support for BNOC's basic role and function. Why has he suddenly taken this decision?

Some aspects of yesterday's statement were spurious and they have been referred to by Government Members. The argument has gone something like this: Because BNOC failed to stabilise the price of oil and the markets were not likely to change in the near future, BNOC has to be abolished.

The argument is that BNOC failed to stabilise the price of oil. BNOC's job was never to fix prices. When we debated the Petroleum and Submarine Pipelines Act 1975 and the Oil and Gas (Enterprise) Act 1982 and discussed the section under which money is transferred to BNOC, not one comment was made by the then Secretary of State to suggest that BNOC should be in the game of price fixing or trying to top up prices, as it has done particularly in the last six months — twice last summer and again in January and February this year. BNOC is condemned and is to be abolished for failing to achieve something that it was never set up to achieve. That is one of the spurious reasons given in yesterday's statement.

Mr. Rost: Is not the hon. Member being a little naive by suggesting that the Government did not want BNOC to play that role, although I agree that it might have been embarrassing to admit that publicly?

Mr. Rowlands: That might have been its role in the last few months, but it was never a declared function. I shall deal later with what BNOC got up to and why. On behalf of BNOC's professional staff and in general terms I have a right to say that that is a spurious reason for abolishing it. I hope that the Minister can give us a more detailed reasoning.

One of the arguments is that the markets are unlikely to change in the near future. Apparently the corporation is to be abolished, but not because the Minister believes the present market trend to be permanent. He is too cautious and coy to put on record that the glut and lower oil prices will continue for long. It is to be abolished because the markets are not likely to change in the near future. The corporation is to be abolished because of a possible temporary movement in the markets. That is a spurious case.

Much resentment is felt about certain aspects of the presentation of the decision. Some comments by hon. Members and the press gave the impression that we were dealing with yet another lame duck state-owned corporation which was losing money because of its own inefficiency and failings and that we had to abolish it so that it did not lose any more money. The Minister did not try to correct that impression.

We should ask ourselves exactly what happened and why BNOC lost money. Until last summer BNOC had not lost any money. It had conducted a remarkable exercise in buying and selling large volumes of oil. Its turnover was enormous and it managed to make a modest profit.

The first loss was in the last quarter of last year. It also lost money in the first two months of this year. From the way in which the case was presented yesterday the inference is that this was the responsibility of BNOC. I challenge the Minister directly. Many times yesterday Government Members said that they were glad that BNOC was to be closed because it was losing money and had engaged in the fixing of oil prices when we want lower prices. Let us put the blame where it lies. The Energy Committee tries to do that in its report.

BNOC started losing money suddenly after trading successfully since the Oil and Gas (Enterprise) Act was passed because the Government last summer and autumn, and in January and February, chose to intervene in the market to hold up the price.

We went over this ground before Christmas and I listened to the Minister's evidence. I suspect that in the autumn of last year there was an inclination on the part of both BNOC and the Government to try to create a pause in the market—that was the phrase used in the evidence given to the Committee.

What was BNOC's advice to the Government in January and February? I ask the Minister this in the light of the draconian action which has now been taken in abolishing BNOC and because it has been blamed for losing money. After the problems in the last quarter of last year, what did Mr. Goskirk and his team advise the Government to do about oil prices? What was BNOC's judgment in this regard? Is it not a fact that, generally speaking, BNOC wanted to move towards a market-related price to avoid incurring a further loss of the kind it had incurred in the previous year? Will the Minister tell us in his reply what BNOC's judgment and inclination were in handling the problems of the first two months of this year and what part of it was a decision by Government?

I do not know whether it was a slip of the tongue because the Minister of State was weary, but I nearly fell off my chair when, in the course of cross-examination by the Committee, he said that the Government fixed the price after consultation with the corporation. I think that that was pretty close to the truth in January and February. Therefore, why should BNOC take the rap for decisions that were taken basically by the Government?

It is not difficult to see why the Government decided that BNOC should lose money in January and February. It was not Mr. Goskirk or the corporation that spilled the beans on this matter to the Committee. It was the Treasury deputy secretary, Mr. Cassell. We have been invited to read the report, and I have done so. The deputy secretary said on 28 February in evidence to the Committee—this is on page 37 and is in answer to question 120:

". . . OPEC have reached some sort of agreement on price, nobody can tell whether it will stick, or I do not think anybody can tell whether it will stick in the long run, but at least we are in a position where it would be rather rash of us to do anything that undermined that agreement which OPEC have made".

The Government and the Department of Energy were in the direct game of boosting and supporting the cobbled-up arrangement made by OPEC at the end of January. It was not BNOC's judgment or advice that determined the policy. It was a decision between the Treasury and the Department of Energy to back OPEC in January and February of this year.

Mr. Michael Morris (Northampton, South): Is the hon. Gentleman seriously suggesting that Governments, particularly through the Foreigh Office, have not consulted with OPEC?

Mr. Rowlands: That quotation was not a statement about consultation; it was a very specific and clear conclusion concerning the attitude taken by the Treasury to the whole OPEC arrangement. It was what the Committee suspected — that there was some form of cahoots between the Government and OPEC in propping up the prices.

This is very revealing of the attitudes and positions we have taken in our now rather schizophrenic nation, split between a traditionally industrial economy and some kind of all-type economy. It shows the kind of dilemmas that we are facing. The Minister did a lot to try to disabuse the Committee of the idea that this relationship existed, but here is a senior Treasury civil servant making it very clear why the Government were in the business of trying to prop up the price in January and February—to back OPEC. This £20 million is our fee for becoming at least an associate member of OPEC, as far as I can see.

I resent the way in which the abolition of BNOC has been presented, as if it were a losing state trading organisation like some others we have seen in the past. It is not fair. The loss was entirely the result of the Government commitment and decision to try to prop up the price. Curiously enough, I share the views of most hon. Gentlemen who have spoken tonight. I do not think that we should have been in the game of trying to prop up the price. In the long term there is a great need for a lower price to help the rest of our economy to start to regenerate and grow again. I represent a community that needs that. The Government should be honest about it and say that that is what they have been up to and not allow, either incidentally or accidentally, the blame to fall on what has been a successful trading organisation.

I do not think that the losses of the past few months can or should be used as an argument for abolishing BNOC. I share the sentiment of the Committee that the decision to prop up the price was wrong. I suspect that, certainly in January and February, it was against BNOC's professional judgment. Behind the kind words, the speech of the right hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) was a pretty damning one.

Who has paid the penalty for the pretty big errors in this regard? Has it been the Ministers who made the decisions or has it been the skilled professional people who will lose their jobs as a result of the decision to abolish BNOC?

We were told yesterday that the decision had been taken because of "a major change in the structure of the oil market away from term contracts and towards spot" and that

"this trend is unlikely to be reversed in the near future."—[Official Report, 13 March 1985; Vol. 75, c. 305.]

I have already commented on the fact that this seems to be a very temporary statement, to say the least, in terms of its assessment of the trend.

There was no reason why BNOC could not have moved to a spot-related, market-related price instead of being abolished. Statoil has been doing it since the end of last year. The Norwegian state oil company has been doing it and has also gone on to a one-month or two-month contract basis. BNOC could have done that and adjusted its position and trading to deal with the market trends that we face in the near future. The corporation was perfectly capable of adjusting its affairs and I rather believe that it wanted to, but for some of the reasons that I have mentioned it was not allowed to do so in January and February of this year.

I think that most hon. Members who took part in the discussions in December thought that that was the last time that we would be discussing this matter. I know that I did, but perhaps I was more gullible and naive than most members of the Committee. I rather assumed that BNOC's judgment would be endorsed and that we would move in January and February to adjust the situation. It was not adjusted, and more losses occurred, but it was not BNOC's fault.

The other major aspect of the abolition of BNOC is the question of security of supply. As the right hon. Member for Guildford and many other hon. Members have said, from the beginning the case for BNOC state trading—made not by Socialists but by successive Secretaries of State—was that it had a function and a role to play in security of supply. I shall read out later the passionate speeches of the then Secretary of State for Energy in support of the fundamental role that BNOC should play in ensuring security of supply. It was not the Socialists but the present Chancellor of the Exchequer who decided to maintain BNOC. The Minister of State referred yesterday to an experimental period, but that is not the way in which it was described in all the debates on the Oil and Gas (Enterprise) Bill.

On many occasions the present Secretary of State for Energy has reaffirmed BNOC's fundamental role as an instrument to secure supply. It was argued during the debate on the Petroleum Royalties (Relief) Bill that we could afford to abolish royalties in kind on all new fields because we had 51 per cent. of the shares and a national oil corporation that ensured the security of our supplies. I do not need to justify the basic role BNOC has played and should continue to be allowed to play in ensuring the security of our oil supplies. The speeches of the present and former Secretaries of State for Energy and the Minister of State will suffice and, no doubt, we shall consider them in due course.

I should like to examine more closely the argument of Conservative Members that BNOC has no real role and that our supplies will still be secure because of our participation agreements. I do not agree that BNOC has no physical control over oil. In 1979 BNOC brought oil into Britain. The right hon. Member for Guildford said that he found BNOC inflexible about bringing oil into Britain. I believe that, understandably, he made adjustments to ensure that the corporation could act more flexibly in the future. I recall the right hon. Gentleman making such statements at various times during those crucial months in 1979.

The corporation has physical and financial control over a considerable quantity of oil. BNOC finances cargoes weekly and monthly. It is involved in the game of buying, selling and moving cargoes of oil. A quantity of 800,000 barrels of oil a day is not small beer. The corporation has had the means by which it could, in an emergency, bring oil into Britain, and that is why successive Secretaries of State have supported it.

Dr. Michael Clark: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that BNOC has no storage facilities, that it has a statutory duty to preserve the national interest in relation to oil and that that duty will still be vested in the Government after the corporation has disappeared?

Mr. Rowlands: BNOC does not have storage facilities, but it has something that is much more important—the ability to buy cargoes. BNOC has some control at any particular time over a percentage of its oil. I remember the Select Committee on Energy discussing at some length the reason why Mr. Goskirk and company were so keen not to reduce the large volume of oil in which BNOC was trading. The reason was that the larger the volume of oil, the larger the amount to which BNOC would have easy access. BNOC trades in 800,000 barrels of oil a day—350,000 barrels of participation oil, 300,000 barrels of oil received as royalty in kind and another 150,000 barrels of commercial oil. BNOC is involved not just in paper agreements; it physically buys and moves such quantities of oil. The Minister of State gave the impression that, although the Government will no longer exercise their options on the 350,000 barrels a day of participation oil, they will still have oil received as royalty in kind. The oil and pipelines agency will not have that royalty in kind. Will the Minister confirm that the agency will not trade even in the royalty in kind oil? The agency will merely have the same option to buy at a future date as BNOC had.

What are the terms and nature of the participation agreements? Will the Minister explain about the rights to opt for royalty in kind oil? Am I correct in thinking that every participation agreement requires a minimum six months notice before the option to acquire rights can be enforced? Up to 12 months notice may be required under some of the participation agreements before the option can be exercised.

The House was given a misleading impression yesterday that we can have, as an alternative to a national oil corporation, pieces of paper called participation agreements which will be lodged in an agency in the Department of Energy, which means that we can implement the agreements when the crisis comes. I hope that the Gulf war will wait six month while notice is served. I hope that the crisis will hang on while participation agreements are enforced under this new arrangement.

Yesterday the Minister told us about the new alternative arrangements, which meant that we could go back last night and sleep happily in our beds because the right hon. Gentleman had his participation agreements and royalty in kind oil. How quickly will the Minister be able to implement the participation agreements if a crisis arises? If the Minister cannot give a satisfactory answer, he will be offering a totally misleading impression that there is security when there is none.

Mr. Portillo: Does the hon. Gentleman believe that the Energy Act 1976, which was enacted by the Labour Government, is defective in this respect?

Mr. Rowlands: The legislation envisages a much more serious and draconian crisis than the types of crisis about which we have been talking. That Act was available for use in 1979, but, rightly, the then Secretary of State did not use it. There is a differece between crises that have concerned the International Energy Agency arrangements and normality. Sometimes—as in 1979—the shortages are artificial but have a dramatic effect on the market and fears about running out of oil. The 1976 Act is a major piece of emergency legislation.

BNOC could play a much more valuable role in stabilising the market and ensuring security of supply. I think that there has been common ground on that point. In December the Minister of State agreed with our proposition that the Energy Act was not the weapon to deal with the types of crisis in which we envisaged BNOC could assist us.

Yesterday we were told that our oil supplies were secure because of the combination of participation agreement and royalty in kind. Will the Minister describe what will happen if the agency wants to exercise these rights? About what sort of time scale are we talking? What sort of action will the agency take? Secondly, will the Minister confirm that he will not have any royalty in kind oil and that he will only retain the option and not trade in it?

The abolition of BNOC will have serious consequences. Many of the smaller independent British oil companies have used BNOC as an important form of trading for their oil. They have sold 100 per cent. of their oil to BNOC. As evidence to the Committee showed, many of them do not want to set up alternative sales organisations and do not want to come under the umbrella of the major multinationals. They found BNOC a helpful means of marketing their small amounts of oil. It offered them some security. That has been thrown out of the window overnight. What consultations took place with Brindex and the small British independent oil companies about his proposals?

Mr. Hayward: The hon. Member is talking about the nature of small oil companies and the spot oil price negotiations. Given the dramatic change that has taken place and the increasing use of the spot market, is it not likely that the spot market will become much more sophisticated in buying large and small quantities of oil? That is one of the key factors that justifies the changing circumstances in relation to BNOC.

Mr. Rowlands: I do not know any more than the hon. Gentleman does. The Government are too coy to suggest that it might be a permanent trend on the spot market. We have been talking about trends in the near future. That is about the best that one can say. We know what is happening at the moment, but we have no clue as to whether the trend will be permanent. The Iranians and the Iraqis are hotting up their war. We do not know what impact that may have on the oil markets in the coming months.

We seem to have short memories and quickly to forget the lessons that we have learnt. BNOC was established to ensure security of supply and the destination of North sea oil. It was found useful by successive Governments. The problem created partly by the Government trying to fix the price of oil and the changing market due to the oil glut is not the basis upon which to do away with an organisation that has served a useful purpose and could continue to do so.

That is the vital point that the Opposition wish to make. We believe that the alternative to BNOC that is offered is a pathetic substitute for a proper national oil corporation fulfilling its proper duty. It will fatally weaken our control of our oil supplies. When the public's perception of this matter begins to grow I do not think that it will receive its agreement or the cosy unanimous support that the Minister has had from the Conservative Benches tonight.

6.53 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Energy (Mr. Alick Buchanan-Smith): It was nice to hear the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) speak in more moderate terms than he did yesterday but a general without troops is not in a strong position.

Mr. Rowlands: I thank the Minister for the compliment.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I give the hon. Gentleman credit for being a general, but I shall not comment upon how strong a general he is. We should perhaps wait and see.

The hon. Gentleman raised a number of interesting and relevant points. A night's reflection, perhaps having read the comments of those who understand such matters in the oil industry, the newspapers and, on the evidence before us, the fact that other Opposition Members do not appear to support his views, may have helped his overnight change of tone. It is a change that I welcome. I am delighted to debate the matter with him in the terms in which he introduced it today.

I should like to express my thanks to my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd) and the members of his Committee for the way in which they conducted their inquiry and reported. They had to report within a short time. I apologised to him and through him to his Committee that I was unable to help him more about timing during the previous debate, and I am left in a similar position today. I certainly accept what the Committee says. Adequate time is desirable when liabilities have to be notified to Parliament. My hon. Friend and the members of the Committee will realise that neither the liability nor the need for an Estimate arose until the decision was made to maintain BNOC's price in January and February. Once that decision was taken, we immediately notified Parliament.

In accordance with the undertaking that I gave to the House in our previous debate, I ensured that all the information was made available to my hon. Friend and his Committee immediately. I hope that my hon. Friend will accept my apology and understand the reasons behind it. As in December, the Committee had little time in which to work, but it produced a thorough and detailed report. I am grateful for that.

The Committee's report and the way in which it took the evidence raises the issue of BNOC's role. I want to make it plain to the House, as I have previously, that, having considered BNOC's role, I saw it as related solely to the short term. I tried to make it plain to the Committee that I did not see BNOC being able to influence price movements in the long term. The Government have a policy on prices, as I told the Committee, and I wish to make that clear also to the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace).

The Government's policy has been that BNOC should at all times avoid doing anything to destabilise the market. That is what it has done. The Government do not have a view on the long-term price of oil. We have no way of achieving a price. Such a policy objective would be academic, because we have no means of achieving it.

I take issue with the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney because if he believes, as he seemed to say today, that BNOC has had no influence on the market in the past, I wonder what he thought BNOC's role in fixing prices was. That was the thrust of his remarks. No Government have seen BNOC as being able to prop up prices. It cannot do that. What it can do, and has done successfully, is in the short term to provide a bridge between one position and another. When there have been risks and the possibility of a destabilised market, it has been able to act to the United Kingdom's benefit.

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney asked me to comment on the advice that BNOC had given, particularly in January and February. BNOC indicated ways in which potential losses could be minimised, and that was a perfectly proper action for it to take. It then sought the views of the Government on wider national issues. Thereafter it made its proposals for the period in question. There is no secret about the views of BNOC. As hon. Members have pointed out, one of its objectives is to trade profitably.

Mr. Rowlands: The right hon. Gentleman made the important observation that BNOC put proposals to the Government, who then had to consider the wider implications. Presumably the proposals would have saved BNOC money, but the Government believed that there was a broader national reason for not implementing them. Is that a reasonable conclusion to draw from what the Minister is saying?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: There was absolutely no difference on this occasion from what occurred previously. BNOC discusses its views with the Government and thereafter, taking into account the wider interests, makes its proposals. That happened on this occasion. There was no difference between what happened then and what happened, say, last summer, in 1983, or on other occasions. Indeed, the chairman of BNOC made that point plain. When he gave evidence to the Select Committee just prior to last Christmas, he said that there had been no change in the procedure.

A central part of the Select Committee's report rests on the recommendation that BNOC should move towards a pricing system better related to the market and better suited to the long term. I very much take that point because it underlines what I said in my evidence—namely, that if one does not have the abilitiy to influence in the long term, one can only follow market and spot prices.

That was a major factor to be taken into account, and in my announcement yesterday I pointed out what happens if one finds oneself in the situation simply of following the market. That was in line with the Select Committee's recommendations. I was concerned, because if that was to be our policy for the future BNOC would have to make more frequent price changes, and those changes would be related to the spot market. That would cut across the objective, to which I referred, of trying to maintain stability in the market, so stabilising market trends.

More important — particularly in relation to the comments of the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney—we had to consider what would happen if in future BNOC simply reacted to, and followed, market prices by means of a formula, and there are a number of means by which that could be achieved.

We have moved one stage beyond the recommendation of the Select Committee. We must consider what purpose there is in having a body of that nature, particularly if it is simply operating a formula. If it is operating only by that means, its ability to make a choice is severely limited. That, therefore, calls into question the point of maintaining a body whose job is simply to follow the market.

Mr. Rowlands: Has that not been the position all along?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: That has not been the position from the start, because, as I have explained on a number of occasions, BNOC has acted effectively and properly in short-term situations to try to avoid the market being destabilised.

Another point in the decision to abolish BNOC, with which I dealt in my statement yesterday, was the question not of making losses but of the change that has taken place in the market. That change has affected BNOC to the extent that we have had a considerable movement towards spot rather than contract sales.

That is not a United Kingdom phenomenon. It is happening worldwide. The pattern of spot sales has changed from there having been 500,000 barrels a day of such sales in 1979 to over 6 million barrels a day in 1984. Most of that growth took place in 1984. In other words, the change has taken place recently.

BNOC has lost its contract sales and it has increasingly had to operate on the spot market. When operating in that market, without the means of contract sales, BNOC's ability to influence the market in the short term has been diminished because its previous influence was related to its contract sales. As I say, it has lost those contracts.

Mr. Rowlands: The Minister must be fair. BNOC lost many of its contracts because the Government did not allow it to adjust prices downwards to keep its contract sales.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: That is flying in the face of the facts. As I pointed out, what is happening is not a United Kingdom phenomenon. Were the hon. Gentleman's remarks correct, the situation would have tended to confine itself to the United Kingdom market, whereas it is a worldwide movement which has been commented on by many journalists and others. It was shown in evidence to the Select Committee to have arisen as a direct consequence of the surplus of oil in the market. With that surplus, contracts are less attractive because customers for oil no longer require the security that contracts give. At times of shortage of supply, contracts are built up. When we move into periods of surplus, there is a move away from contract prices.

That view was put to the Select Committee not only by me and by other Government representatives but by witnesses from outside Government. When the market moves from contracts to spot, we find ourselves in a totally different situation. That change in the market is directly reflected in BNOC's activities.

I have pointed out that BNOC had a limited ability to influence prices in the short term, and I have given credit to the corporation for the way in which those who have been responsible have worked successfully, efficiently and professionally when they have been able to have some influence. That occurred as recently as last summer, although the market was rapidly changing.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost) that we have accepted and reacted to the reality of the market, knowing that BNOC has outlived its ability to have any influence on the market.

It is important to remember that BNOC has many other functions. Indeed, the latter part of the speech by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney emphasised its function in relation to the security of supply.

Mr. Wallace: The Minister said on 18 December, and again today, that the Government's policy on prices is to avoid destabilisation in the short term. He explained to the House why, having regard to the change towards more dealing on the spot market, he does not believe that BNOC is capable of fulfilling that role. If we assume that it is still the Government's policy to ensure stable markets in the short term, how does he see the Government implementing that policy?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: That opportunity is no longer available, because the market has changed. Unlike the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney, I live in the present and look to the future, not to the past when different factors obtained. That is why I said that we are facing reality and making sure that we have the correct machinery to deal with the future position.

I believe strongly that the security of supply should be the responsibility of the new agency. The retention of our participation agreements means that we can underpin all the other measures that are already in place for security of supply. However, it must be remembered that participation agreements are not the only factor in ensuring security of supply. Our main line of defence will be our agreements with the oil-refining and marketing companies. The Select Committee examined that matter earlier. Our ability to have access to participation oil and to royalty in kind underpins our immediate security measures. The hon. Gentleman was right to say that participation agreements can be exercised only at six months' notice. I did not claim that we would have immediate access to participation oil. However, if the Government believe that they will need such oil in the medium term, they can activate the participation agreements. That is why we have retained that function and given it to the new agency.

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney also asked me about royalty in kind. As one of my hon. Friends said, that provision will remain in effect for all fields that came on stream before April 1982. The provision will give us a substantial amount of oil. Between now and the end of the decade, it will average 10 million tonnes a year. The agency will sell that oil on the Government's behalf.

Mr. Rowlands: At what price?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: In accordance with the market. It will have to sell the oil in accordance with market prices. The retention of the power to participate and the provision for royalty in kind, together with our other measures, will ensure the security of supply.

Dr. Michael Clark: Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that when the agency sells the oil that it gathers from royalties it will sell at such a price that we shall not need Supplementary Estimates for the agency in the future?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The agency will handle royalty in kind simply as a marketing agency on behalf of the Government in order to obtain the best price that the market can offer at the time. The reason why we propose legislation on this matter—this answers a point raised by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland—is that it is a convention of the House that, where the character of an existing body is changed considerably, it is proper to proceed by way of legislation. Since the character of the new body, as its title shows, will be very different, we believe that it should be seen as an agency, not as something more.

Mr. Rowlands: The Minister has made an important point about how royalty in kind will be treated. It means that the new agency will be trading in 300,000 barrels of oil a day. What percentage of the existing BNOC staff will be transferred to the agency to carry out that function?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: It is too early to say precisely how many staff will be needed to carry out that function. Because of the sensitive nature of the announcement that I made yesterday, discussions with the chairman of BNOC started only yesterday. The facilities and staff needed for the new agency will be discussed urgently and quickly with the chairman and those responsible. At this stage, 24 hours after the announcement, neither the hon. Gentleman nor the House would expect me to be able to answer that question.

[Mr. Buchanan-Smith]

The debate has been extremely useful in two senses. First, it has rightly given us the opportunity to debate an important report from the Select Committee on Energy. Secondly, it has given us a wider opportunity than the statement gave us yesterday to consider the reasons for the change that we propose. As several hon. Members said this afternoon, there is a direct link between the two. The recommendation of the Select Committee that BNOC should move towards a market-related price system is sensible and understandable. I believe—I hope that this point is on the 100 per cent. tick list mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark)—that we have achieved that. Although we are going beyond what the Select Committee recommended, we are facing reality. In the changed market circumstances, we do not need a body of the nature or size of BNOC to carry out the limited functions recommended by the Select Committee. In that sense, I am grateful to the Select Committee for recommending that, in the short term, the Supplementary Estimate should be agreed by the House.

Question deferred, pursuant to Standing Order No. 19(2)(c) (Consideration of Estimates).

Falkland Islands (Foreign Affairs Committee Report)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Neubert.]

7.18 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Sir Geoffrey Howe): I am glad that the House has the opportunity this evening to discuss the Government's policy towards the Falkland Islands. I am grateful to the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, under the chairmanship of my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw), for the important contribution which its report will make to the debate. Its wide-ranging review of the many questions arising was published in December last year. The Government's observations on that report were made available to the House in February. These are the two principal documents for our debate tonight. In the limited time available this evening, I shall not be able to cover the many subjects dealt with in those documents. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton) will be ready to respond at the end of the debate to points that hon. Members may wish to pursue.

I hope that the House will forgive me if I am not able to remain for the whole of the debate. I have to attend an engagement with President Mubarak of Egypt which it would not be possible for me to escape. I apologise to the House.

I wish at the outset of this debate to remind the House of the twin themes that guide our policy towards the Falkland Islands and Argentina. The first is our determination to fulfil our commitments to the Falkland Islanders. The second is our efforts to promote better relations with Argentina.

Britain's responsibilities towards the islanders are clear. They are to enable them to live in a climate of peace and security, under a Government of their own choosing, and in that setting to promote their political, social and economic development.

Our concern for the political development of the islanders has been reflected in the way in which we have considered with them the proposals for a new constitution. The islanders consider — and we agree — that the Falklands should have a modern constitution which matches their aspirations in the circumstances of today.

A Select Committee of the island's Legislative Council had begun work on that subject before the Argentine invasion in 1982. Its report on July 1983 recommended, first, that the number of the elected members on the Legislative Council should be increased from six to eight, to be elected four each from two constituencies within the islands; secondly, that the number of elected members in the Executive Council should be increased from two to three; thirdly, that the islands' Government should no longer be able to appoint two members to the Executive Council; and, fourthly, that in each council the two ex-officio members would no longer have a vote. Her Majesty's Government have accepted these recommendations.

Some concerns were expressed in the islands about the Government's decision to promulgate separate constitutions for the Falkland Islands and for the dependencies on the ground that this might imply an intention to relinquish sovereignty over the Falkland Islands while retaining the dependencies. I can assure the House that there are absolutely no grounds for that anxiety. We have no such intention. Our position on sovereignty is firm.

That is one of the few points on which we take a different view from the Committee. I have to say that we were disappointed that its report did not reach a categorical conclusion on the legal validity of Britain's title to the Falkland Islands. Successive British Governments have had no such doubts. In their view—and in our view—the islands are British territory.

Even so, there is good reason to make separate constitutional provision for the two territories. Although the dependencies have for convenience been administered from Port Stanley, they are a separate dependent territory with their own requirements. Unlike the Falkland Islands, they have no permanent population and, therefore, no need for representative government.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): How can the right hon. and learned Gentleman say that successive British Governments have had no doubts? The Government in which Sir Edward Grey of Fallodon was the Foreign Secretary had the Gaston de Bernhardt report. In the 1930s, Campbell and other senior members of the Foreign Office noted that our case had certain weaknesses. In the 1940s, the Marquis of Willingdon went to Latin America. As a result of that visit, there is a file to be opened in 1991 in the Foreign Office called "Proposals to Reunite the Falklands with Argentina". Those who talk about reunification must at least have some doubts. Come off it.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman is entitled to the view to which he has clung so tenaciously, but in fact and in practice the attitude of successive British Governments has been founded on the proposition that I have explained.

I come now to the close relationship between the two constitutions about which I was speaking. The close relationship that has long existed between the two territories will be reflected in the new arrangements that we propose. The Governor of the Falkland Islands will also be commissioner for South Georgia and the South Sandwich Islands. In this capacity, he will consult the Executive Council of the Falkland Islands on matters relating to the dependencies which might affect the Falkland Islands.

The new constitution for the Falkland Islands contains one important new element. The island councillors expressed the view that the constitution should include a reference to their right of self-determination. We agree with them. Accordingly, the preamble to the human rights chapter of the constitution now recalls the provisions on self-determination from article 1 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. This was adopted by the United Nations General Assembly in 1966. The United Kingdom ratified it in 1976.

Argentina has not subscribed to that covenant. On the contrary, the Argentine Government seek to deny the Falkland Islanders the right of self-determination. In our view, the Falkland Islanders, like any other people, have that right. They make up a peaceful and homogeneous community which has developed democratic institutions over more than a century. Their right to self-determination will now be reflected in their constitution, and we shall uphold it.

It has been suggested that these provisions might derogate from the sovereignty of Parliament. That is not so. The ultimate authority in matters affecting any dependent territory is of course this Parliament.

The constitutions are being promulgated in accordance with the normal procedures. They were approved by the islands' Legislative Council on 16 January. They are embodied in Orders in Council which will be made under the provisions of the British Settlement Acts 1887 and 1945. Drafts of the two orders were placed in the Library of the House on 24 January. A revised text, taking account of further consultations with the islands' councillors, was placed in the Library on 11 March.

There is one new point in the revised text that I should mention to the House. We have accepted the wish of the islanders to revert to the title of Governor rather than Civil Commissioner. The latter title was introduced, at the same time as that of Military Commissioner, immediately after the liberation of the islands in June 1982. We have taken the view that the introduction of the new constitution is the right time to return to the more familiar titles of Governor and Commander British Forces. The title of Governor is, of course, the customary one for a dependent territory of this kind.

The Foreign Affairs Committee, in its report, recommended that the House should raise no objections when those orders come to be laid. The Government, of course, warmly welcome that recommendation.

Let me now tell the House something of our efforts to repair and develop the islands' economy. The tasks immediately after the conflict were daunting. Much of the infrastructure was damaged or destroyed. Local resources were overstrained. Today, however, I am glad to be able to tell the House that, although — inevitably — some constraints remain, and will continue to hamper the pace of future development, the position has greatly improved.

The longer-term needs of the islands were analysed by Lord Shackleton in his 1982 economic study. The Government responded to this within only three months by making an allocation of £31 million for spending over a five or six-year period. We have not been able to accept every one of the recommendations in that report, but Lord Shackleton himself observed in the other place that he doubted

"whether any author of a report has had so much of that report actually implemented by a Government."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 6 December 1983; Vol. 445, c. 1020.]

We are making progress too in areas not covered in the Select Committee report. Following the terrible fire which destroyed the Stanley hospital in April 1984, the Government promptly agreed to finance the construction of a replacement. This will be a hospital on the same site shared between the civil and military authorities. Detailed planning and design work is well advanced. Meanwhile, Port Stanley's electricity and water supplies are being improved.

The Government welcome the Foreign Affairs Committee's acceptance that a gradual approach to land reform is right. Four farms have now been sub-divided under arrangements made by the Falkland Islands Government. Of the 27 owner-occupied farms now on this land, 12 were in existence before the conflict and 15 have been created subsequently.

The Falkland Islands Development Corporation will have an important part to play in promoting a programme of land redistribution in keeping with demand.

[Sir Geoffrey Howe]

That brings me to another of the few points on which the Government take a different view from the Select Committee. I have to say that we do not accept the criticisms in its report of the Chief Executive, Mr. David Taylor. I do not believe that the Committee has given sufficient weight to the practical difficulties that face the small administration in the islands. Development needs to be a gradual process, keeping in step with the needs and resources of the islands.

Another of Lord Shackleton's recommendations was the proposed declaration of a 200-mile exclusive fisheries limit around the Falklands. The Government are of course well aware of the activity of foreign fishing fleets in Falklands waters and the consequent danger of over-exploitation of fish stocks. Under normal conditions, the unilateral declaration of a 200-mile limit could well have been an appropriate response because it would offer a means of ensuring conservation and management of this valuable resource. In considering that possibility in the circumstances of the Falklands, however, the Government have had to give full weight to the serious difficulties that could arise in that context. The Select Committee, quite rightly, drew attention to the political and practical problems of enforcing and policing a unilaterally imposed fisheries zone in an area where British sovereignty was in dispute. For that reason, the Committee was not convinced that the establishment of such a zone could be justified.

The Government take the same view. For the same reason, we have decided instead to explore possible ways in which to establish a multilaterally based conservation and management regime. We are therefore taking steps to develop that approach.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): A 200-mile limit seems crucial to the development of the Falklands to me and others who have been there. If we do not set such a fishing limit and enforce it with our present naval presence, is that not tantamount to saying that we do not have confidence in our claims?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: No. It is a realistic recognition, such as commended itself to the Select Committee, of the fact that there is a dispute about sovereignty in the area. It would not be right to conclude in the face of that that existing naval forces would be appropriate or sufficient to enforce a claim, nor would that be the most secure foundation for the protection of fisheries. That is why we have taken the view that we should explore the possibility of establishing a multilaterally based conservation and management regime.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): It would be helpful to the House if the Foreign Secretary could say which countries he envisages being involved in such a multilateral regime and confirm that Argentina will be one of them.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: At this stage, I do not think that I can say more about how these matters are being explored. It will be complicated, but we are taking steps to develop the proposal. It would not be helpful to go into detail now. The hon. Gentleman's point must be borne in mind, but I cannot say more about it now.

It is clear that political and economic development on the lines that I have described can be achieved only if the islanders are sure that they can live in peace, free from the threat of a further attack. I emphasise that it is for that reason and for no other that we maintain in the islands the minimum level of forces necessary to ensure that there is no repetition of the tragic events of 1982.

As we have said many times, our military dispositions have no wider purpose. Allegations, for example, about a "NATO base" are manifest nonsense.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that there is no realistic exploitation of the waters that he has mentioned by British fishermen? Once there is an all-weather airport at Mount Pleasant, which would mean that fishery crews could be rotated, would it not be a more positive approach for British fishery firms to participate fully in the exploitation of those resources?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: That is one of the possibilities that might flow from the establishment of air communications, but we must still consider the framework within which such participation could take place. That is why we have reached the conclusion that I have suggested.

There is a related matter on which we take a rather different view from the Committee. It suggested that the time was now ripe for us to give unilateral undertakings on security — for example, on lifting the Falkland Islands protection zone. A declaration of cessation of hostilities by Argentina would, of course, be a positive step, but that could not, in the Government's view, be the sole trigger for action to lift the zone.

I should now like to say something about the role of the new airport at Mount Pleasant, 30 miles from Port Stanley. That airport has always been intended to play a dual role — first, of course, to promote the security of the islands, and, secondly, and by no means less important, to make a major contribution to their economic development. The main airport runway will open in May. For all-weather facilities, a second runway is needed, and it will be completed by February next year.

The construction of a full modern airport in such a short time, and on such a remote site, has been a remarkable achievement. British engineering, management skills and the efforts of the work force have made this feat possible. I am sure that the whole House will wish to pay tribute to that success.

The airport will have the important function of providing a rapid reinforcement capability. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence has explained, once the aiport is fully operational it should be possible to reduce the numbers of permanently stationed forces on the islands.

The Government have from the first intended the airport to have a major and growing civil role as well. Lord Shackleton recommended the provision of better communications with the outside world and stressed the importance of air services. Mount Pleasant airport will meet those needs. Its main runway will be capable of handling the largest long-range aircraft. The completion of the airport will make possible the establishment of commercial air services linking the Falklands with the outside world.

I come, finally, to the future of this country's relationship with Argentina. Once again, I assure the House that we attach great importance to the improvement of our relations with Argentina. Even before the establishment of a democratic Government in Argentina, which we warmly welcomed, we were taking steps to that end. As long ago as September 1982—within months of the end of the conflict—I took steps as Chancellor of the Exchequer, at the International Monetary Fund meeting in Toronto, to promote and reach agreement with the Argentine Government for the withdrawal on both sides of the financial restrictions that were imposed at the start of the conflict. Britain implemented that agreement in full, and immediately. Argentina has still not done so.

Mr. Dalyell: Will the Foreign Secretary allow me one question as he has to leave the Chamber? Can he assure us that all relevant papers which were relevant to the considerations of Lord Franks and his colleagues were made available to them? Have any relevant papers somehow become available since the Franks committee conducted its deliberations?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have no reason to doubt that the answer is yes, but would not swear so without having had much more notice of the question. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to press such matters, he is familiar with the custom of tabling written questions. I hesitate to encourage him further in that.

Since September 1982, we have continued to make genuine and sustained efforts to find a basis for direct talks with the new Argentine Government. With the wholehearted support of all my colleagues, I took the greatest possible interest and the greatest possible care in arranging the scene for the talks in Berne which took place last July. They broke down because the Argentine representatives took a position that ran directly counter to the basis for the negotiations that had been explicitly agreed by them in advance. That was a sadly missed opportunity.

The Argentine representatives knew then, and the House knows now, that we are not prepared to discuss with Argentina sovereignty over the Falkland Islands. The Government believe that Argentine actions in 1982 have ruled that out. And yet the Argentine representatives insisted at Berne, in the face of the clear prior agreement to the contrary, that no progress could be made towards normalisation without the certainty that a mechanism would be established that would in practice lead to a transfer of sovereignty.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): The Foreign Secretary said that the Government are not prepared to discuss sovereignty. I understood that they were not prepared to discuss the transfer of sovereignty from the United Kingdom to Argentina. There is a difference, and there is another option, which is to discuss shared sovereignty. Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman ruling out discussions on any possible sharing of sovereignty?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The point which we have made throughout, and which was understood by the Argentines at the time, is that we are not prepared to discuss sovereignty. There are many ways in which sovereignty can be discussed. We do not think that it is right to do so. We think that it is right to begin addressing ourselves to the many practical questions——

Dr. Owen: With respect, the right hon. and learned Gentleman has not answered the question, which was specific. The White Paper—the answer to the Select Committee—refers to not being prepared to discuss the transfer of sovereignty from the United Kingdom to Argentine. But there is another option — shared sovereignty, which is part of the United Nations charter, to which we are a signatory. We need to remind ourselves that we went to war in the south Atlantic invoking the United Nations charter and our right to self-defence.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: With great respect to the right hon. Gentleman, I did answer the question. I said that there were many ways of discussing sovereignty, and many arrangements that could be suggested for it, but we are not prepared to discuss sovereignty. As we have made clear, we are anxious to begin discussing the range of practical questions which could sensibly be addressed and which we thought would be sensibly addressed at that talk in Berne.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Will my right hon. and learned Friend give way?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: If my hon. Friend will forgive me, I do not want to give way too often, and I must make headway on this point.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: It is an important point.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I shall give way after I have made this point.

The reaction of the Argentine representatives at Berne was repeated explicitly by President Alfonsin when he spoke at the General Assembly of the United Nations on 24 September last year. His Foreign Minister said publicly in December that negotiation must be about an indivisible package, which must include sovereignty, and the Argentine Government have since maintained that position. The Select Committee deals with the matter in its report, saying:

> "It is clear that when referring to negotiations on sovereignty, the new Argentine Government is pursuing a policy essentially no different from that of its predecessors: that such negotiations, once begun, must lead eventually and inevitably to the relinquishment of the United Kingdom's claim to and administration of the Falklands."

It is the indivisibility of that link, as set out in all the approaches made to the subject by the Argentine Government, that is so totally contrary to any sensible foundation for discussion of other matters. It is for that reason that we have been trying to find a way of discussing those other matters. We agree with the assessment that was made by the Select Committee.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: I am most grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend for giving way. I wanted to refer to the point that the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) made in his intervention. Will my right hon. and learned Friend remind the House that the right to self-defence does not depend on the United Nations charter, and antedates by centuries beyond mind the United Nations charter?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am sure that my hon. Friend is right about that. In so far as his intervention fortifies my position, I am grateful for it.

Those who call on us to negotiate on the sovereignty of the Falkland Islands should consider what exactly it is that they are asking us to do. For Argentina, such negotiations are intended to have only one outcome: the transfer of sovereignty, irrespective of the wishes of the islanders. It is for precisely that reason that we have devoted so much effort to finding a basis for direct talks with Argentina on a range of practical issues, where progress is possible to the benefit of both sides. Quite frankly, that is the only realistic policy, and we shall persevere with it.

Earlier this year we transmitted the latest in the series of messages that we have been exchanging with the Argentines through the protecting powers. The details must remain confidential. But that message once again put forward practical steps that would enable confidence to be re-established between our two peoples. We look to the Argentines for a constructive reply.

The improvement of commercial and economic relations is a natural starting point. Both sides have a clear interest in improved trade. The Argentine Government have publicly stressed the need to increase their exports as a contribution to tackling their daunting economic problems. They could take a major step forward by agreeing to the reciprocal lifting of the trade embargo that has been in place since the conflict. Both Her Majesty's Government and the European Community have several times proposed that course.

As I have already explained to the House, we have been continuously helpful in our approach to the international arrangements for the rescheduling of Argentina's official debt in the Paris Club. When we come to follow that up bilaterally, our approach will be similarly positive.

We have made plain too, and on a number of occasions, that we would be ready to see a visit to the Falklands by the next-of-kin of Argentine servicemen who lost their lives there in 1982. We have recently reiterated to the Argentine Government our readiness to accept a genuinely humanitarian visit by next-of-kin.

The House will, I am sure, be glad to acknowledge that on almost all of those subjects we are working on lines that have been specifically endorsed by the Select Committee.

It is encouraging that the Select Committee has taken the same view as the Government on so many of the subjects about which I have been speaking. The Committee's support fortifies us in our resolve both to fulfil our commitments to the islanders and to persevere in the search for better relations with Argentina. I am confident that those twin objectives will commend themselves very widely to the House.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not want to be gratuitously rude either to the House or to the Foreign Secretary, but after his speech he really should listen to the replies, not from myself——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. I think that in a sense the hon. Gentleman is raising a point of debate rather than a point of order.

Mr. Dalyell: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman must come quickly to his point of order for me.

Mr. Dalyell: I should like to say this in the presence of the Foreign Secretary. Bluntly—I am putting this as politely as I can—the right hon. and learned Gentleman has got his priorities wrong. There are other people who will dine with President Mubarak and wear a white tie and tails, but it is important from the point of view of the House of Commons that the right hon. and learned Gentleman should hear, if not what I say, what his colleagues say.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman knows that that is not a point of order for the Chair.

7.46 pm

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): The Opposition welcome this opportunity to discuss the future of the Falkland Islands, notwithstanding the slight hiccup at the start of the debate, for which I must apologise to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to the whole House. The official Opposition accept that the Foreign Secretary has other prior engagements, and we are grateful to him for informing us in advance.

I also wish to put on record our thanks to the members of the Committee for their work, particularly the Chairman, the hon. Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw), an old friend and sparring partner of mine, although I do not think he will be surprised to hear that we do not agree with all his conclusions. In fact, one of the remarkable things about the report is that the Committee seems to have provided some conclusions which are likely to be acceptable to us and others which are more likely to be acceptable to the Government. It is interesting to note that it is only the latter that are referred to in detail in the Government's response to the Committee's report.

Without diminishing the importance of the issues surrounding the sinking of the General Belgrano — I have been involved with them, too, along with my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) — we consider that this matter—the achievement of a stable, acceptable solution to the future of the Falklands—is of even greater importance.

It is our view that fortress Falklands is untenable. It is not in the islanders' real interest. It is enormously expensive in money, in international relations and in its distortion of our defence commitment. Fortress Falklands has been regularly rejected by previous Governments. The Franks report summed it up well when it said:

"On every occasion that a new government — or new Ministers—came into office a full range of policy options was put before them. In every case Ministers made a decision of policy and chose to seek a negotiated settlement that would be acceptable to Argentina and to the Islanders. Without exception they rejected the alternative of 'Fortress Falklands', which would have involved the isolation of the Islands from Argentina and probably from the rest of Latin America."

On the distortion of our defence commitment, in its third report, in Session 1982-83, the Select Committee on Defence expressed the hope that the commitment in the South Atlantic would not "indefinitely absorb an unduly large part of scarce defence resources."

It also expressed concern that

"if continued at present levels"

it

"would represent a substantial burden on the defence budget and the economy."

The reduction in recurrent expenditure which the Foreign Secretary and the Defence Secretary have predicted when the airport is completed will not be substantial.

Fortress Falklands in its present form represents over 3 per cent. of the defence budget. With the escalating cost of Trident, the difficulties within the Alliance over the amount of British expenditure on NATO's conventional forces and the difficulty which the Government know only too well is involved in sustaining any real growth in the defence budget, 3 per cent. is a significant sum.

On the wider front, with prescription charges now having been raised to £2 to bring in only £17 million, with the trauma of Conservative Members up in arms over saving a mere £10 million on student grants and with the prospect of the Chancellor of the Exchequer levying value added tax on almost anything that moves, just to raise revenue, options which could avoid continuing expenditure of this kind in the South Atlantic must be given serious consideration by the Government. Conservative Members who tend to be more impressed by public opinion than by finance may find the results of the Gallup poll carried out last autumn to be more convincing. The British people, in a ratio of three to one, considered that the cost of fortress Falklands was both too great and undesirable.

The Government's policy on the Falklands is peculiarly instransigent. They are willing to discuss and have already transferred sovereignty over albeit a small part of Hong Kong to the Communist Government of China. What is even more relevant, they are also discussing with the Spanish Government the possible transfer of the sovereignty of Gibraltar. Although the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs is not sure

"how far the word of Senor Alfonsin's Government can be regarded as an Argentine bond", in the case of Spain—also a relatively recent democracy—no such question has, rightly, been raised. It is difficult to see why such a question is raised in the case of Argentina.

Recent military appointments in Argentina ought to demonstrate to the Government that President Alfonsin is in charge of events in his country. In January 1983 the right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym), the then Foreign Secretary, said that if Argentina returned to democracy that would be a "big change" and "an advance". He continued:

"Equally, or more important, is if there was a Government there which paid due respect to human rights."

On both criteria Argentina has advanced. I am sure that the right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East would be the first to agree about that. Both Houses of Argentina's legislature are elected. Argentina's head of state is also democratically elected. Amnesty International has commended the vast improvement in its human rights record. Why are the Government not prepared to acknowledge this? Do they not see that by turning our back on such a democracy and by failing to recognise such advances we are in danger of undermining Argentina?

It is nonsense for the Foreign Secretary and the Government to repeat, parrot fashion, that they are willing to discuss bilateral normalisation of relations between Britain and Argentina, when the Foreign Secretary and the Government know—it is so obviously central—that a prerequisite for any such discussions is some agreement to discuss also the future of the islands. I choose that phrase carefully. Argentina is not saying that it must be top of the agenda, or even that the detailed nature of such discussions must be agreed in advance, but that there should be an open agenda which would allow the future of the islands to be discussed eventually. Why is that unreasonable?

Even our former ambassador to the United States, Sir Nicholas Henderson, who was brought out of retirement by the Government to undertake that important task, said in evidence to the Select Committee:

"Let us sit down together with an open agenda so that we can define what we are going to discuss later on . . . I think that is a good basis upon which to approach this subject."

We recognise that both Governments made a genuine attempt at Berne to try to get talks under way. There are differing accounts of why the talks were interrupted. But just because the formula at Berne did not succeed, that should not be an excuse for not looking at other formulae which can deal with the sticking point of sovereignty. Indeed, it would be considered very strange if, having been willing to try once, the Government continued to reject any other ways of trying to resolve the dispute.

From my visit to Buenos Aires, and from conversations that I have had with Falklanders and Argentines, I believe that it would be possible to move towards a solution which was acceptable to both Britain and Argentina and which would protect the interests of the islanders, which we consider to be important. The Foreign Secretary will, I hope, have received a copy of the communiqué from the Maryland conference which was attended by one of his hon. Friends and me. Parliamentarians from Britain and Argentina and an observer from the Falklands Government met one another at that conference. I hope that the Foreign Secretary will respond soon, if not today, to the positive suggestions contained in the agreement arising from the Maryland conference.

At Maryland we said that progress towards an agreement between Britain and Argentina was not incompatible with respect for the wishes of the islanders. The Argentines put their names to that. They said that they would respect the wishes of the islanders. It emerged that when the Argentines talks about sovereignty they mean something very different from what we think they mean. They are more concerned with titular sovereignty. My hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George) was at that conference. He will confirm that the Argentines are more concerned with titular sovereignty—with the flag, the colour on the map and with their pride, which we ought to understand. They believe that the transfer of sovereignty need not mean a change of life for the islanders.

Dante Caputo, the Argentine Foreign Minister, confirmed this in the "Brass Tacks" programme on 12 December 1984, when he said:

"I believe that it is entirely acceptable that the inhabitants of the islands should decide forms of administration, of education, and forms of social organisations best suited to their interests."

More recently, in an interview in The Times, he spoke about the possibility of a dialogue rather than negotiations. That is not the hostile, intransigent picture of the Argentines that the Foreign Secretary has painted. Why, the Opposition ask, are the Government unwilling even to discuss options which might satisfy Argentine claims and continue to preserve the way of life of the islanders, without the need for an expensive fortress on the islands? Are we wise—there can be changes in this country as well as in Argentina—to let the islanders believe that the enormous costs, in every sense, of fortress Falklands can be or will be maintained for ever? Is this not, in reality, a cruel deception of the islanders?

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): The hon. Gentleman said that there could be a change of Government in this country as well as in Argentina. Yes, indeed, and that is what worries me. There has been democratic government in Argentina and there has been dictatorship in Argentina. How can the hon. Gentleman or anybody else guarantee that there will not again be a relapse from a peace-loving democracy to an aggressive dictatorship?

Mr. Foulkes: I cannot guarantee that in Argentina. I cannot guarantee it in Spain either where we are discussing the future of Gibraltar. The faint possibility of Senor Alfonsin's Government being undermined increases if we are not seen to be having discussions with a democratically elected Government in Argentina.

The islanders, closer as they are to the situation than any of us, are more aware of the reality than are the Government, and they recognise that other options may need to be considered by them.

The United Kingdom Falkland Islands committee, in evidence to the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, said that its "favoured solution" was a "variant of the constitutional position of Andorra".

So it is looking at other options. In the "Brass Tacks" programme, Alastair Cameron, the Falkland Islands Government representative in the United Kingdom who was with us in Maryland, said:

"it was up to the British Government to provide a policy and to give it then to the islanders to discuss".

That is also what the right hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley) said as Under-Secretary of State at the time.

Incidentally, in the same programme representatives of the associations of parents of the Falklands dead confirmed that they would not consider it a betrayal of their sons if we were to talk to Argentina about the future of the islands.

However, instead of embarking on such a positive approach, certain actions of the Government have been interpreted as moving backwards rather than forwards—the Prime Minister's quasi-regal Christmas message to the islanders, the sudden granting of oil prospecting rights to Firstland Oil and Gas, and particularly the publicity surrounding the publication of the new draft constitution.

On that last matter, will the Under-Secretary of State confirm when he replies what the Prime Minister has already said in her letter to the leader of the Social Democratic party that that constitution gives no veto to the islanders over any future change in the status of the islands, and, in that matter, respecting the wishes and the interests of the islanders, this Parliament is and will remain sovereign?

To pretend that the new constitution is a great advance for democracy — a democracy which we fought to protect — on the islands is nonsense. Under the new constitution the islands remain firmly under colonial administration. I suppose that we must accept that it is appropriate to acknowledge that by restoring the title of governor.

Let us imagine that we are talking about another country, even a South American country. The president of that country would have power to preside over meetings of the Parliament; prorogue or dissolve the Parliament at any time under his own discretion; control the public service; approve the Parliament's standing orders; give assent to laws; declare a Bill to have been passed whether or not the Parliament approves; be the executive authority; summon the Cabinet, have sole control over the Cabinet's agenda; by-pass the obligation to consult the Cabinet; act against the Cabinet's advice; dispose of land; appoint judges; and be totally exempt from judicial review of his actions. That power would be relished by any dictator of any country. That is the power given under the new constitution, which is supposed to be an advance in democracy, to the governor of the islands. To pretend that that is any real advance in democracy is nonsense.

The pretence at any real interest in the future of the individual islanders is shown up by the Government's approach to the economic development of the islands. It is not the rosy picture that the Foreign Secretary painted earlier. First, there are serious doubts, whatever the Foreign Secretarry may say, about the extent to which the airport will be available for civilian use. Will the Minister give us an assurance when he replies that the use of the airport for civilian purposes will not be impeded unnecessarily either by military use or by excessively high costs? In particular, why have the Government, as was revealed in a written reply to me, refused the subsidy for civilian use which the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs said would be necessary? Will that encourage the economic development of the islands?

Secondly, will the Minister confirm his answer to me of 30 January that there are no proposals for civilian flights, whatever the Foreign Secretary may have said in his introduction? The 1982 Shackleton report considered that to be of the highest priority. Will he explain why there are none?

Finally, will the Minister reply to the Select Committee's criticisms — not mine — that the Falkland Islands Development Corporation, which ought to be an "urgent response" to a "critical situation", is instead proceeding at what is described as a "funereal pace"? Why is that the case? Does that show concern for the development of the islands?

It is the Opposition's view that the intransigence of the Government, particularly the Prime Minister, on this issue is expensive, damaging to our international relations, against public opinion in the United Kingdom, distorts our defence commitment, and, above all, is against the long-term interest of the islanders.

We specifically call for a simultaneous declaration by Argentina of the formal ending of hostilities and a lifting by Britain of the protection zone—simultaneous, agreed in advance—which was accepted by the Prime Minister in January last year. We regret that the White Paper seems to have backtracked on that.

We urge the Government to seek a resumption of the talks interrupted at Berne and the restoration of diplomatic relations between Britain and Argentina.

I ask the Foreign Secretary, back hotfoot — or perhaps coldfoot—from the Soviet Union, why, since he is able, rightly, to discuss major issues, as he has done, with leaders of a country with a system very different from our own, he is so unable even to meet and discuss with a sister Western democracy which we now know Argentina is.

Above all, we remind the Government that the true interests of the islanders will not be served if they are for ever isolated from their nearest neighbours on mainland South America.

8.6 pm

Sir Anthony Kershaw (Stroud): I shall deal with some of the points that the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) has deployed with his usual eloquence. However, I fear that I may not be in entire agreement with all of them.

I have no doubt that the British claim to sovereignty over the Falklands is sound in law. It must be granted that the various claims made before 1833 and the landings that took place present a somewhat confusing picture. The British occupation in 1833 was a legitimate and legally respectable action, which, having been followed by continuous occupation and administration, enthusiastically supported by the population, makes undeniably good our legal claim to sovereignty. The fact that the Argentines believe the opposite is irrelevant.

Mr. Foulkes: Why, therefore, is the first conclusion of the report that the Committee could not come to a decision on the respective claims of sovereignty? Is the hon. Gentleman distancing himself from the first and main conclusion of the report?

Sir Anthony Kershaw: The hon. Gentleman knows from his experience on the Committee that we are a democratic assembly. The Chairman does not necessarily endorse everything that goes on in that Committee. Nor does the Chairman have a vote, unless there is a tie, which there was not.

The Argentine invasion in no way alters the validity of their claim, but it did alter the feelings of the inhabitants, who were even more determined, especially after having seen the way in which the Argentine officers treated their troops, never to submit themselves to that kind of treatment. It would be intolerable for Britain to hand the islanders back to such a Government.

It is said that the new Argentine Government is so much better and more democratic than the old one that we should bolster their prestige and hand back the islanders to them. I see no reason whatever why we should do such a thing.

In the first place, I am not confident—any more than my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison)—that the democratic Government in the Argentine will survive for long. Inflation is running at 1,000 per cent per annum, resentful and revengeful armed forces are waiting in the wings, there is continued administrative incompetence, and a vast foreign debt has been recklessly incurred in a country that has a history of revolutions and coup d'etats that is remarkable even by South American standards. None of those things leads me to suppose that a long period of benign and peaceful domestic bliss lies ahead in the Argentine, whether or not we hand over our fellow citizens. Who knows what sort of regime will succeed it?

Secondly, the conduct of this democratic Government of the Argentine has been so unfriendly towards us that it is hard to see them behaving properly to our people in the Falklands. For example, they refuse to say that the war is over. They maintain trade and other barriers against us. They have rearmed, and still are rearming, with sophisticated weapons of aggression. They also maintain, with a vigour no less strident than that of the junta that they displaced, that they alone have the right to sovereignty over not only the Falklands but the dependencies as well — the last claim being historically and legally preposterous.

Finally, when, in Berne, we offered talks—having arranged in advance how we should deal with the sovereignty issue—the Argentines went back on the agreement as soon as they got to the table, proving yet again what unreliable interlocutors they continue to be. When the Argentines say that they want to negotiate sovereignty, they mean that they want to fix a date for the handover. Until they realise that that is not on offer, it is pointless talking about lease-back or other modifications. If we talk about lease-back, we shall at once give away the sovereignty position. As the Argentine position is as I have described it, there is no point in holding other negotiations on other matters.

There is, of course, the problem that we have every year with the United Nations. There will be a resolution inviting us to negotiate face to face with the Argentines. The Argentines—in my opinion deceitfully—say that they are anxious to do that. But despite the misgivings voiced by my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary this evening, I believe that there are some unilateral steps that could be valuable and would show the world that we are peaceful and co-operative in our intentions.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Before my hon. Friend leaves that point on sovereigny, will he share with us his thoughts on the following point? If even titular sovereignty were transferred and the Argentine then broke every other agreement and moved in its armed forces, we could not move our armed forces in without invading Argentine territory.

Sir Anthony Kershaw: My hon. Friend is perfectly right. The basis of negotiations for the future must lie in a certain trust, and I confess that I have not got that trust in the present Argentine Government or in any Government likely to succeed them.

There are individual things that we could give away without danger to ourselves or to the Falkland Islanders. I believe that there is room to negotiate about the protection zone and that we can co-operate over natural resources. Indeed, I was glad to hear my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary suggest that something is being done in that regard, albeit cautiously. We can, and obviously will, reduce the garrison once the airport is in operation. Those things would certainly help our position vis-a-vis other South American countries.

I should like to add my congratulations about the airport. It is a remarkable feat of construction, and the work has been done far quicker and at less expense than at one time seemed possible. The Government do not differ fundamentally from the Select Committee about the direction in which we think that developments should go. Of course, we ask for more speed. It is always up to the Legislature to urge the Executive along that path, but we realise that the distance is great and that development opportunities are comparatively scant. The only really big new investment available is, I suppose, deep sea fishing, but at present neither the Government nor the Committee can quite see how that can be exploited. However, it should be done not only for political but for technical reasons, as soon as we have a little more information about it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Spence) has publicly suggested recently that some of the difficulties about enlargement of the EC in relation to Spain might be overcome by an accord with Spain about fishing. Perhaps that could be investigated.

A Select Committee should, and must, range far wider in discussion than a Goverment should or can do. In our paper we discuss several possibilities, of which I understand the Government do not approve. In the end, the Select Committee and everyone else must allow the facts to speak for themselves. The fact is that this country would find it totally unacceptable to hand over its fellow citizens on the Falklands to any alien power, let alone the Argentine. The hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley suggested that this country wanted to do that, but he is absolutely wrong. All experience teaches us that that is quite impossible. Of course, one would not expect the Falklanders to agree to being handed over. But every time a Minister—whether Labour or Conservative—has even suggested that we might do that, he has been, to coin a phrase, happy to escape in his underwear. It was terrible that my right hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley) should have been put up to make such suggestions. It was perfectly clear that neither this House nor the other House would agree to such a handover. The Falklands are, and will remain, very expensive, but there is a price to pay for liberty. It is, I trust, a price that this country will always be prepared to pay.

8.16 pm

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): In many ways the House is holding one of its more important debates and, in a sense, I regret the time and the way in which we are discussing the subject.

My first comments relate to the Select Committee's report. I do not believe that in 1977 the Government entered into negotiations with Argentina over the Falkland Islands because we doubted the British claim to sovereignty over those islands. I certainly challenge that assumption in the Select Committee's report. I know that there is a detailed and difficult legal tangle, but, having been deeply involved in those negotiations, I can say that I did not at any time feel that we did not have an honourable claim in international law to sovereignty over the Falkland Islands. It is still my belief that we have such a claim. With that point of agreement with the Government under my belt, I turn to a fundamental area of disagreement.

Both the House and the country will come to regret that in the aftermath of the successful retaking of the Falklands we did not use that opportunity of maximum international diplomatic strength to lay down the direction in which we felt it reasonable for the Falklands to go. I believe that as the months and years pass we will once again find ourselves in an untenable position in maintaining an absolutist affirmation that the Falkland Islands are a dependent territory of the United Kingdom. Thus, it is not just a question of legal interpretation and of what we believe. It is noteworthy that no Government have yet been prepared to test this issue in the international courts.

It is worth remembering that President Alfonsin has not only proved his democratic credentials in opposition and in government, but has solved the Beagle channel dispute with Chile, over which both countries nearly went to war in 1979. He held a national referendum on his solution, and 79 per cent. of the electorate voted for it. Only this morning, the Argentine Senate ratified the treaty. President Alfonsin is going to Washington tomorrow to persuade the Americans to have a better understanding of the Falklands problem. There is a grave danger, therefore, that over the succeeding years it will become at first an irritant and then a major cause of division between Britian and the United States, and Britain and our European allies, about how we handled the Falklands. They simply do not understand why we will not grapple with the issue of sovereignty.

I make no secret of the fact that I would not transfer sovereignty to Argentina. I believe that there are penalties for armed aggression. Where one might have been prepared to contemplate such a solution before, it is not possible now. I must make it clear that when in office I was never prepared to contemplate it. I never accepted lease-back, and have great difficulty with it. The furthest that I was prepared to go was a sharing of sovereignty.

In those days, one of the options that I thought was most hopeful was that sovereignty over the uninhabited islands would be transferred to Argentina, and the inhabited islands—the greater space, I admit—would remain with Britain, with a shared economic unit covering all the islands, inhabited and uninhabited, and the territorial waters. That may not be possible to negotiate, although I still think that no Government should rule out a shared sovereignty solution. It has great potential. The Foreign Secretary stuck to a form of words which made it impossible to discover what he meant. He said that we were not prepared to discuss sovereignty, and then said that there were many other ways of solving the problem. It is fair enough to say that we will not discuss the transfer of sovereignty.

I do not favour the open agenda. That is a source of misunderstanding. There might not be a problem for the first year or two, but down the track are all the problems, anxieties and misapprehensions such as those which led to the invasion of the Falkland Islands. It would be clearer for the Government to say that transfer of sovereignty is out, but that they are prepared to discuss all the different options of shared sovereignty and of vesting sovereignty of the Falkland Islands in an international body.

The United Nations charter was invoked constantly in the House, by both sides, as the justification for our sending the task force and then for using it, and rightly so, but in the aftermath of victory the Government have not shown the same commitment to the UN charter. That charter instructs all member states to resolve their problems by peaceful negotiation. To refuse to use the charter in its entirety—to use it when it suits, but not to use it when it is not satisfactory—is an absolute recipe for international cynicism and despair. Having used the UN charter to our advantage, we must live with it in areas which we may find somewhat difficult.

Chapter 13 of the charter gives power for trusteeship. In particular, the charter sets out an alternative system for strategic trust territories. This was included because the United States Government, and especially the Defence Department, were unwilling to subject the Japanese occupied islands to a normal system of trusteeship, on the ground that those islands could be essential to US defence, and the United States therefore wanted an ultimate safeguard about what happened to them. Micronesia thus became the only strategic trust territory.

The main difference from the normal system was that it was laid down under article 82(3) that the functions of the United Nations in supervising such territories would in that case be exercised by the Security Council. That is vital, because it means that Britain, which would never be able to command an automatic majority in the General Assembly, would be able to use its veto in the Security Council. If we were to use article 82 for a strategic trust territory, we would be able to safeguard it.

The administration might well be vested in the Organisation of American States. I do not need to remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman that the OAS contains the United States and a number of Commonwealth countries. Within the United Nations system, regional organisations are often used. Of course, the problem that we face in any vesting of sovereignty in an international body is whether Argentina, under a different regime, would tear up all its obligations and simply invade. We must face the fact that that could happen again. I believe that Argentina will remain a democracy, but I cannot guarantee it. That is why I want a strategic trust territory if we are to vest sovereignty in an international body. Perhaps we need not use the charter, but could make an agreement with the Secretary General. I would still want the safeguard of the Security Council. Furthermore, I would want a peacekeeping safeguard so that Argentina could not under a different regime tear up its obligations.

We would need a purely token peacekeeping presence. It need not be a great size. We would not need a greater number of marines than were there before the invasion —perhaps fewer would suffice. The crucial point—this might satisfy the right hon. and learned Gentleman—is that no British Government will take seriously a peacekeeping force, even a token force, for preserving sovereignty vested in an international body unless there is a credible country associated with it. For us the absolute touchstone is that it should involve the United States—even if only a couple of marines are included—and a few Commonwealth countries: Argentina could be satisfied by the inclusion of other countries. Hon. Members may decide that they do not want that, but it is only one option. It would save face all round. No country would retain sovereignty. If the Government object to shared sovereignty, it is a solution.

Why do I believe that it is necessary to grapple with the issue of sovereignty? We must remember Antarctica. The real problem behind all this is the Antarctic treaty, involving the vast continent of Antarctica and its economic, commercial, strategic and social implications. This is one of the most precious treaties. I do not believe that it would be possible to negotiate it now. It has 31 signatories, but there are many anomalies. For example, Chile, Argentina and Britain are claiming the same territories. Let the House not forget the military force that went down to Southern Thule in 1976. Let us not forget the potential of Argentina to operate in areas where we would find it immensely difficult to do anything about it. Then let us consider the relationship between the Falklands and Antarctica.

I come to the documents which we are being asked to consider. The Government are making a great mistake in not keeping separate the constitutions of the Falklands Islands and South Georgia and the Sandwich Islands. They are constitutionally different. It is vital that we assert in the House that they are separate elements. The Government have made a great mistake in listening to the Falkland Islanders on this. Let them listen to the islanders on all aspects affecting security and negotiations with Argentina. I do not believe that we should make a move without consulting them as fully as possible. I think that I can fairly claim about the period when I was Foreign Secretary that neither I nor the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) ever made a move in negotiation without Kelpers knowing full well what we were doing. But they have no right to tell us how we should handle the constitution of Sandwich and South Georgia.

The Government and the House will rue this. I hope that the Minister will tell us that the Government will think again about this. I, too, apologise for the fact that I may not be here for the reply to the debate. The Government are making a mistake. It is necessary to point out to Alfonsin and others in Argentina that there is a separation. As recently as June 1984 President Alfonsin said that his claim was not just to the Falklands, but to the South Georgia, the Antarctic peninsular and to the Scotia sea. Successive Governments have long wanted a constitutional separation. I know what the Foreign Office legal advice to Ministers would have been—to separate the constitutions.

The Government have bent to pressure from the Falkland Islanders on the issue. Let them have a named governor. The office of commissioner was never an attractive idea. Let them have some other things, but not this. Let us go back and separate the constitutions. I believe that that is the will of the House. By doing so the Government would be making it clear that we will not give any ground on our claim to Antarctica and that we are prepared to see the whole series of problems in the wider context of Antarctica. The treaty will come up for review in 1991. It is fragile, and major concessions will have to be made. There will have to be adjustments to the treaty over the next few years to ensure greater clarity. We cannot achieve that if we are in a state of war with Argentina.

A fortress Falklands would be economical and political nonsense. Nobody denies what must happen now. We have to spend money on an airfield, but to go on planning, in perpetuity, to keep a squadron of Phantoms on the Falkland Islands is nonsense. But that will have to happen if we continue armed hostilities with Argentina. The Argentines have only to scramble their aircraft every six months for us not to dare to take away our Phantoms. This is an extraordinary diversion of scarce and expensive resources. It means that we do not live in the real world. That is why our allies wonder what we are up to.

We understand the Prime Minister's problem. She was the first British Prime Minister to offer to give away the sovereignty of the Falkland Islands. She allowed her junior Ministers to give the impression to the Falkland Islanders and to the Argentine negotiators that she was prepared to contemplate lease-backing. The Government crossed the threshold of sovereignty.

I refuse to listen to lectures from the Prime Minister about the sovereignty of the Falkland Islands. I held the position against the transfer of the Falklands' sovereignty through difficult and different circumstances and through the military threat that we faced in 1977. The Prime Minister must now be got off the hook. I urge the Minister gradually to move her off the hook. I hope that he will say to her "By all means be categorical. You will not transfer sovereignty to the Argentine, but hold open your options on either vesting sovereignty in an international body, or ensuring an arrangement for shared sovereignty." Anything else is frankly dangerous and ludicrous, and would create considerable international tension.

8.31 pm

Sir Peter Blaker (Blackpool, South): The right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) is wrong in saying that the Prime Minister was the first British Prime Minister to be prepared to cede sovereignty over the Falkland Islands to Argentina. I refer him to paragraph 29 of the Select Committee report which refers to the statement by Mr. Michael Stewart in 1967. The report states:

"for the first time he stated formally to Argentina that they"—that is, the then British Government—"would be prepared to cede sovereignty over the Islands under certain conditions, provided that the wishes of the Islanders were respected."

I mention that only to put the record straight.

I was pleased at the robust line taken by my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw). It was notably more robust than the line taken by the Select Committee. I regret, and I am surprised, that the Select Committee was unable to reach any categorical conclusion about sovereignty over the Falkland Islands. The reasons for this seem to have been twofold: first, their doubt whether in 1833 Captain Onslow succeeded in persuading the Argentines, who were then on the islands, to leave peacefully or by force; and, secondly, the fact that in the 19th century and, to some extent, in this century the Argentines have protested about the British presence on the islands.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): That was not the reason. The Select Committee did not consider itself to be an appropriate court of international law and was therefore not prepared to inquire as if it were.

Sir Peter Blaker: It is a pity that the Select Committee did not say that. I am concerned about the impression that the Select Committee report made in Buenos Aires. I am sure that it will have made an even stronger impression there than it did here, after reports in the newspapers, that the Select Committee was in doubt about the question of sovereignty. If my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) is right, the Committee should have made that clear in its report.

Mr. Foulkes: The Foreign Affairs Committee might not consider itself to be an international court or a body capable of making such judgments. Might the International Commission of Jurists be such a body? It came to the same conclusion as the Select Committee that valid claims about sovereignty can be made by both Britain and Argentina.

Sir Peter Blaker: With respect to that body, I am not as persuaded by its remarks, which I have not read, as by the remarks of the Government in their White Paper in response to the Select Committee report. Paragraph 3 of the White Paper states:

"Britain's title is derived from early settlement, reinforced by formal claims in the name of the Crown and completed by open, continuous, effective and peaceful possession, occupation and administration of the Islands since 1833 . . . The exercise of sovereignty by the United Kingdom over the Falkland Islands has, furthermore, consistently been shown to accord with the wishes of the Islanders, expressed through their democratically elected representatives."

I am not an expert in international law, but over 30 years I have had some acquaintance with diplomatic matters. Those words certainly strike me as being consistent with the general line adopted by successive British Governments on questions of sovereignty when sovereignty is in dispute.

Did the Committee consider the effect of its report in Argentina? I cannot imagine that it has been helpful. Did it consider the wider implications of that remark about sovereignty?

I recall a conference that I attended in 1964 with my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Thomas) when he was Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office and I was his private secretary. The conference was with the Somalis, and with the Kenyans who were about to become independent. With us were Tom Mboya, Mr. Gichuru, Mr. Murumbi and other Kenyan Ministers. The question at issue was the future of the northern frontier district of Kenya which was claimed by Somalia on grounds of race and history.

My right hon. and learned Friend, who led our delegation, wisely asked the Kenyan Ministers to speak and to take a large part of the burden of putting the British case. They said that if one started to reopen borders and questions of sovereignty on the ground that the territory concerned had been acquired by force or because people had been making claims to that territory over past decades and centuries there would be no limit to what we would have to do to the international map. The Kenyan Ministers said "Look at the map of Africa. Every country has a territorial dispute with its neighbour. If you concede the Somali claim on the ground of history you will have to concede all sorts of claims in Africa's 50 or so countries because practically every country in Africa has a territorial claim."

The same can be said of South America. Argentina has a territorial dispute with almost all of its neighbours. Round the world territorial disputes are based upon history. I think of Vietnam and China, Vietnam and Cambodia, Thailand and Cambodia, Venezuela and Guyana. I mention a few disputes which occurred to me in five minutes' thought before I came into the Chamber. I think of the Soviet Union and Japan, Rumania and Hungary, Germany and Poland, India and China. Where do we stop?

The implication of the Select Committee report is that if there is doubt about our sovereignty over the Falkland Islands because of the factors to which it refers there must be doubt in many countries. I cannot believe that it wishes that implication to be drawn.

Mr. Peter Thomas (Hendon, South): I well remember the meeting that we had in Rome 20 years ago. My right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker) is right. We had to consider whether the Somali Government had any right to part of the northern frontier district of Kenya. It is quite true that a very strong line was taken by the Kenyan members of our delegation about how impossible it would be if one were to alter those lines which were drawn quite firmly by the colonial rulers in the past on the map of Africa. It is quite true that there are many similar barriers between countries which were drawn in that way.

This, surely, is different. The historical quality of the claims which are put forward by both Argentina and Britain are based on 1833, and the argument which has gone on and which was put before our predecessor Committee was so conflicting and so complicated that we as a Committee were unable to reach what we considered to be a categorical conclusion. It did not mean that we did not think that we had a case; it just meant that, having taken on the task—which we probably should not have done—of trying to look into the historical background we were unable to reach a categorical conclusion. But we made it perfectly clear that by reason of the invasion in 1982 the whole situation had changed; that whatever the strength of the Argentine claim its invasion had changed the situation and its position had been damaged.

Sir Peter Blaker: I am very much obliged to my right hon. and learned Friend for that explanation, which elaborates on the point made by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence). It is useful that that point, which relates to the role which the Committee took upon itself, has been made. It is important, bearing that in mind, that we make it clear in this debate what we really believe, because the record of this debate will no doubt be read in Buenos Aires. I believe that we should assert the fact that, since we have had, in the words of paragraph 3 of the Government's reply,

"open, continuous effective and peaceful possession, occupation and administration . . . since 1983", we have a valid claim to sovereignty. It is certainly a very much longer claim than that made by the Kenyan Ministers at the conference to which we were referring. We were talking then about a much shorter period than 150 years.

Referring to the question whether we should be prepared to discuss sovereignty with Argentina, I welcome the fact that the Committee said in paragraph 96 that what it had reported in the previous paragraph

"does not mean that the United Kingdom Government should now agree to the inclusion of the 'sovereignty issue', as at present defined by Argentina, on the agenda for talks in the immediate future".

I would have wished the Committee to go further, because there are certain passages in the Committee's report which are in danger of misleading Argentina. I do not believe that we can possibly discuss sovereignty with Argentina in the foreseeable future because I do not think that the public of this country would tolerate it. I believe that if we started to discuss sovereignty with Argentina there would be uproar. There certainly would be in my constituency and, I suspect, in many other constituencies.

Mr. Foulkes: How does the right hon. Member explain the results of the two Gallup polls held at the end of last year which showed that the vast majority of the British people would be prepared for the Government to enter into discussions about sovereignty? Those polls represented the views of the people. I think that the right hon. Member is completely out of touch.

Sir Peter Blaker: We are not governed, fortunately, by Gallup poll. I think that the Gallup poll is wrong about what the reaction of the public would be if we started to discuss sovereignty with Argentina in any meaningful way.

The right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) suggested that we should be prepared to contemplate shared sovereignty. I have some experience of shared sovereignty because I was responsible a few years ago for the New Hebrides. I have been concerned with some difficult diplomatic problems in the past 30 years, but that was worse than anything I have ever experienced. That involved only two countries sharing sovereignty. The right hon. Gentleman is suggesting, apparently, that the administration of the Falklands should be shared by the countries of the OAS. The mind boggles at the confusion that would result.

Dr. Owen: Eleven trustee states.

Sir Peter Blaker: The right hon. Gentleman is reinforcing my point.

One of the various points considered in the report is that since we were prepared to discuss sovereignty before 1982 we should be prepared to discuss it now. It is clear from what has been said already in the House that the war of 1982 changed all that. One of the things that it did—and I do not think that this has been sufficiently brought out—was to give the Falkland Islanders experience of Argentine rule. If they were reluctant to have sovereignty discussed before — and they were — they are triply reluctant now in view of that experience.

I support the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud made about the relevance or otherwise of the fact that Argentina is now a democracy. Of course, we welcome that fact and hope that it will remain a democracy, but the record shows that in this century no democratically elected Government in Argentina has completed its term. I am not sure that that is absolutely correct—there may be exceptions—but the general rule has been that democracy has been of short duration.

The Argentine Foreign Minister was reported in The Times on 11 March to have made the point that the militarisation of the islands has made the Falklands a strategic target. I think that he has scored an own goal by that remark. One of the things that we have to bear in mind is that the Falklands are potentially of strategic importance in the context of Antarctica—a point to which the right hon. Member for Devonport referred. If Antarctica is important, I cannot understand why that should be an argument for our giving up sovereignty or sharing sovereignty or, indeed, for reducing our forces in the Falklands. If the Panama canal were to be closed everybody would suddenly realise that the Falklands were of strategic importance and wonder why they had not thought of it before.

The tone of the report is more apologetic and pessimistic than I would have wished. It is a pity that in paragraph 94 the Committee says:

"the present situation, although understandable in the short term, can only offer an uncertain future for the Islands in the long term and . . . some kind of accommodation with Argentina is not only inevitable, in view of the cost of the present policy to the United Kingdom, but also desirable".

It goes on to elaborate on that point.

Again, one has to ask what the effect is on the Argentines if they read that sort of remark. They will read that and other remarks in paragraphs 96 and 98 of the report as showing that our resolve to retain sovereignty over the Falkland Islands is less than firm. People in Argentina will be reading into the general tone of this report an assumption on the part of the Committee that, even though we may not be prepared to discuss sovereignty now, we will be prepared to do so before long.

Is it not possible, if that is the conclusion that is drawn in Argentina, that it will make the Argentines less willing to discuss practical matters such as trade, shipping, flights, visits, financial services and perhaps joint exploitation of the fish and oil resources of the south Atlantic? They will be pushing us towards the point at which they believe we shall discuss sovereignty. It is possible that the more we appear to be apologetic and anxious about the future of the Falkland Islands, the less likely we are to get the Argentines to the table to discuss the practical matters.

[Sir Peter Blaker]

Indeed, the report itself condemns that approach. Referring to the statement by Mr. Michael Stewart, paragraph 29 states:

"There is little doubt that this early indication of the United Kingdom's willingness to consider the transfer of sovereignty both coloured subsequent discussions between the two governments and provided fertile soil in which Argentina's subsequent sense of grievance could grow."

I fear that that might be the immediate or long-term consequence if we continue to appear apologetic and doubtful about our position.

I believe that the British public are prepared to bear the cost of defending the Falklands — that cost will fall when the airfield is completed — and are prepared to continue to demonsrate the will to protect our position in the Falklands. That is in the interests of the Falkland Islanders. It corresponds to the will of the British public and is less likely to mislead Argentina.

8.51 pm

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): The right hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker) spoke with the clarity that the House has come to expect, but his judgment was at fault. His finger is less on the pulse of the true feelings of the British people than, for example, my hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) and, to be fair, the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen). I do not believe that the British people will encourage the Government to continue with the type of intransigence that we have seen during industrial disputes and that runs contrary to some of the Government's own achievements abroad. The Government are entitled to claim achievements over settlements in Zimbabwe and Hong Kong. I regret that this evening we have not heard that kind of language.

Lord Carrington had considerable influence on the Prime Minister over the settlement in Zimbabwe. The Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary had the same influence over the Hong Kong agreement. That type of realistic and reasonable thinking is required in these circumstances but, so far, it has not been reflected in contributions by Conservative Members.

The Foreign Secretary referred in passing to the views and role of the United Nations. I believe that Parliament would wish to take on board much more firmly the genuine dedication to a peaceful solution that is in the minds of the United Nations and especially of Mr. Perez de Cuellar. We owe it to international diplomacy to stop talking in terms of the type of chauvinistic approach we have heard during this debate and to think reasonably of the type of settlement that can be achieved.

It was to be expected that a great deal would be said about sovereignty. We must consider another aspect in the context of these problems—our word, and the views of British Governments past and present. If we have a major change of mind, we are entitled, and expected, to offer a better explanation than has been given so far. The Franks report referred clearly to this matter. Under "The 'Memorandum of Understanding,'" paragraph 22 states:

"in March 1967 the British Government for the first time stated formally to Argentina that they would be prepared to cede soverignty over the Islands under certain conditions, provided that the wishes of the Islanders were respected."

There is no reason to depart from that commitment—a commitment that was repeated by successive Governments. The onus lies on the present Government to tell us why they appear to be going back on that commitment.

It is true that dramatic events took place in 1982, but we are entitled to ask why the forces went to the Falklands. They went not simply to fly the flag—to do so would be to take away seriously from the objectives that the House set at that time — but to provide long-term security, and that is the overriding influence that we should be considering during this debate.

How can we consider long-term security if we refuse to accept that there has been a genuine change by the Argentines, especially their present Government? That change should be met by a more sensitive response by the United Kingdom. It would be damaging to the Argentines, to the British and to the islanders themselves if the present intransigence prevailed and if we did not attempt to seek a secure relationship with our south Atlantic neighbours.

During the debate there has been a great deal of criticism of the present Government of the Argentine, but it must be said bluntly that things have changed. Galtieri is no longer in control; many of the generals have gone on trial; and the new President and Parliament are dealing with some challenging problems. The House should understand the way in which they are attempting to solve those problems so soon after the traumatic events of 1982. The new rulers of the Argentine have a distinguished record in fighting the previous regime to which we have rightly taken so much exception. The present rulers of the Argentine were bravely fighting that regime in a way that can stand comparison with many hon. Members. That point should be seriously considered.

There is a danger that our approach to these matters could offer succour to the hard-liners in the Argentine. That would be a great mistake. They would welcome intransigence as a springboard from which to mount their own chauvinistic ambitions, which have not disappeared and which should not be encouraged by the attitude and role that we adopt.

My hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley referred to the cost of fortress Falklands. I believe that the right hon. Member for Blackpool, South and the hon. Member for Stroud (Sir. A. Kershaw) seriously underestimated the deep feelings of the British people on this matter.

I do not believe, given our domestic problems and the demands made upon us, for example, in Northern Ireland — I do not attribute blame but the present unhappy conflict is a drain on our resources — that the British people will say that it is right to pay about £2 million a day to support 1,800 people.

Mr. Dalyell: £3 million.

Mr. Clarke: I accept the figure suggested by my hon. Friend, who is much better informed on these matters than I am. In a global sense, the British people will not accept that amount of expenditure without a more reasonable explanation about discussions on sovereignty and the future role of the Falkland Islands—islands 8,000 miles away.

The Foreign Secretary referred to strategic implications. He said that the suggestion that the Falkland Islands would become a NATO base were manifest nonsense, but so long as we have such a clear military commitment people will see it as a possibility and some even as a danger. I do not believe that that is the kind of contribution to peace in the south Atlantic that most right hon. and hon. Members would wish to see.

I refer, as did other hon. Members, to Hong Kong. I accept that there is no positive and clear parallel, but there are matters of mutual interest and anxiety. The most important aspect of Hong Kong before the negotiations began was perhaps that the Prime Minister took a belligerent and hostile approach to a settlement. She was in due course persuaded. In addition, to her credit, she did still more. She prepared the people of Hong Kong for a reasonable settlement. Had she not done so, acceptance of those negotiations would have been much more difficult.

There is an opportunity for the Prime Minister and her colleagues to embark upon discussions with the people of the Falkland Islands. I am not certain that the Prime Minister's Christmas message was the kind of approach that would be helpful in reaching a constructive solution to the problem.

I have not had the opportunity to visit the Falklands as many hon. Members have been able to do. However, last year, I visited Belize and had the opportunity—I should say privilege—to speak to some of our officers and men who were involved in the Falklands exercise. My admiration for them is, I know, shared by other hon. Members. They attempted to relate to me their experiences and views on the loss of life on our side and on the Argentine side.

I took the view then, as I do strongly now in the debate, that it would be one of the greatest tragedies in our history if we had a repetition of that kind of exercise, which many people believe — my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) is not alone in this view — could have been avoided by a diplomatic settlement. I hope that there will be no repetition of that exercise and that loss of life.

The United Nations will take an increasing role in our discussions on these matters. It will say to us that it is not beyond the wit of modern diplomacy to reach a sensible, reasonable solution to the problem. It is that solution which I commend to the House for acceptance.

9.3 pm

Mr. Robert Harvey (Clwyd, South-West): There is much in the Government's response to the Select Committee's report on the Falklands that is sound common sense. The White Paper makes the point that, following the return of British administration in June 1982, the Government faced a completely new situation—a war had been fought and negotiations could not revert directly to where they left off before the war. That point has been made again by my hon. Friends this evening. It has been far too little understood by the Argentines, even though we recognise that the constitutionally elected Government of President Alfonsin bears no responsibility for the acts of their unconstitutional predecessor.

The Government's underlining of the Falklanders' right to determine their own future is also welcome. The Government's reply is correct in drawing attention to the Argentine's continuing refusal to announce a cessation of hostilities which would open the way to the ending of the trade embargo and of the protection zone around the islands.

All the same, hon. Members must feel a sense of disappointment at the absolute deadlock that seems to have persisted since the end of the Falklands war.

There are two sources of concern on the British side. The first, and least, although it was mentioned by the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), is the danger that Britain's allies in the world may lose sympathy with our position. Secondly, and more important, Britain has a duty to the people of the Falklands to provide them with a stable and foreseeable future.

In the absence of any negotiations, or even speaking terms between the two countries, the Falklanders have only our present profound sense of commitment to them on which to rely. That commitment goes deep, but no British Government can bind the hands of their successors. No Government can promise that, irrespective of the costs, we shall continue to provide necessary military protection of the islands ad infinitum. The Falklanders are realists and do not believe that the present commitment is for ever. It will endure for as long as we can afford it, no other way forward can be discerned and Argentina continues to be unreasonable.

However, should Argentina become more reasonable, it will be the historic duty of the British Government to seize the opportunity and not let it slip in case one day, heaven forbid, a less responsible Government should come to power and negotiate a much less favourable deal, to make savings, for example, on their defence budget.

That begs the question of how unreasonable the Argentines are being at present. As I said, their refusal to call a formal end to hostilities is unreasonable, but perhaps the problem could be resolved by a simultaneous ending of the exclusion zone at the same time. This who-goes-first argument should not stand in the way of talks.

The central problem to the whole issue is what should or should not be on the agenda, which scuppered the last talks in Berne. It was agreed there that the Argentines could mention the word "sovereignty" provided that we said at once that we were not prepared to discuss it. The talks were then turned to other matters, and the Argentines withdrew in a huff when we stood by that agreement. Clearly, they were being unreasonable then.

In discussions that hon. Members on both sides of the House have had with Argentine parliamentarians, it seemed that we could detect an attitude of greater reasonableness, although whether that extended to their Government one could not say. They seemed prepared to consider a suggestion by which official negotiations would deal with the return to peaceful relations, while unofficial talks, for example, between retired but respected diplomats on both sides, would simultaneously consider not the issue of sovereignty but that of the future of the islands.

From the British point of view, that would give away nothing, even less than the Berne formula did. Obviously, these views of parliamentarians are not official views, but I am sure that the Government are considering all suggestions carefully as a way of getting talks started and creating a friendlier climate without prejudice on either side.

It would be churlish of us not to recognise that the democratic successes of the dictator Galtieri cannot be expected to have absolutely nothing to show in return for the normalisation of relations with Britain. No Argentine Government could go back to their people and say, "We shall mend fences with Britain, but we have agreed not even to raise the issue of the future of the islands".

Britain has won a war. Let us not detract from that victory by appearing to be at all insensitive. Our courageous fighting men fought and died to defend the principle that territorial disputes must not be resolved through the use of force and that the Falklanders remain British for as long as the majority of their inhabitants so wish.

They did not fight and die to defend the principle that we are unwilling ever to talk about the future of the Falklands. Their sacrifice will be debased if we absolutely rule out the chance of getting a secure and permanent settlement for the Falklanders now. We would give nothing away by saying that we were prepared to discuss the future of the Falklands, just as over Gibraltar we have given nothing away by saying explicitly that we are prepared to discuss sovereignty with Spain. We need not accept a single proposal that they make, but it is just conceivable that we might discover in such talks an arrangement that might be acceptable as a long-term solution to the people of the Falklands, as of Gibraltar.

I have a hunch that, in the Falklands at least, Argentina might be prepared to offer the sort of guarantee that would ensure the continuation of British administration and the preservation of the Falklanders' way of life. Of course, that would have to be acceptable to the people of the Falklands. Of course, trust and perhaps third-party guarantees would have to underwrite such a deal—the sort of trust that allowed reconciliation between Germany and its neighbours after the second world war, and the sort of trust that allowed Israel to reach peace with Egypt after not one but three wars had been launched upon it by that country.

To fight in defence of principle requires courage and statesmanship of the highest order, and the Government have shown it. To achieve a secure and binding peace that will permanently guarantee the Falklanders' way of life will require no less of both, but I am confident that a Government who have achieved the historic settlement in Hong Kong and the opening of the gates of Gibraltar can and will rise to the occasion.

9.11 pm

Mr. Bruce George (Walsall, South): I am delighted to be called to speak in the debate, although I hope that it will not affect my chances of being called to speak in tomorrow's important debate on the west midlands. It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Clwyd, South-West (Mr. Harvey), who spoke courageously. One suspects that in the massed ranks of Conservative Members his voice, although not a lone one, does not necessarily reflect the ethos of his party in the light of what we have heard this evening. Remembering the famous saying about the Hapsburgs, may I say that five, 10 or 15 years from now I do not wish Britain to be forced down the path down which it was forced three years ago, fortunately successfully. We may not be as fortunate in the future.

This debate is important not simply because of the topic that we are discussing. I hope that people will not regard the vast empty spaces in the Chamber this evening as representing indifference. The debate contrasts sharply with the excitement and enthusiasm during that Saturday morning a few years ago, which has left an indelible mark on my mind. Never again do I wish to go through what we experienced on that occasion. Our lot was an easy one compared with that of the British troops, who were forced to accept the consequences of the failure of Government policy and the failure of Parliament to create an environment in which discussions with Argentina could have led somewhere and could have precluded the fact that more than 250 British citizens and many more Argentine citizens paid the price for that failure on both sides.

This is an important debate from the standpoint of the House of Commons. Select Committees, which I support totally — I am an active member of the Select Committee on Defence — are not debating clubs that spend months producing reports which end up in pigeon holes. There must be a bridge between what happens in Select Committees and what happens in the Chamber. Far too few Select Committee reports make it as far as the Chamber. I do not suggest that they are not read or debated in one form or another, but only a handful of reports have been debated on the Floor of the House. It is important that the link is maintained to show that the work done by Select Committees has a significance greater than simply a means of whiling away the time, after which their reports are conveniently forgotten. This report does not deserve to be forgotten.

The right hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker) has the mistaken view that the Foreign Affairs Committee is a branch of the Foreign Office, perhaps its public relations arm. He thinks that the principal task of the Foreign Affairs Committee is to advance the negotiating position of the Foreign Office. The Committee should not be expected to perform that task. It has not done so in the past. It has produced many challenging reports, reports that have almost invariably been a finger in the eye of the Foreign Office and the Government, but that is no reason why the Foreign Affairs Committee should be deprecated. It produced excellent reports on Canada, Central America and the Caribbean, Gibraltar and the aftermath of what happened in Afghanistan. Many of its reports ignored the prevailing view in the Foreign Office and have been vital because they have done that. It has stimulated thought and has shown that it does not have to be a mirror image of the Government's view. I commend the Foreign Affairs Committee and its Chairman for what has been done.

However, when I listened to the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, I thought that it was the Chairman of the Select Committee on Transport who was making the speech, such was the gulf between his speech and what was contained in the report. To advance the view that he as the Chairman has no vote is to show that his Committee may be unique among Select Committees. In our Committee, the Chairman not only participates in the debates but votes.

In the Foreign Affairs Select Committee report, I see that no vote was cast against paragraph 22. I am not arguing the case for Argentina, but it has a solid claim. Its claim is more spurious than ours. Ours may have some validity, but we have not put it to the test of international jurisdiction. Surely the answer to the rival sovereignty claims is what is suggested in paragraph 22, that neither side has an unchallenged claim to sovereignty of the Falkland Islands. I commend the courage of the Foreign Affairs Committee in advancing that view.

I have visited the Falklands. I just wish that more Argentine politicians had visited the Falkland Islands, which in the past I have called the diplomatic equivalent to a cold shower, as their enthusiasm might have abated somewhat if they had. However, although we may dismiss the validity of their claim, we have failed to understand that, in psychological terms, the Falklands or the Malvinas, as they would call it, have an importance way in excess of the economic, diplomatic or political value. Argentina is a country with enormous potential, but unfortunately it has failed dismally both economically and politically, and in almost every respect. To an Argentine, the reason for this failure is their failure to have re-acquired the islands off their coast.

One shudders to think what would happen if ever the Argentines had control of the islands and nothing changed. What then would they blame for their miserable failure as a nation? We must always remember that if we pursue our "Fortress Falklands"' policy in perpetuity, perhaps not under this Government or the next, but at some time there will be another attempt to secure control of the Falkland Islands.

I am certain that the democratic Government of President Alfonsin has no desire to retake the islands. However, having read the report of Dr. Paul Rogers and magazines such as Jane's Defence Review I am aware that there is a growing capability in Argentina. If the capability were matched by the will, the situation would be frightening.

Argentines argue, with some validity, that the impressive acquisition of weaponry is merely the receipt of equipment that was ordered by the military Government. The civilian Government are seeking buyers for some of the equipment and the size of the armed forces has been reduced. There has been a reorganisation and some units and regiments have been disbanded, but it is still a capable force. Smaller forces can be more capable than their larger predecessors.

Maintaining the islands as British for ever will be a heavy drain on our resources. I am a member of the Defence Select Committee, but it is clear from published evidence that there is no way in which the Government will be able to meet their military commitments on presently available resources. There are whispers in the press and people are using Kremlinology, and I suspect that our amphibious capability will be on the list for the chop. The fact that we are considering that capability is a clear sign of the problems that the Government have got into on defence spending. The military, political and diplomatic costs of fortress Falklands are high. A series of pressures should make us consider some form of settlement some time in the future.

The pressures on Argentina are also great. Argentines must realise that they failed to achieve their objectives militarily and that they will not get in peacetime what they failed to secure by military means unless they are prepared to compromise. It is all very well to point the finger at the Prime Minister — rightly — for her obduracy, but the Argentine Government do not have much flexibility either. The Argentine President has more problems with his public opinion that does a British Prime Minister.

Neither side has an interest in developing an arms race in the south Atlantic. Both of us should be diverting resources to things other than maintaining a fruitless and possibly disastrous arms race. It is in the interests of the islanders, both Governments, both peoples and the world community that we get away from the conflict and down to the negotiating table. Neither side will get everything that it wants, but that is the essence of diplomacy. Both sides give but both gain.

I am not arguing for a lease-back arrangement. I have examined 20 possible constitutional solutions. Many might not advance any cause, but somewhere lies a possibility of a settlement. I hope that the report, today's debate and negotiations between politicians, publicly and privately, will somehow help to resolve the crisis. We avoided a crisis three years ago, but if we are not prepared to be diplomatic we shall be in far greater difficulty. The House must try to avoid that.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): In my experience, it is quite often at the end of a debate that we have some of the wisest and most thoughtful words in hon. Members' speeches. The speech by the hon. Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George) was one of those, and, indeed, that of my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, South-West (Mr. Harvey) was another.

The sense of the report of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs and, indeed, the sense of the debate as it concludes is that we need to seek a way forward that will require compromise. I was pleased to note the advice that the hon. Member for Walsall, South gave to the Argentine Government. Compromise on their part will be needed.

It is wrong to assume that negotiations by President Alfonsin's Government with our country are seen by him to be likely to produce a result that will benefit him within Argentine political circles. It is a false argument to say that not to negotiate with him is to undermine him. If President Alfonsin, the first democratically elected president in Argentina for some time, and certainly the first non-military president for some time, returns with anything other than full sovereignty over the Falkland Islands or the Malvinas, as the Argentines call them, the political support that he enjoys in Argentina will be undermined. That is something that informs us about Argentina's actions towards Britain on negotiations. It explains why the Argentines have refused to concede that hostilities are at an end, which would facilitate the possibility of the British Government speaking to them about the whole issue of the Falkland Islands. Indeed, I believe that it explains their conduct in Berne, in Switzerland.

The Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, taking evidence for its report in pursuit of the facts, visited the United Nations and went around the ambassadors there, including the ambassador for Argentina. That was three months before the Berne talks in Switzerland. The ambassador gave us to understand that an open agenda, which included sovereignty, but which the Argentines would not expect to discuss, would be the way in which other issues could be discussed. Thus the two countries could begin to re-establish that essential trust which could bring about the opening of discussions on issues on which we could agree, and then we could move on to more difficult subjects. That is what the ambassador gave the Select Committee to understand, and that is what was reported to Ministers in the Government. Why did Ministers abort that opportunity to bring about negotiations? We can only speculate, but I suggest that it is because the President of Argentina is sufficiently insecure that he cannot bring back anything other than a total handover of sovereignty to Argentina. I believe, as Opposition Members have said, that Argentine public opinion would not tolerate anything else.

If that is the background, we are faced with an extremely difficult position because the Argentine cannot make any compromise. The compromise that the Argentines must make is that they must realise that, by invading the Falkland Islands, they have forgone the opportunity ever in our lifetime or in the foreseeable future of being able to take over the sovereignty of those islands. That action offended against the United Nations charter in every way and, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker) said, was carried out in pursuit of the principle that a country may not try to settle its arguments on territorial and boundary disputes by taking the law into its own hands and making a military attack. For a member of the Security Council such as Britain to agree to that would be to unleash on the whole world a variety of territorial disputes that would lead to untold deaths and terrible disputes continuing throughout our lives. It would undermine the principle of the United Nations charter. That is what Britain did to resecure its territory in the Falkland Islands. That is the principle we supported, that our men died for and that the United Nations, almost unanimously, agreed to support.

May I remind the House that the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) throughout the whole of the Falklands Islands crisis—we have to consider this point in the light of his remarks today—consistently opposed in the House the despatch of the task force in defence of that principle.

Mr. Foulkes: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Wells: I shall give way in a minute. If the hon. Gentleman would not have despatched the task force to defend that principle, he is saying that he agreed with the claims of Argentina and would have handed over the islands to Argentina in any event. Therefore, his arguments must be set in that context.

Mr. Foulkes: I would ask the hon. Gentleman to accept—he knows me well—that I did not concede Argentina's claim. I thought that we should try to achieve a settlement by other than military means. May I also point out that on all those occasions I was speaking as a Back Bencher? Today I have spoken on behalf of the Opposition. That is a clear and important difference.

Mr. Wells: Of course I accept that difference, but the hon. Gentleman is a very persuasive member of his own Front Bench. I do not believe that we can absolve him from his own views on these matters by reason of his assumption of his great position, upon which I compliment and congratulate him. I am glad to see him in it. However, on this matter he and I must disagree, as we have always disagreed. Fortunately, hon. Members can disagree but retain great respect and friendship for those with whom they disagree.

I must record my disagreement, and also that of my colleagues on the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, with the Foreign Office about the creation of a fisheries protection zone round the Falkland Islands. Permission ought to be given only to those who are licensed to fish in that zone not only to conserve the stocks of fish so that they do not become totally exhausted but also because it is the most obvious source of income for the Falkland Islanders other than the traditional sheepmeat and wool. Without this additional prop to the economy, I do not believe that it will be possible to ensure that the Falkland Islanders can look forward to an economically stable and long-term future. It is their long-term future that we have to consider.

As the hon. Members for Walsall, South and for Clwyd, South-West said, the future of the Falkland Islanders and therefore their interests, which are not necessarily the same as their wishes, must lie in the conclusion of an agreement between themselves and this country and the South American mainland, namely, Argentina. Without such an agreement they will not attract the economic investment that is necessary to ensure that they have a long-term future. A means has to be found of ensuring that long-term solution.

Argentina will have to make compromises. They cannot expect sovereignty. We should not give the impression to Argentina that they ought to have sovereignty. It will be recalled that time and again the Government were accused in the House that because they explored lease-back before the invasion they gave the impression to Argentina that Britain would hand over to Argentina sovereignty of the islands and of the people. That mistake must not be made again. I appeal for a compromise and for an approach by Argentina to this country that shows that they are willing to try to re-establish the trust that is necessary in order to bring about the compromise solution that this country has shown that it is willing to make in other very difficult circumstances — in Zimbabwe, in Hong Kong, in Gibraltar and, indeed, at Fontainebleau in relation to the European Community. There is the will to compromise in Britain, provided that it can be done in the interests of the Falkland Islanders and in pursuit of the vital principle that no nation should pursue its territorial ambitions by military force.

9.34 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): The Minister should have time to answer the debate. Therefore, in three minutes I shall ask three questions.

The first is of the past. Is it true that the distinguished Conservative historian, Lord Blake, the Provost of Queen's college, Oxford has any grounds for referring in his most recent book to a Cabinet discussion in which it was decided that up to 1,000 British deaths would be acceptable during the conflict?

Mr. Robert Rhodes James (Cambridge) rose——

Mr. Dalyell: No, not for a three-minute speech.

Secondly, in the light of discussion on the airport, has account been taken of the fact that Argentina now has possession from Matra in France of the Durandel anti-runway bombs which can create havoc from low altitudes, making holes 2 m deep and 5 m in diameter, which could put out of action temporarily the Mount Pleasant runway and, therefore, the Phantom cover? What assessment has been made of the whole range of Argentine arms—the Nesher Israeli adapted Mirage 3s or the Mirage 5s, and the many armaments to which I have previously referred in the House?

Thirdly, I am dismayed at the attitude of many Conservative Members. All right, the Falkland Islanders have rights, but they do not have the right to keep a sizeable portion of the British Navy down there for the lifetime of the youngest among us. If they want, they have the right to be British, and that means coming to Britain.

Will the Government look at how the Scots and Welsh communities get on in Southern Patagonia? After all, in the words of Sir Richard Evans, our excellent ambassador in Peking, the legacies of history should be resolved by peaceful means. The Scots communities and Mr. Tuan McCafferty and the Welsh communities and Mr. Pablo Llewelyn get on very nicely. Not a finger was laid on them during the conflict. The whole Anglo-Argentine community must be considered in future. The truth of the matter is that, although Alfonsin will not start a conflict, he is pretty vulnerable. It is an embryo democracy, and surely it is in the British national interest to help him.

Mr. Austin Mitchell rose——

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop rose——

Mr. Dalyell: I give way to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop.

Mr. Dalyell: My God.

9.38 pm

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): The white coat can go away if he wants to. There are questions which will not go away. One is about sovereignty. Britain could not realistically use armed forces today merely because Argentina was in breach of a treaty. If sovereignty were ever conceded to Argentina as part of a general settlement and an Argentine Government in the future then tore up that settlement but were in possession of sovereignty, we could not move armed forces into the Falklands without invading Argentine territory. That is a fact which will not go away.

Secondly, among the events which have happened since 1982, whether the hon. Gentleman in the white coat likes it or not, is that people throughout the British Commonwealth, including in the Falklands, have seen what happens when leased territory comes to the end of its lease. The leased territories in Hong Kong are coming to the end of their lease, and that is a fact which is discussed in the Falklands. The significance of that is not lost on the Falkland Islanders.

Then again the right to be protected by the state of which one is a citizen is the most elemental right. It is not attenuated by distance. The inhabitants of the Shetland Islands are not less entitled to defence by the forces of the Crown than the inhabitants of Luton because they are further from London. Similarly, the inhabitants of the Falkland Islands are not less entitled to defence by the forces of the Crown because they are further from London than the inhabitants of the Shetland Islands. I have been to the Falklands since the conflict and I know that the Falkland Islanders will say that themselves.

Those who wish to make their own assessment of opinion on the Falkland Islands should bear in mind that Stanley is no more the Falklands than London is Britain. The history of Argentina is a history of chaos interrupted by very occasioal and brief periods of elected government. The standard picture of Argentine history is one of conflict —sometimes between the military Government and their citizens, and very often between the citizens themselves.

The present elected Government of Argentina may, or may not, last longer than the Government of Dr. Illía, following the military deposition of Peron, but morally we cannot assume for our own convenience and for the saving of defence Estimates that the present manifestation of politics in Argentina is even probably going to last. Judging by the history of Argentina to date, we have no reason to make such an assumption.

Mr. Foulkes: Governments here can change too.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: I am not sure whether the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes), who is sitting on the Opposition Front Bench, is speaking as a Front Bench spokesman, but I remind him that our established pattern is that we have a democratic Government, even if Governments change after elections. That is not the established pattern in Argentina. Argentina has had 36 presidents in the past 100 years. It is no good the hon. Gentleman shaking his head. Does he disagree with that statement of demonstrable fact? How many of those presidents have been elected? Argentina has had fewer than Bolivia, but that is not a very great achievement.

Anyone who talks about the transfer of sovereignty or titular sovereignty is condemning the Falklands Islands to that. Once Argentina has titular sovereignty over the Falkland Islands, the fate of the Falkland Islanders will be left to happenchance. If we want to get away from the arguments about sovereignty, we must look to mutual interest. There are immense resources of minerals in Antarctica. At present prices they may be uneconomic to mine, but that will not always be so. As Arab supplies of oil and European supplies of coal are worked out—as one day they will be — the economic viability of harvesting Antarctica will become more real. — [Interruption.] If the white coat would be quiet, he would extend the same courtesy to other hon. Members as they extended to him.

In the historic carve up of Antarctica, Britain, Chile and Argentina participated in overlapping claims from which much of the rest of South America, including Brazil, was excluded. I should have thought that the way forward in terms of mutual interest would be to have new negotiations, not on the sovereignty of the Falklands, but on the sovereignty of Antarctica as a whole. In those negotiations we should offer to put into the pool our claim to Antarctica so long as Brazil and other South American countries had a share, divorced from historic claims. That might put an end to the hostility between Argentina and Chile and the feeling of Brazil that she was excluded. That is the way that we should follow to change the focus from sovereignty of the Falkland Islands, which is, and must remain, ours as a safeguard to the British population in those British islands.

9.46 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tim Renton): I should like to thank all those on both sides of the House who have made such constructive and thoughtful contributions to this important debate. I should particularly like to thank my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw) and the members of his Select Committee, whose sound and thorough work has offered such a good basis for our discussions. My hon. Friend himself made a useful speech. In the words of my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker), it was a robust speech. My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud has sent me his apologies because he could not be here for the reply to the debate.

I assure the hon. Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George), who is not in his place at the moment, that none of us at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office ever thinks of the Foreign Affairs Committee as an arm of the FCO

[Mr. Tim Renton]

—quite the opposite. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South, as a former Minister at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, would himself never think of the Select Committee in those terms.

Without further preamble, and not having much time, I should like to answer some of the points that have been raised in the debate. In his opening remarks my right hon. and learned Friend made it abundantly plain that we wish to normalise our commercial relations with Argentina, but that we are not prepared to discuss the issue of sovereignty. Many hon. Members referred to this issue, including the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes), the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South.

The hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley never made any mention of the right of the Falkland Islanders to self-determination, although he said that we should put the matter on the table. I remind him of these words:

"However, I hope that the whole House supports the right of the Falkland Islanders to self-determination and to live in peace under a Government of their own choosing, as they have been able to do for the past 150 years."—[Official Report, 7 April 1982; Vol. 21, c. 965.]

Those were not the words of the Prime Minister or of the Foreign Secretary. They were the words of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) in the House on 7 April 1982, not three years ago. What has changed that to make the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley now feel so strongly that without considering the right of the islanders to self-determination we should put the issue of sovereignty on the table to be discussed?

That is particularly important because we all know that when the Argentines talk about sovereignty they mean the transfer of sovereignty. President Alfonsin made that abundantly plain in his speeches at the United Nations Assembly. When he talked about lease-back, he made it clear that he was talking in terms of three to five years before the ownership of the islands reverted to Argentina.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) and my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Thomas) said, it is as if the Opposition believe that the events of 1982 can be totally forgotten. They cannot be forgotten. Least of all can they be forgotten by the islanders themselves.

The hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley suggested that at the Maryland conference islanders gave the impression that they were willing to discuss the future ownership of the islands. In all the discussions that we regularly have with the islanders' elected councillors, we see no sign of that whatsoever.

Mr. J. Cheek, a Falkland Islands councillor, in the fourth committee of the United Nations General Assembly in October last year, said:

"Members may question what is the percentage of islanders who wish the Falklands to remain a dependent territory of Britain. I can assure members that islanders are almost unanimous in this belief."

The right hon. Member for Devonport talked about the Beagle channel and the approval by the Argentine Senate today. He said that it showed that President Alfonsin is now more flexible. We welcome any reduction in tension in the south-west Atlantic. Of course we are pleased about the agreement between Chile and Argentina. However, no invasion was required by Argentina of Chile to obtain that agreement. Instead, a referendum was held. President Alfonsin held a referendum of his own people and there was an 80 per cent. vote in favour. Why does he not show any sensitivity about the rights and wishes of the islanders?

We have been privileged tonight to hear speeches by all three of the hon. Members who were present at the Maryland conference—the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley, my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, South-West (Mr. Harvey) and the hon. Member for Walsall, South. All hon. Members will be grateful to them for their reports of the proceedings at Such contacts between parliamentarians can usefully complement official exchanges through the protecting powers, but some of the references to the Maryland communiqué are starry eyed. It would be wrong for the House to go away with the idea that the communiqué represents a breakthrough. The reference to respecting the wishes of the Falkland Islanders comes at the end of a paragraph listing various means of transferring sovereignty.

The document reiterates the Argentine insistence of a linkage between the normalisation of bilateral relations —which we want—and discussion about sovereignty. Indeed, Argentine participants at the conference have subsequently emphasised that they insisted at all times on Argentine sovereignty.

The hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley, the right hon. Member for Devonport, the hon. Member for Walsall, South and the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) referred to the cost of the Falklands. The overwhelming cost has been that of recovering the islands, of reconstruction and of the construction of Mount Pleasant airport. Once the airport is completed expenditure will come down sharply, and when it is fully operational it should be possible to reduce the size of the forces permanently stationed on the island.

In any event, it is surely wrong, however tempting, to put a cash value on the principles that are at stake. The price of liberty and self-determination comes dear, and when hon. Members of the Opposition speak, as they do constantly, of fortress Falklands, I must put it to them that this is a misnomer. It is no more a fortress Falklands policy than it is a fortress Britain policy. It is the right of the Falkland Islanders to be defended from the threat of attack, and it is our duty to defend them. We are keeping there the minimum force that is necessary for the purpose of defence. Obviously, the policy of defending the Falkland Islands was not specifically of our choice. It was forced upon us by the 1982 invasion.

I hope that the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley will allow me to write and give him the answers to the various questions that he asked me about the airport, since they are somewhat detailed and time is short.

To the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), who asked me three questions, I would say, first, that I do not think that Lord Blake has written a new book for a long time. Secondly, it really is not appropriate for us to go publicly into our assessment of the military strength of Argentina. However, we note, as he will have noted, that Argentina, from spending 6 per cent. of its gross domestic product on defence military purposes in 1983, has reduced this to 4 per cent. in 1984 and an estimated 3·2 per cent. in 1985.

I should like to come back to the twin themes of our Falklands policy as described by my right hon. and learned Friend in his opening remarks. Of course, I agree with the comments made by, for example, my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, South-West on the need now to search for solutions. In this respect I agree with the hon. member for Linlithgow, who talked about our long-standing friendship with Argentina. That is of course true. Our relations and friendship with Argentina went back a long way, and throughout the 19th century we had an honourable financial connection with that country. We never wanted it otherwise, and it is unnatural that it should be otherwise. Sadly, it was Argentina which so rudely destroyed that friendship in April 1982.

How do we start rebuilding that friendship? I must put it to the House that it is we who have been making the patient efforts to promote normality and rebuild confidence in our relations. It is we who from the first have made the running in seeking better bilateral relations. It is we who have looked to the democratically elected Argentine Government to show a greater spirit of realism and flexibility in their response than their predecessors did. It is we who have been trying constantly to open the window and it is the Argentines who so far have always slammed it shut again.

We regret that they are not yet ready to accept that, while the issue of sovereignty must be set aside, discussion of other outstanding problems would help promote a climate of greater trust, to our mutual benefit. So far Argentina has not been prepared to share this reasonable approach, but we shall persevere in our attempts and we must hope that Argentina will respond to the steps that we have proposed.

This strand of our policy is matched by the other strand —our commitment to the Falkland Islanders. We are giving them in the new constitution the means to exercise a measure of control over their own future. The new airport will enable us to make some reductions in the size of the garrison but to reinforce it swiftly should the need arise. It will play an increasingly important part in enhancing the economic and social development of the islands.

We want to improve relations with Argentina. We stand by our commitments to the Falkland Islands. There is nothing incompatible in those two aims. We are confident that this is the right approach, and that no sensible alernative to it exists. We shall, therefore, continue to implement it with determination and energy. I have no doubt that the House will endorse that approach.

It being Ten o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

It being Ten o'clock MR. SPEAKER proceeded to put forthwith the deferred Question necessary to dispose of the proceedings on Supplementary Estimates 1984-85, Class IV, Vote 5.

Resolved,

That a supplementary sum not exceeding £20,000,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated fund to defray the charges which will come in the course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1985 for expenditure by the Department of Energy in connection with the energy industries including related research and development, selective assistance to industry, energy conservation, oil storage, and certain other services including grants in aid and an international subscription.

Middle East (Peace Initiatives)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Garel-Jones.]

10.5 pm

Mr. Dennis Walters (Westbury): I consider that this is an opportune time to be debating a peace initiative in the middle east. It is also timely, because we have as an honoured guest in this country President Mubarak of Egypt, who, I believe, would agree with the proposition that a major effort to achieve a comprehensive settlement in the middle east should take place as soon as possible.

I have long advocated the convening of an international conference with the participation of the Soviet Union, but if that is not possible because of a point blank American refusal to consider it we should examine what other courses are open. A number of unusually favourable circumstances have combined to give a peace initiative launched now a slightly better chance of success than at any time since 1973 when the United States refused to seize the opportunity offered by the October war.

President Reagan has been returned for a second term, having won a massive electoral victory. During the campaign, he made fewer damaging promises to the Zionist lobby than is usual on such occasions—many fewer than his heavily defeated Democratic opponent whose electoral bribes to the Zionists were unedifying and apparently inexhaustible. The mid-term elections are some way off.

The Israeli economy is in an appalling mess which should make its Government more responsive than usual to American persuasion if firmly enough applied, and in Shimon Peres Israel has a Prime Minister who might even be inclined to respond positively. Also, withdrawal of the Israeli armed forces from Lebanon has acquired an aspect similar to a rout, although defeat has in no way blunted the brutality of the punitive attacks that they launch indiscriminately against both the Lebanese Shia fighters and the ordinary villagers of south Lebanon.

That the Security Council resolution should have been vetoed by the United States was not altogether surprising, but I find it surprising that Her Majesty's Government abstained. I shall be interested to hear the reason for that when my hon. Friend the Minister replies. It is ironic to recall, as the invading army pulls back towards the national frontier, that at no time were Israel's settlements in northern Galilee safer and more peaceable than during the 18 months truce with the Palestinians which preceded Israel's bloody and unprovoked invasion.

In any event, one way or another it is not unreasonable to assume that the Israeli armed forces will be out of Lebanon before long.

Lastly, the accord reached between Mr. Arafat and King Hussein marked a substantial step towards meeting American requirements. The agreement refers specifically to a joint Jordanian-Palestinian delegation, to the principle of land for peace and to the idea of a Jordan-Palestine confederation. Although the agreement has come under attack from certain elements in the PLO, and under sharp attack from Syria, Arafat has confirmed that, in principle, the agreement stands.

Statesmanship and expediency call for a major initiative. It would, therefore, be sad indeed if the reports indicating a negative response, first to King Fahd and now to President Mubarak urging United States diplomatic intervention, were true.

Perhaps we all tend to go astray in believing that Washington can be influenced over its conduct in the Middle East by the means that friendly powers usually use when trying to change or modify one another's foreign policy. Persuasion and advice assume that the Government concerned have a foreign policy and are in effective control of it.

In regard to the Middle East, it is by no means certain that the United States Administration have a planned strategy of foreign policy. Perhaps we should start by recognising the possibility that they simply have a domestic policy of subservience to Israel, imposed by a powerful lobby, with an external policy in the Middle East which is basically no more than a reflection of that.

Should that be so, the only hope would lie in the gradual enlightenment of American opinion at the grass roots. But the dangers of delay are such that we cannot countenance such a possibility. We must continue to act on the presumption that Washington has a policy for the Middle East which is not entirely subservisive to Israel, which is not blind to Western interests or to the pressures of international law and morality and is a policy which we can and should try to influence for the sake of peace and our mutual advantage.

The consequences of failing to act swiftly are alarming, and the fact that in the past warnings of impending danger have not materialised should not lull us into a foolish state of complacency. Iran looked fairly safe a year before the deluge, and Islamic fundamentalism feeds on the present unsatisfactory status quo. The Minister might care to refer to that and to the war with Iraq.

King Hussein has made his feelings well known, but there is still far too little awareness of the near despair felt by moderate Arab regimes at Western inertia and apparent unreasoning refusal to influence events while it is still possible to do so.

Since 1967, there have been a number of Middle East peace initiatives. Some appeared to have a greater chance of success than others, but all foundered in the face of Israeli intransigence. Each had its merits, although by adding one sentence on the right of Palestinian self-determination, it is difficult to improve on resolution 242, which calls for the withdrawal of Israel from territories occupied in the war of June 1967.

There has been much argument, most of it fatuous, about the significance of the omission of the word "the" before the words "territories occupied" in the English text of that resolution. The omission of "the" may mean something, and that something may be arguable, but it cannot have been intended to turn the entire resolution on its head and acknowledge any right for Israel to take permanent possession of the West Bank and Gaza or any large part of it. Most informed observers would agree that the American Secretary of State, William Rogers, got it about right in 1969, when he said:

"We believe that while recognised boundaries must be established, and agreed upon by the parties, any changes in the pre-existing lines should not reflect the weight of conquest and should be confined to insubstantial alterations required for mutual security. We do not support expansionism. We believe troops must be withdrawn as the Resolution provides."

The question 18 years after 1967 is: where do we go from here? The Israelis will not budge unless the Americans compel them to do so, and the Americans are reluctant to exercise serious pressure because of internal domestic considerations. Is there any way out of the impasse? I believe that Europe has a role to play. The Venice declaration amplified the terms of resolution 242 and set out the essential pre-conditions for a settlement: Israel's right to security, Palestinian right to self-determination, and the association of the PLO in the negotiations. This last point has been made much easier by the Hussein-Arafat accord. A restatement and updating of the Venice declaration might be an appropriate first step. Then it is worth considering a joint Euro-Arab approach to the United States. A top-level delegation consisting of the leading European and moderate Arab leaders could visit Washington together to urge on President Reagan the need to act now to bring peace to the middle east.

No doubt such a proposal sounds unrealistic and far fetched, but all imaginative initiatives appear unrealistic and even theatrical before they have taken place. A good example was President Sadat's visit to Jerusalem, which certainly broke the log jam. There is, of course, the problem of what they would say and recommend to President Reagan. It would be unrealistic to hope that they could agree on a joint Euro-Arab peace plan put to him. That would lead only to a futile argument about the merits of the different peace plans now on the table, including President Reagan's initiative at Camp David. It would be better to stick to broad issues such as the need for a new American initiative, the urgency of such action now, the need to revert to resolution 242 as the only solid and widely accepted basis on which to build a settlement, and the special obligation resting on the United States Administration to ensure that Israel complies with the resolution. Of course, there would have to be an agreed reference to Palestinian rights, which the Venice declaration already encompasses.

To remove the danger of war in the Middle East should be the top priority of Western foreign policy. Peace is in the interests of everyone—the West, the Arab countries, the Palestinians, who have suffered so much injustice, and not least of Israel. For there to be peace, Israel must concede that the Palestinians are entitled by historical, legal and moral rights to at least a measure of justice. At a minimum, that justice must be granted in the form of a homeland for the Palestinians on the West Bank and in Gaza. It should be noted that, under this formula and at the end of the negotiating process, the Palestinians would be recognising Israel at the price of the return to them of less than 30 per cent. of the land that was once theirs.

Israel would have to sacrifice some territory for peace, but in this day and age security cannot be achieved by a few more miles of territory. Surely Ben Gurion was right when, in old age, he said:

"As for security, military defensible borders, while desirable, cannot by themselves guarantee our future. Real peace with our Arab neighbours—mutual trust and friendship—that is the only true security."

"Real peace with our Arab neighbours"— that is precisely what the Israelis are denying themselves by insisting on hanging on to land that does not belong to them—land inadmissibly acquired by war. Before it is too late, we must act to try to bring about the peace that has eluded us all for too long.

10.20 pm

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): In the few minutes that I have available, I begin by congratulating my hon.

[Mr. Robert Adley]

Friend the Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters) on raising a matter that is of the utmost importance to all of us. This afternoon, my wife was talking to a friend about my intention to participate in this debate, and my wife's friend said, "In the Lebanon the Israelis are getting away with murder." That seems a good cue with which to start my remarks.

There are three countries in the world that are currently in contravention of United Nations resolutions for invading and occupying neighbouring nations' territories. There is the Soviet Union in Afghanistan; Vietnam in Kampuchea; and Israel in four countries—Jordan, Syria, the Lebanon and Egypt. Israel's idea of peace is to subjugate its neighbours, and destroy all trace of the Palestinian people.

The Arabs in the West Bank, Gaza, the Golan and the Lebanon are in the same position as the French resistance fighters were in world war two. They are fighting for the freedom of their own occupied territories, but the Israelis, through their propaganda machine, insist on calling all Palestinians terrorists. There will never be peace until this attitude changes.

My hon. Friend mentioned the position of the United States. I therefore ask my hon. Friend the Minister to consider two points that Her Majesty's Government, with our European partners, could countenance. At the moment, Israel enjoys access, on favourable terms, to EEC markets. All these concessions should be withdrawn until Israel withdraws from all the occupied territories in the middle east. Secondly, the British Government quite rightly discontinued the sale of arms to Israel while that country's troops were in the Lebanon. I understand that if Israel gets out of the Lebanon quickly Her Majesty's Government may reconsider and may start again the sale of arms to Israel, notwithstanding the fact that the Israeli Government will still be in possession of territories that do not belong to them internationally in the three other countries that I have already mentioned. Those two requests seem to be fairly modest.

The paranoia that the name Arafat brings into any conversation that one has with Israelis is, to those of us who know Mr. Arafat, incredible. At the moment, as my hon. Friend has said, there is the best chance of peace for years, but all that the Israelis are doing, by their paranoia, is throwing away the chance to give themselves the security that they need, which we understand that they need and to which they are entitled.

My hon. Friend mentioned the fuelling of the flames of Muslim fundamentalism. The repercussions of this go far beyond the middle east, and no one can possibly foresee where what is happening in southern Lebanon today may take us, through the activities of the Israeli forces as they carry out their policies in that sad and unfortunate country.

Of course Israel wants to live in peace behind secure borders. That is the policy of the British Government, which all hon. Members support. However, to try to obtain those objectives by the tactics of Sabra and Chatilla is never likely to win Israel friends, victory or any sort of peace and security.

The British Government must show the Israeli Government that their behaviour does not justify their inclusion among the nations whom we regard as being entitled to be treated as one of this country's favoured friends.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters) for permitting me to contribute to his debate.

There are no simple solutions to the middle east, but some actions make matters worse rather than better. I should like to mention the construction of Israeli settlements on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Israel does not have sovereignty over that territory, and does not claim it. They are occupied territories, and have been for more than 17 years. Every peace plan refers to the need at least to freeze the number of settlements in those areas. The Venice declaration, to which Britain is a party, declared those settlements illegal. The United Nations gas criticised them, and the Reagan plan of 1982 declared that they were not necessary for security and were an obstacle to peace.

What has happened? Since then, the number of Jewish settlers on the West Bank has more than doubled. As net immigration to Israel has now almost halted, the West Bank is being occupied not by an influx of immigrants but by a transfer of population from Israel. The present coalition Government in Israel has recently agreed to set up six more settlements by the autumn. That cannot bring peace any closer. It is grossly provocative to moderate Arab opinion and ensures that it is outbid by the men of violence.

Meanwhile, the House arrests and deportations go on. We have just learnt that Bir Zeit university at Ramallah has been closed by the Israeli authorities for two months. It is the eighth time that that has happened since 1979. Will my hon. Friend the Minister state clearly his views about the settlements on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip and may I, through you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, ask the Israeli Government not to compound the problem by continuing to defy their friends and enemies alike?

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Richard Luce): I also congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters) on initiating this debate. He has had a great knowledge of and an interest in the middle east for a long time, and the House always listens to him carefully. I am also grateful to my hon. Friends the Members for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) and for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) for their contributions to the debate. I assure them that I shall take what they have said carefully into account.

The Arab-Israeli dispute has lasted for almost 40 years. Like a cancer, it has eaten into the wellbeing of the inhabitants of the entire region, spilling over into countries initially quite detached from the dispute between Israel and the Arabs. It has had dramatic effects on regional stability and on the world's economy. As the problems have festered, extremism has grown on all sides and will continue to do so if there is not a firm and perceptible move towards a settlement.

Britain's interest is in seeing this conflict brought to an end as soon as possible. Two principles underpin our approach. First, we believe that Israel has a right to exist within secure and internationally recognised borders. In return, the Palestinians' right to self-determination must be respected.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury said, there have recently been several encouraging developments in the search for peace. Indeed, this afternoon I attended most useful talks between the Prime Minister and President Mubarak. The key element has been the agreement last month between King Hussein of Jordan and the Palestinian leader, Yasser Arafat, on a joint negotiating position. We welcomed that agreement as a first step towards a settlement based on the exchange of peace for territory between Palestinians and Israel. Here is a basis on which further progress can be built.

Twice in recent months my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has discussed the prospects for a settlement in the middle east with the President of the United States. President Reagan made it clear to her that he accepted the need for renewed efforts to take forward the process begun by King Hussein and that the United States has a special responsibility in the region. The President has also made this view plain on the occasion of two other important recent visits to Washington, that of King Fahd of Saudi Arabia in February and that of President Mubarak of Egypt, which ended yesterday. I saw King Fahd and the Saudi Foreign Minister in Saudi Arabia last week and heard at first hand that the Saudi Government are also determined that the present opportunity for progress should not be lost.

As my hon. Friend said, we are honoured to have President Mubarak in Britain today as our guest. It is plain that, in addition to supporting strongly the initiatives of King Hussein and Mr. Arafat, President Mubarak is also ready to play his part in bringing nearer the decisive stage of direct negotiation between Israel and the Arab side.

We have also noted with interest that these developments are being followed closely in Israel and that Prime Minister Peres has commented favourably on some aspects. We have a regular dialogue with the Israeli Government and look forward to the visit of Deputy Prime Minister Shamir before too long.

We are profoundly concerned by the conditions which prevail within the occupied territories, notably in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Wells referred. My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary drew our concern to the attention of the Government of Israel when he visited that country last October. We are in regular contact with representatives of the Palestinian people in those territories. We continue to deplore the strengthening of illegal Israeli settlements in their lands. We deeply regret the closure for two months of Bir Zeit university on the West Bank. We are also concerned about the economic conditions of the Palestinians in the occupied territories, and have recently increased the level of our aid.

My hon. Friends referred to the Lebanon. Recent developments there are a further indication of the destructive effect of the Arab-Israel conflict on the countries of that region. The horrifying events of the weekend in Beirut and in the south, in which further Lebanese and Israeli lives were lost, underline the urgent need to break the cycle of violence. The Government's views are clear. We condemned the Israeli invasion of 1982. We have consistently called for the withdrawal of all foreign forces the presence of which is not authorised by the Lebanese Government. We therefore welcomed Israel's decision in January to make a full withdrawal and look for early and orderly completion of that pullback to the south of the international border. Israel must meanwhile respect international humanitarian law.

My hon. Friend the Member for Westbury referred to the British vote on the Lebanese draft resolution in the United Nations Security Council on 12 March. It was entirely right that the Security Council should discuss the situation in Lebanon. There were several elements of the draft which we could support, but, as a whole, it was unhelpful. It contained no reference to the role of UNIFIL, nor to the need to assist with the Secretary-General's efforts to promote a diplomatic solution. in our view, it would do nothing to arrest the cycle of violence or to accelerate Israel's withdrawal.

We remain deeply concerned about the situation in south Lebanon. We believe that Israel's iron fist policy will further fan the flames and damage her own security interests on her border with Lebanon. Violence of any sort, retaliation and counter-retaliation, will solve nothing. The need now is for a resumption of the Israel-Lebanon talks to make arrangements for an orderly withdrawal by the Israeli armed forces and for close co-operation with UNIFIL to protect Lebanese civilians.

My hon. Friend the Member for Westbury asked about the Iran-Iraq war. I should not end without saying something about the deterioration which the last few days have seen in that other appalling middle eastern conflict, the war between Iran and Iraq. We wish to see the earliest possible end to this tragic and wasteful episode. We have today been in touch with the United Nations Secretariat with the aim of a call being issued for a ceasefire on both sides. In the meantime, we are keeping a close watch on the situation of the British communities in Iran and Iraq. I am glad to say that we have had no reports of any British casualties, but we shall of course maintain maximum vigilance.

The middle east is an area of vital importance to Europe and to Western interests generally. The Government share the view expressed this evening that there is now a chance of progress in the search for a settlement of the Arab-Israel conflict. We look to the renewed efforts of the United States to take forward that process. We shall also continue to look for ways in which the European Community can play a helpful role and shall continue to use our influence to encourage the parties concerned to seek a peaceful resolution of their differences, so that the people of the middle east can at last enjoy a secure and dignified future, safe from the threat of violence and of war.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-six minutes to Eleven o'clock.

House of Commons

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITIONS

Human Embryos

9.34 am

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): I beg to ask leave to present a petition on behalf of my constituents. It includes 878 signatures and those of the entire congregation of Stanmore Baptist church and concerns the protection of human embryos. It would not be right for me to go into the arguments today, not least because the matter is being debated in Committee and many other such petitions from all over the Kingdom have been presented. I hope that the House will take full cognisance of the arguments.

The petition continues:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure that involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray etc.

To lie upon the Table.

West Midlands

9.36 am

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): I beg to move,

That this House deplores the effects of present Government policies on the people of the West Midlands, until recently the heartland of the manufacturing industry on which the wealth of this country was based; notes with deep concern the continued substantial increase in unemployment in the region and the severe suffering inflicted on so many individuals and families there by the return of mass unemployment, the sharp decline in public sector house-building, and other cuts in important services; deplores as well the proposed abolition of the West Midlands County Council which serves the region well; and calls on the Government to reverse these disastrous policies and thus alleviate the hardship being suffered in the West Midlands.

The last time that I initiated a debate on the west midlands was December 1981 when my right hon. and hon. Friends and I warned that all the indications were that, far from there being any signs of improvement, unemployment in the region would continue to worsen. We feel no satisfaction at realising how justified were our fears.

The west midlands has experienced continual factory closures, large-scale redundancies and increases in the number of people on the dole. There has also been a considerable increase in poverty. Among the firms that have closed in the black country area of the west midlands since 1979 are the following: Rubery Owen in Darlaston — it once employed 7,000 — Round Oak steelworks, Patent Shaft steelworks, J. Bagnall and Son, British Steel Corporation Bilston rolling mill, Chance Brothers, Guy Motors, Vowles Foundry, F. H. Lloyd (Dudley), NEI Thompson Pressure Vessels and Bullers Engineering. They have all closed with the loss of thousands of jobs. This year, C. & B. Smith Foundries, Wednesfield, has declared its intention to close in October 1985 with the loss of 460 jobs. NEI Wellman Clyde Booth of Darlaston intends to close in May with the loss of 179 jobs. Last Friday, my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George), myself and representatives of the work force met the management only about two miles from here. We argued as strongly as we could that the firm should not close but there was no reprieve.

In addition, the washing machine firm, Servis, is to go, although we all hope that new owners can be found. Some 500 jobs at Darlaston are at risk, as are many more in other parts of the country. My hon. Friends will be interested to hear that the firm was featured in the Tory political film shown two days before polling day at the 1983 general election. That propaganda film used the company to illustrate the assertion:

"we're going forward towards a better future, a future which will have new jobs to offer."

Unfortunately, very few new jobs are on offer in the west midlands, but plenty of jobs have been lost and are being lost.

Whereas in 1978 there were 16 closures in the west midlands, and 34 closures in 1979, the figure in 1983 was 275 and last year it was 263. In 1981, there were 800 company liquidations in the west midlands. Last year, the figure was 1,286. It all adds up to a bleak picture for the region. That is why it is necessary, a few days before the Budget, for Opposition Members to emphasise that we need a change of Government policy to allow the west midlands and the black country to survive as an industrial area, and to stop the closures and redundancies. That point will be made time and again in speeches today. A change of policy must be reflected in the Budget next Tuesday.

The damage inflicted on manufacturing industry is illustrated by the fact that, during the past six years, there has been an estimated reduction of 30 per cent. in the number of people employed full time in manufacturing industry in the west midlands. In the black country, the reduction is 31 per cent. Is it any wonder, therefore, with this sharp downturn in manufacturing industry, that the dole queues get longer and longer? Is it any wonder that more and more people are forced to eke out a living with their families on supplementary benefit? Is it any wonder that many of our constituents come to see us and write to us saying how difficult it is to make ends meet? What crime have they committed that they cannot obtain jobs and must remain unemployed, not just for a few weeks or months, although that is bad enough, but for longer and longer periods?

We all know the way in which unemployment has grown and the fact that the counting of the unemployed has been so altered as no longer to reflect the accurate figure. But we should consider the change that has occurred in the west midlands, even using the official figures. I hope that Conservative Members, who no doubt have come here to justify Government policy, will reflect on these figures. In May 1979, in the black country—my constituency is in the black country, so I refer to it often—28,829 people were unemployed. On the last count, the figure was 105,387.

The problem is not just unemployment but the period for which people are unemployed. Let us consider the number of long-term unemployed in the west midlands and take two opposite age groups. First, in April 1979—a month before the Government took office — slightly more than 17,000 people aged 45 or more had been unemployed for longer than a year. At the last count, the figure was just under 55,000. One can imagine the extra difficulties that that age group experiences when trying to find work. What chance has someone in his forties or fifties of finding another job? It is easy to quote figures, but behind the statistics lies human tragedy. The person unemployed has lost the ability to earn his living, he must live on supplementary benefit, his savings have been spent, and his pride is shattered.

Yesterday during Prime Minister's Question Time, we referred in passing to youth unemployment. In April 1979, the number of people aged under 25 who had been unemployed for 12 months or more was just under 6,000. In January this year, the figure was just under 55,000. That figure probably underestimates the true position.

In April 1979, 34,000 people in all age groups in the west midlands had been unemployed for more than a year. In January this year, the official figure was 164,529. What a condemnation of Government policies. What a condemnation of what has been inflicted on the west midlands by the deflation policies of the past five or six years. The west midlands is well represented on a list of constituencies with the highest male unemployment. I am sure that my hon. Friends who represent Birmingham will know that in three Birmingham constituencies male unemployment is well over 30 per cent. In 11 other west midlands constituencies, male unemployment is more, and in some cases much more, than 20 per cent. In Walsall, North male unemployment is 22·5 per cent.

This year I received a letter from a constituent, which I will quote. He said:

"I have been unemployed for the last two and a half years ever since Guy's Motors of Wolverhampton closed down. I have tried to find work but to no avail. All they say is we are too old. I am 54 years and very fit for my age."

He then refers to the amount of supplementary benefit that he receives and continues:

"My savings are all gone. My wife is unable to work with ill health. I have one son of nine years . . . I was wondering if there is any hope for us. I was out before for two years and it's very rough on people. I am willing to do anything in the way of work. It's very hard when you want to work and all you have to look forward to is old age and the grave. Mind you, you cannot afford to die these days, it's too expensive. You just sit and think of doing nothing for the rest of your life. If you do have the chance of a job, what happens? You have a letter if you are lucky. Sorry no work. There are so many firms going bust with all the cutbacks."

What he means is that, if a man applies for a job, he is lucky to receive a letter, although the letter will usually be one expressing regret that the firm cannot take him on.

I thought it was appropriate to send that letter to the Prime Minister. She replied in predictable terms, no doubt like the response that we shall get today from the Minister. She regretted the position, sent her sympathies to my constituent and the rest of it, but those sympathies and regret will not do much good to my constituent. He wants to work. We all want to work. Why should he and so many like him be denied the opportunity of working?

The most important reform in the immediate post-war years was the continuation of full employment to get away from the mass unemployment, poverty and destitution of the pre-war years. Now that is being eroded, undermined and destroyed. The formidable problems in the west midlands will not really be helped much by the granting of intermediate area status to part of the region. Total expenditure on regional assistance for all parts of the country is to be cut from £700 million to £300 million by 1987-88. The money for areas with intermediate area status is not likely to amount to much.

Of course, we are pleased to receive any form of assistance. We are not in a position to refuse, we represent our constituencies. We want a new deal for the west midlands. The amount being given is——

Miss Betty Boothroyd (West Bromwich, West): Pitiful.

Mr. Winnick: Yes, it is pitiful. The amount offered is far from sufficient to cope with the devastation in the west midlands. The president of the Wolverhampton branch of the Building Employers Confederation has written to tell me how disappointed he is about the small amount of money that is available. He knows, I am sure, what he is talking about and he says that what little is being done is not enough to encourage the necessary investment. I sent the letter to the appropriate Minister.

What do we want most? There is no doubt about it. First, we want a vast injection of private and public investment in the west midlands. Since 1979 private companies in the United Kingdom have shifted about £50,000 million of production and capital abroad. The abolition of exchange controls was a direct incentive to investment abroad. The investment that we need in the west midlands is going abroad, at the expense of our constituents.

I wish that I were wrong, but I doubt whether next Tuesday in the Budget we shall be able to say that essential investment will be directed to the west midlands.

We need public investment in housing, railways and telecommunications. The west midlands has been starved of public investment in the last few years, as have other areas.

Let us consider housing. As my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, South knows, no contracts for council house dwellings have been entered into in our borough since 1979. That is almost unbelievable. Some people tell me that that cannot be so and that I must be wrong, but that is the official position. I do not need the official figures, because I know what is happening only too well from my surgeries and correspondence.

A tremendous amount of housing improvement is necessary in that borough, and yet year after year the housing investment programme allocation remains totally inadequate to meet housing requirements. About 6,500 dwellings in the borough, in both the public and private sectors, are designated as unfit. That applies to many boroughs, if not all, in the west midlands.

Many tenants who have waited a long time for their homes to be modernised now have to wait even longer. The Rosehill estate in Willenhall consists of pre-war council dwellings. For years tenants have waited for their homes to be modernised. In January last year the council told me that it hoped to start work in the 1985-86 financial year. I wrote to the council again this year and I was told that the work could not be started and that further delays were inevitable. The reason is obvious. Sufficient HIP money is not available.

Tenants from Rosehill have written to me asking whether a Minister will receive a deputation. Yesterday I wrote to the Secretary of State for the Environment asking whether he or one of his colleagues will receive a deputation from Rosehill estate. I hope, of course, that he will say yes.

Why is money not available for housebuilding in the public sector? Why is money not available for improvements, modernisation and urgent repairs? Money could be put to good purpose to satisfy housing needs in the borough. People with families are having to wait years to be rehoused. There are those in multi-storey blocks, waiting to be transferred to a house. The Government will remind us that under their policy tenants can buy their home. But what about building? Why all the emphasis on selling council dwellings? Why are they not being built? Why is pre-war accommodation not being improved? I wonder how many tenants at Rosehill have applied to buy their homes. I imagine that very few have applied.

We need a vast housing programme to build much needed accommodation and to modernise. The longer modernisation is delayed, the more expensive it will be. Local authorities are to be limited further in the amount of money that they can spend on housing. We debated that earlier in the week.

Manufacturing industry must be encouraged. I do not see how manufacturing industry can be revived without some control on imports. I do not want to debate at length today the pros and cons of imports but I am sure that the continuing flood of manufactured items from abroad into the west midlands plays its part in undermining domestic industry. I am certain that we cannot achieve a sustained economic recovery in the west midlands, or anywhere else, without some control over imports.

Mr. J. F. Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): If we impose controls on imports other countries are likely to impose constraints on our goods which go abroad. The United Kingdom is still one of the greatest exporters in the world.

Mr. Winnick: For the first time since the industrial revolution we are importing more manufactured items than we are selling abroad. The hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) overlooked that. Constraints are already imposed by other countries, which discriminate against British goods. The hon. Gentleman overlooks the raw deal that we have because of our membership of the EEC. Some protection is necessary. That is my opinion, not because of dogma, but because I cannot see how we can achieve sustained economic recovery without such controls.

We must broaden the industrial base in the west midlands. I do not deny that the decline has been going on for some time. We need new technological industries. There is little sign that we are attracting the new industries necessary to broaden the industrial base. The older industries are declining. Manufacturing industry is having tremendous difficulties and the area is not attracting the replacement industries which are so necessary to avoid continued mass unemployment in the region.

Lack of demand in the economy has led to deflation and mass unemployment. Conservative Members are fond of saying — they will say it today — that other factors, including a world recession, are involved. It is interesting to recall that during the last general election a draft report of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service —an all-party Committee which was chaired at the time by the then chairman of the 1922 Committee, the right hon. Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann)—had stated that at least half of all the unemployment that had occurred since 1979 had been due to Government policies. We say that the figure is more than half.

It is no use Conservative Members saying that the Government cannot be held responsible for what has happened. Many of their policies initiated since 1979 have led to the devastation of, and tragedy that now exists in, the west midlands. The Government must bear a heavy responsibility for what has occurred.

My hon. Friends will refer I know to the closing of skillcentres. What sense is there in closing them? I have referred to the number of youngsters in the west midlands who have been unemployed for longer than a year. It is madness in the present situation to close skillcentres. Will Conservative Back Benchers try today to justify that action?

My motion refers to the role of the West Midlands county council. It has played a positive role and its abolition will serve no purpose. I pay tribute to the work of the West Midlands enterprise board, which was set up by the Labour-controlled county council. The board is a form of regional initiative — I only wish that such initiative would be shown by the Government—which took on the task of trying to save jobs. It appreciated that it could play only a modest role, but it has been a useful one. It is now supporting nearly 3,000 jobs in companies having an average of 110 employees. That has helped to ensure that firms and jobs have been retained.

In the situation that I have described, anything that saves firms from collapse and jobs from disappearing should be welcome. If the county council is abolished, the role of the enterprise board is not likely to be retained. I do not believe that any financial provision is being made for district councils in the west midlands adequately to take over the role of the board. Shall we see the jobs that are now being sustained by the board disappearing, creating yet more unemployment?

Some of my hon. Friends have come to the House today to illustrate what is happening in their parts of the west midlands. They will explain how the region has suffered. We are speaking of an area which was the very heartland of Britain's manufacturing industry. It has been devastated. Darlaston, represented by my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, South, whatever problems it may have had, was a thriving industrial area until 1979. Those who think that I have exaggerated the effects of monetarism and Thatcherism should visit Darlaston, which has become almost a ghost town as a result of redundancies and closures.

The west midlands has suffered enough in the last six years. I have been asked by the media what purpose this debate will serve. I have replied, frankly, that we are unlikely to persuade Ministers to change their minds. We should be deceiving our constituents to suggest otherwise. Nevertheless, part of our job here, in representing our constituents in the west midlands, is to expose the devastation that has occurred and the suffering that is being endured by the people there, by men and women who want to work but who are denied that opportunity, with little sign from the Government of any change of policy.

I do not know whether we shall persuade Ministers to change their minds. Probably not. But we have a responsibility to keep bringing these matters to the House. I do not care how often we debate this subject. Even if we do not get a response from Ministers, at least we know that we are doing our job in bringing the problems of those who elected us to the attention of Parliament. That is why this debate is necessary and justified.

I am deeply concerned by the signs in my constituency of an increasing number of people living in poverty and near poverty. Some of them I know, others write or come to see me. Imagine what it must be like living on supplementary benefit year in and year out, existing on the tiniest income, having to make every penny count.

Is there no alternative? We say that there is. A change of economic policy is necessary. The time has come for economic expansion and to end Thatcherism and monetarism, which have brought only suffering to the west midlands.

10.6 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. David Trippier): To listen, as I have carefully, to the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), one might be forgiven for believing that when Labour Members were last in office they had the miracle cure for all the problems of the west midlands and that unemployment there halved, instead of doubling, as it did.

People may have forgotten that the Labour party was in power for two thirds of the 15 years prior to the Conservatives being elected in 1979. During that period, they presided over stagnation and a cancer running throughout industry in that great region, to which they never applied even sticking plaster, let alone major surgery.

Those times were, and still are, times of dramatic change, some not so welcome but others positively exciting and challenging, and that is particularly so of the technological age of which we are now firmly a part.

The points raised by the hon. Gentleman which affect the Department of the Environment will be dealt with by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary at that Department. Of the points that concern me, it perhaps came as no surprise that the hon. Gentleman did not mention wealth creation—he referred to wealth distribution, as Labour Members are commonly known to do—or the need to improve industry's competitive edge. He did not talk much about the importance of small firms and their potential for employment and wealth creation. Nor did he talk about indigenous growth, diversification, modernisation and innovation. All of that is a foreign language to Labour Members, and in these matters the hon. Gentleman suffers from a delusion of adequacy.

Let us consider what really happened and what caused the decline of the traditional industrial sectors of the west midlands. For long, the area was the heart of the nation's manufacturing industry. The 1·9 million people in employment in the region—10 per cent. of all Great Britain's employees—account for over 13 per cent. of all those in manufacturing industry. That is reflected in the region's industrial sector, with 38 per cent. of employment being accounted for by manufacturing industry, compared with the United Kingdom average of 28 per cent.

With its heavy dependence on goods for the consumer market, it was perhaps inevitable that the region would be hit particularly hard by the recession, which has been worldwide and by no means confined to the United Kingdom.

The region has depended upon a relatively narrow industrial base, concentrated precisely on those industries most vulnerable to recession. They have their share of the negative side of the great industrial legacy of the west midlands—the decline from the peaks of the 1960s through to the stagnation of the 1970s and on to the decline during the world recession. That is a fate which inevitably befalls the overmanned and uncompetitive, with some notable exceptions.

Companies—especially those which have for so long been carrying the burden of overmanning—have not been sheltered from the recession, and they have been forced to shed a considerable amount of labour. The result of that is the historically high level of unemployment in the region, which is obviously the concern of each and every one of us.

However, the recession is not the only reason for the difficulties that the west midlands is facing, although it has played a considerable part. Running alongside the recession has been the structural weakness of some industries of importance to the region, especially the motor industry, with whose problems we are all familiar. However, it goes without saying that the west midlands is still the country's key manufacturing region.

How did the Government respond to that situation? We have acted through our broad economic policies, and their success can be seen by the fact that this year looks set to become the fifth successive year of economic growth, which is the longest period of sustained growth since the last world war. The new economic climate that is leading to substantial and sustained recovery has been fostered by the Government, since we came into office, through a policy of sound money and responsible control of public expenditure. Through this approach we have created a climate in which business can prosper and enterprise can flourish. The benefits of this policy are indispensable to recovery and prosperity.

The success of the Government's policy has enabled a whole host of measures to be taken to create incentives for enterprise and small business expansion. It is important that every effort is made to encourage enterprise throughout the economy. The Government will continue to attach great importance to the manufacturing sector, which must continue to occupy a central place in our economy if we are to grow and prosper. We need buoyant manufacturing output to satisfy home demand, to provide employment and to generate enough exports to pay for the imports which both industry and private consumers need.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson (Coventry, North-West): The Minister will appreciate that in speaking so early in the debate he will not be able to respond to the issues that will be raised after he has completed his contribution. I wish to put one or two matters to him now so that he can take them up before he resumes his place. The hon. Gentleman has spoken of four years of recovery and told us that he accepts the importance of manufacturing industry. For the second year running we have a massive and growing deficit in manufacturing trade, which is reflected in the continuing decline of manufacturing industry in the west midlands. How can he call that a success? What do the Government intend to do to redress the balance and to get manufacturing industry in the west midlands moving again?

Mr. Trippier: I shall spell out the figures to the hon. Gentleman. He may recall that I have spelt them out to him before. I did so when we were in Committee on the Co-operative Development Agency and Industrial Development Bill. However, I shall rehearse them for his benefit and for the benefit of others who are interested.

There have been some notable achievements in the manufacturing sector. Last year we recorded our best annual export performance for over a decade. In the fourth quarter of 1984, non-oil export volumes increased by 12 per cent. over the same quarter in 1983 and manufacturing exports increased by 15 per cent. That was achieved despite the coal strike—which the hon. Member for Walsall, North supported throughout in speeches in the House and in questions which he put to my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Energy and the Prime Minister—manufacturing output rose last year by 3·3 per cent.—the fastest rate of growth since 1973. For four years up to November 1984, manufacturing productivity increased at an average growth rate of 6 per cent. a year. That is the sort of increase that, in our modesty, we attribute readily to the Japanese but not usually to ourselves. That rate of growth is significantly faster than anything achieved by West Germany and the United States in the same period.

As we are all aware, this increase in activity has not been reflected so far in the number of unemployed. There is only one way to create jobs and to reduce unemployment. We must constantly encourage the competitiveness of our manufacturing and service industries. Our prosperity will depend on a balanced development of both.

I reaffirm that the Government will continue to attach great importance to the manufacturing sector. Manufacturing has been the heart of the west midlands' economy, and it must continue to occupy a central place if we are to continue to grow and prosper. We shall do our best to provide the right climate for this growth, but much of the task must lie with industry itself. We cannot legislate for it. Individual firms must adopt efficient production methods, working practices and new technology.

Until recently the chant of the Opposition parties, most notably that of Her Majesty's official Opposition, was, "What economic recovery?" We have heard that chant before. Gross domestic product is a measure of the nation's total output, and it is now at an all-time peak. It is about 4·5 per cent. above the previous peak in 1979. Our critics have been forced to change tack. Since early 1981—the trough of the world recession as experienced in the United Kingdom—our economy has grown steadily for nearly four years. That is the longest sustained upturn in the United Kingdom since the second world war, and it is far from over. All the forecasters are predicting continued buoyant growth throughout 1985 up to 3·5 per cent. following the end of the miners' strike.

We are all used to unfavourable comparisons between the United Kingdom and its European competitors. When our performance compares well with our competitors, for goodness sake let us not belittle our achievements. The United Kingdom led Europe out of recession and the west midlands played a significant part in that. We had the highest output growth rate in the European Community in 1983. Last year, despite the miners' strike, our growth is expected to have been close to the EEC average. Forecasters are expecting once again that in 1985 the United Kingdom will head the EEC growth table. With the economic recovery clear to all, the Opposition——

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson rose——

Mr. Trippier: I shall not give way.

I cannot resist making this point. The Opposition have now changed their chant of "What recovery?" to a charge that the recovery has been confined to the service sector. They allege that manufacturing industry has not benefited, so let us put that right. The accusation may be bewildering to those who have noted the buoyant CBI industrial trends surveys over the past two years, which have reported improved business confidence and prospects. People are right to be sceptical, but the fact is that manufacturing industry has participated fully in the recovery. If anything, the recovery in manufacturing has been faster than that of the economy as a whole. That is especially true in the west midlands. Since the first quarter of 1981—the trough of the manufacturing recession—manufacturing output has grown by 9·2 per cent. compared with growth in total output of 8·4 per cent.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Does my hon. Friend agree that investment is not necessarily a sign of opportunities for jobs? That is precisely why our right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer phased out some of the advantages to capital in the last Budget.

Mr. Trippier: I agree entirely. It will be interesting to see what comes forward in the Budget next week. Of course, I have no idea of what will be in the Budget.

[Mr. Trippier]

However, I am sure that many in the west midlands will be pleased if the Chancellor concentrates more in his Budget on raising tax thresholds than on spending overmuch on the infrastructure.

As with total output, we shall soon enter the fifth successive year of sustained growth. There are no signs, despite the doomsayers' prophecies of last year that the upturn in manufacturing in general is petering out, and there is no sign of it in the west midlands. The reverse is true. In 1984 manufacturing output rose by 3·5 per cent. —the largest percentage increase since 1973. The signs for 1985 and beyond continue to look good, with at least 2·5 per cent. growth predicted for this year. That is precisely what the Government's economic policies were designed to achieve—steady sustainable growth, not just a few years of boom followed by the inevitable bust.

Within manufacturing, some sectors have performed well, while others obviously have performed less well, but there is nothing unusual in that. The growth in some manufacturing sectors has been dramatic. Output of office machinery, including electronic data processing equipment, has risen by a staggering 182 per cent. since the manufacturing recession trough in 1981. Electronic consumer goods output has grown by 35 per cent.; agricultural chemicals by 29 per cent.; plastic products by 25 per cent.; and pharmaceutical and consumer chemicals, industrial chemicals and electronic industrial goods by 21 per cent.

One of the encouraging aspects of the recovery in manufacturing is the improvement in export performance. Since the end of 1983, manufactured exports have been increasing strongly, and, by the end of 1984, their expansion had turned into a veritable surge. In the final quarter of 1984, the volume of manufactured exports was 15 per cent. higher than a year earlier and 13 per cent. higher than in the previous quarter. The volume of manufactured exports is running at more than 10 per cent. above its previous peak.

It is encouraging that what can be termed the inner performance of manufacturing, on which future success will depend, has also been responding well. The volume of investment in manufacturing grew sharply by 13 per cent. in 1984, and a further 7 per cent. real increase is predicted for 1985 by my Department's investment intentions survey.

Mr. Budgen: That must be right.

Mr. Trippier: It must be if it comes from my Department.

Equally encouraging, with a view to our international competitiveness, is the remarkable improvement in manufacturing productivity. By the first quarter of 1984, manufacturing output per head was 28 per cent. above its trough in 1980. Productivity performance remains strong, with an increase of 4·5 per cent. in 1984.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: I wanted to put several points to the Under-Secretary of State and I wanted him to go a little further before putting them to him, but he is trying to claim that his policies are a success in the remarkably rosy picture that he is painting. I am sure that not many Opposition Members with constituencies in the west midlands recognise that picture. We must measure that success against the success of our competitiors. Will the hon. Gentleman tell us any other country that has managed to transform its balance of payments on manufacturing —its net exports—from a surplus of £2 billion to a deficit of £5 billion since 1979? What other Government has achieved a remarkable 4·5 per cent. increase in GNP during nearly six years of government? Has any other country managed that wonderful achievement? Other countries have done significantly better. What other country has a manufacturing output that is still lower than the peak achieved in 1973? What other country has achieved this remarkable success story? Lastly——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. Interventions should be brief.

Mr. Robinson: I am on my last point, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Unfortunately, the Under-Secretary of State chose to speak first. We have not had a chance to hear these points and to reply to them. Because the hon. Gentleman chose to speak first—we did not think that that would be the case—I have had to intervene to get these points home to him so that we can obtain answers. I apologise to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for having to do so.

Can the Minister tell us any other country where manufacturing investment is still 25 per cent. below its level five years ago?

Mr. Trippier: I think that the hon. Gentleman is using the excuse of an intervention to rehearse a speech which he will probably have an opportunity to make later, if he is fortunate enough to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I should obviously like to cover the specific points——

Mr. Robinson: There are four points.

Mr. Trippier: If the hon. Gentleman had listened more carefully, he would have noted that I have already covered two of them. I am afraid that I would require notice of the other points. I shall write to him about them.

I have heard the hon. Gentleman speak on a number of occasions about the west midlands. Has he considered, bearing in mind that not only people in the west midlands but others abroad read what he has said, the fact that some of the doom-laden prophecies he has made are blighting the region considerably? The hon. Gentleman should be a little more responsible when talking about the region as a whole.

Mr. Robinson rose——

Mr. Trippier: I have been fair to the hon. Gentleman. I have no intention of giving way.

Mr. Robinson: On that last point——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Under-Secretary of State has made it clear that he is not giving way. The hon. Member for Coventry, North-West (Mr. Robinson) may seek to catch my eye later in the debate.

Mr. Trippier: For a long time there has been a widely held view that areas have been unfairly discriminated against and have suffered because of past and present regional policies. Nowhere was that view more strongly held than in the west midlands. Why continue with a regional policy? Of course, parts of Britain have been assisted areas since the 1930s, and that might seem to be an argument for saying that regional policy cannot change things. There is no doubt that regional policy has created more jobs. Indeed, estimates of more than half a million jobs are often quoted. In fact, we referred to them in publishing the White Paper on regional policy at the end of 1983. However, we recognised that the previous policy was not suited to today's economic climate. It has been expensive and the expenditure has not been made in the most cost-effective way.

First, there has been, job shuffling from non-assisted areas. Secondly, the old regional development grant scheme was not job-related and favoured capital-intensive industries, thus harming job prospects. Thirdly, assistance did not extend to services, which is what the regions needed, especially the west midlands with its dependence on manufacturing industry.

In the past, redistribution of jobs was a purpose of regional policy, but that was more justifiable in the 1950s and 1960s when the economy was growing and unemployment was low. Now all regions have historically high unemployment levels, as they did when the Socialists left office.

A particular problem had been the west midlands. Unemployment there had risen at a faster rate than elsewhere, but the region had not been an assisted area. Although its worst disadvantages were removed when industrial development certificates were abolished in 1982, coincidentally, a decision which was announced to this House by my predecessor my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, South (Mr. MacGregor) during a debate on a private Member's motion in December 1981 in the name of the hon. Member for Walsall, North, there is plenty of scope for improvement. The Government, by making changes, are trying to get better value for money. Those changes will also enable public expenduture savings to take place.

Following our fundamental review of regional policy, we can answer this criticism. The effect on the region of the new policy, together with a new assisted area map, was immediate. For the first time, a large part of the west midlands was included in the map as an intermediate area. Approximately 77 per cent. of the working population of the west midlands now falls within an assisted area.

What precisely does intermediate area status mean to the west midlands? For the first time, those areas that have been made assisted areas will be eligible for regional selective assistance under section 7 of the Industrial Development Act 1982. That assistance takes certain forms. First, project grant is available for projects in the manufacturing and service sectors. Grants are based on the fixed capital costs of a project and the number of jobs a project is normally expected to create over three years. The amount of grant available will be negotiated as the minimum necessary to enable the project to proceed.

Secondly, there is the in-plant training scheme. Grants may be made to cover up to 80 per cent. of eligible training costs. We have responded to requests to introduce such grants.

Thirdly, the exchange risk guarantee scheme covers firms against the exchange risk on foreign currency loans in return for a service charge.

Fourthly, fixed interest loans from the European Investment Bank of up to 50 per cent. of fixed project costs are available for projects creating and safeguarding jobs —similar loans are available from the European Coal and Steel Community — and projects which create employment opportunities for redundant coal and steel workers.

In addition, the region's assisted areas will qualify for support from the European regional development fund. That will give many west midlands local authorities access to the ERDF for their infrastructure projects for the first time.

I mentioned briefly European Coal and Steel Community loans. These are not only restricted to the assisted areas; they are available in "coal and steel" regions. The European Commission last year recognised that in the west midlands that means the whole of the west midlands metropolitan county and the whole of Staffordshire.

Clearly the west midlands' industrial structure is such that large numbers of companies may now be in a position to benefit from assistance. The amount of aid coming to the region will, however, depend on the response of the business sector, since regional aid is demand-led. The west midlands assisted areas represent 20 per cent. of the total national map coverage, and it is important to the region that it is receiving a fair share of the assistance. Response so far has been great and has produced 4,777 inquiries about regional selective assistance which have passed through the Department's central inquiry point in Birmingham. These have so far generated over 210 cases which are being examined by the Department's officials. By the end of February, 14 had been approved, 21 withdrawn, and 175 were still under appraisal. Of the 14 cases approved, none has yet had any grant paid—it is too early for that—but the associated new jobs are in excess of 530.

To publicise the schemes of regional selective assistance, my Department has held a series of 40 seminars in the region for representatives from local industry and commerce which have attracted a total audience of over 3,700 people. A further four seminars are planned over the next few weeks.

Assisted area status will also mean that the region will be able to compete more effectively for inward investment. There are already over 300 foreign-owned firms in the region employing in excess of 60,000 people, which proves that, even without the benefit of assisted area status, the region has proved attractive to inward investment. The position can only improve now. The Department will continue to work closely with the West Midlands Industrial Development Association—a body which it partly funds in partnership with local authorities and the private sector—in promulgating the advantages the region and not just the assisted area has to offer to inward investors.

It was John Kennedy who said:

"Change is the law of life, and those who look only to the past or present are certain to miss the future."

He was right. Change is an essential and enduring feature of industry and trade, as it is of life. If we spend too long looking back at the golden age of mass manufacturing and full employment, we shall miss the full potential of the age of the small entrepreneur.

The growth of small businesses is one of the most essential elements in the increasing competitiveness and efficiency of the United Kingdom economy. It is a major preoccupation in our determination to continue the development of a general economic climate which enables industry and commerce to realise its potential for wealth creation free from the red tape imposed by our predecessors. The Government have been determined not to let the entrepreneurial spirit wither. That is why support for small firms has been, and will remain, central to our overall economic and industrial policies.

Mr. George Park (Coventry, North-East): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Are we to be told whether the Minister hopes to finish by 2.30 pm?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have no responsibility for the length of speeches.

Mr. Trippier: If the hon. Gentleman listens carefully to the point that I am making about small firms, he will find it interesting.

As a result of the research that I have conducted in the Department of Trade and Industry, it has been ascertained that some 90 per cent. of all firms in the west midlands are small by our definition. That is in itself an impressive figure.

Miss Boothroyd: They are closing down.

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Lady is interested in this subject. She says that they are closing down. I am aware that the fatality rate of small firms in the west midlands, no different from the rest of the United Kingdom, is about one in three in the first three years. As a result of the growth of enterprise agencies in the west midlands—all of them successful—the failure rate of small firms——

Mr. Budgen: Of what?

Mr. Trippier: Enterprise agencies. My hon. Friend is becoming a little confused with enterprise boards. I am talking about enterprise agencies. They are private sector-led. In the areas where local enterprise agencies have been established the failure rate is one in 12, or 8 per cent.

The proof of the pudding is in the eating. Many of the firms in the west midlands and elsewhere require what I call an essential hand-holding service. It is important that we should encourage them, because it is inconceivable that the large firms in the United Kingdom will increase their share of the labour force, whereas I can see that small firms have been, are, and will continue to do so for the remainder of this century and the early part of the next.

I was interested to read a report in yesterday's Financial Times referring to a survey carried out by the west midlands region of the Confederation of British Industry. This response to the survey from firms in the region shows that a "large majority had made significant changes to production processes and had introduced new products".

That was the point that I wanted to make to the hon. Member for Walsall, North because he mentioned it. The article also stated:

"Most companies have turned their efforts towards innovation. About 81 per cent. had widened their product range and more than half had entered new geographical market areas."

I was most interested to read the remarks of Mr. Jim Cran, CBI west midlands director, who said:

"It is clear that enormous behind-the-scenes strides have been taken by companies in a bid to beat the recent industrial decline. The survey results should help bury the ridiculous notion that the West Midlands is on the way out."

We recognise that technology has not altered one basic economic truth. If we are to earn our living in the world, we have to maintain and develop tradeable products that will be winners in international markets. Despite the growth in importance of the service sector, that means manufactured goods.

The Government's objective is now based on the need for companies to establish long-term objectives for their manufacturing activities, ensuring that investment is based on a controlled approach to integration. Our assistance with feasibility studies and planning studies has a key role to play here in helping companies establish the right framework.

Basic building blocks for a bright future already exist, especially those created by the success of the Government's economic policy. The most positive point that I can make, and which can only count in the region's favour, is its reservoir of industrial talent and skills and its fund of entrepreneurs who will pioneer the region's climb back. They are the people who will help to make the west midlands strong and vigorous once again. They are already showing that they are prepared to rise to the challenge.

10.38 am

Mr. Bob Edwards (Wolverhampton, South-East): I am absolutely astonished by the speech of a Minister with responsibility for dealing with the west midlands. It reminds me of the song in the Gilbert and Sullivan opera the "Mikado":

"The flowers that bloom in the spring, Tra la, Breathe promise of merry sunshine."

In the west midlands, people are on supplementary benefit. That has never happened before in the area. They all have to go through the indignities that that kind of life involves. That the Minister can suggest that the economy is booming with great opportunities in the face of such massive unemployment passes my comprehension.

The Minister talked about the situation under Labour and under the present Government. In 1979, unemployment in Wolverhampton was 6 per cent. Today, after six years of Tory rule, it is 18 per cent. and rising. In my constituency it is 20 per cent. As the hon. Gentleman raised that point, let me give him a few details. Since the Government came to power, this is what has happened in all the wards in my constituency. In Bilston, East, unemployment has increased by 400 per cent. The increase has been 460 per cent. in Bilston, North, 294 per cent. in Blakenhall, 347 per cent. in Ettingshall, 401 per cent. in Spring Vale and 447 per cent. in East Park. Those are official figures that cannot be denied. How could the Minister make such an optimistic speech, faced with those facts?

I do not want to make a completely critical speech, although all of us are very emotional when we talk about unemployment in the west midlands. What future have the youngsters? They cannot think of getting married. They will have no kind of life at all. There is no job for them in the future. They are outlaws in our big world. There is nowhere where they can fit in. That is why we get emotional. That is why my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) continues to raise the question of the west midlands.

It is easy to give a recital of trade figures ignoring the fact that manufacturing exports are bound to increase when the dollar is so high and the pound is so low. Of course, one gets temporary new markets, but the fact remains that, whereas we used to be a manufacturing country supplying the markets of the world, we now import more manufacturing goods than we export. That has never happened since the industrial revolution. In the light of those facts, which cannot be disputed, how can the Minister possibly talk about a massive growth in our economy?

Some 80 per cent. of the people in Wolverhampton do not actually come from Wolverhampton. Only about 20 per cent. of the existing population hail from Wolverhampton and 80 per cent. came from all over the country and the Commonwealth — from Scotland, Lancashire and south Wales, and all the depressed areas in the 1930s and 1920s. The area was prosperous only a few years ago. However, the whole area was dominated by about 30 huge British companies. A whole lot of small firms developed, supplying those big companies with all sorts of products. They took in the washing — if the House will pardon the expression — of the big companies, big monopolies.

The reason why so many small companies have gone bankrupt and have gone into liquidation is that those huge companies are no longer British companies; they are multinationals. They have changed the whole pattern of trade and manufacturing in the west midlands and in this country. Where they used to export manufacturing goods in chemicals, tools, machinery and textiles, they now export capital. They have been exporting capital for years. That has changed the whole structure of manufacturing industry in the west midlands. As my hon. Friend said, £50,000 million of British capital sucked out of the toil of the workers and technicians has been exported abroad, not in portfolio investment, but in direct manufacture.

Let me take one example. Dunlop used to produce 80 per cent. of all the sporting equipment manufactured in this country, with a great export market. Today it produces only 7 per cent. of sporting equipment. All the rest comes from subsidiary companies of the big firms developed abroad, much of it from Malaysia, where Dunlop has established a factory.

I could go on. The same has happened in textiles. Courtaulds made a huge mountain of wealth out of the toil of the workers in this country and exported great sums of capital abroad to establish factories in Singapore, Korea, China and Germany—all over the world. One can see the big chimneys in many countries. One may say that that brings in income, but it does not. It brings in a small part of those companies' profits. The rest is used for further development to compete with British firms.

The most successful company in the land is Imperial Chemical Industries, which has made £1 billion-worth of profit. I hope that it will share those profits with its workers, but 42 per cent. of ICI's products are now produced abroad. It has 16 factories producing goods in Europe, and it will not be long before the products of ICI's overseas factories come into this country to compete with chemicals produced in its home factories. The company has six factories in the United States of America. People say that that brings in capital, but does it? It brings in some capital, but the rest goes towards further development in other countries. I give the knife and fork industry as an example. South Korea produces 1 billion knives and forks a year, flooding the world market. Much of the manufacture there is based on British and American capital. I could give further examples.

What is required is a halt to that export of British capital produced by the workers of this country. We should call a halt to that and have some limited control over imports. We are not advocating protectionism, but we think that it is nonsense to allow British industries to be completely destroyed by goods produced by people who work 63 hours a week under starvation wage conditions. There is nothing wrong in a policy of limited control of imports, which, sooner or later, will have to be accepted by any future Government. What is required is genuine growth.

My hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North mentioned the enterprise board of the west midlands county. There one has the only real risk capital in the west midlands. It has put £7 million into small endeavours. It has put money into developing workers' co-operatives, the most important growth enterprises in this country. This week we can see that 1,000 workers' co-operatives have been registered under the Industrial Common Ownership Act 1976. Seven years ago there were only 20. Now there are 1,000 and many hundreds more waiting to be registered. We should encourage that development of workers' co-operatives, and the west midlands enterprise board has been doing just that. Yet the Government are going to wipe the West Midlands county council out of existence, as if it never existed. What will happen to those great endeavours to encourage people to develop enterprises based on mutual support and self-help?

Other hon. Members wish to speak, and I have already spoken for too long, so I shall end by saying that I hope that more concrete proposals will be made in the ensuing debate to deal with the massive problems of the west midlands.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): We have had fierce but perhaps mainly anecdotal speeches from the hon. Members for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) and for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. Edwards). They well illustrated the passion that is rightly felt in the west midlands and the concern felt in every section of the community at the appalling level of unemployment in the black country and the west midlands.

It is sometimes wrongly said that unemployment is solely the concern of the Labour party or of those directly employed in heavy manufacturing industry. Perhaps I can remind the hon. Member for Walsall, North that I have quite a rich suburban area in my constituency, Tettenhall, and many people come to see me and urge the sort of solutions that he wants to see. The pressure to reflate the economy with plenty of cheap money comes not only from what was once described as the industrial working class but from many honourable people from rich middle-class backgrounds and from those who have a vested interest in more public expenditure.

As I listened to the hon. Member for Walsall, North, I reflected that about 100 years ago my grandfather started what became quite a successful foundry business in his constituency. As my mother was the offspring of that family, my part of the family was not particularly well off. But the remainder of my mother's family made quite a bit of money. I rather enviously used to listen to my relatives describing their business lives in Walsall, but I do not remember any of them ascribing their success and money to Government action. I was quite critical and fairly envious, but as far as I recollect they always ascribed their wealth to a combination of luck and hard work. I do not remember any of them saying, as they talked about their dividends, that their success was entirely the result of some brilliant manoeuvre by the Government of the day. I found it rather difficult to listen to the hon. Member for Walsall, North ascribing all the difficulties of the west midlands to Government action or inaction.

The hon. Member for Walsall, North was also wrong when he said that his view would never be listened to by the Government. There are many of us perhaps on this side of the House who might say that his view is listened to by the Government far too much. There seem to be three main approaches to this grievous problem. The first approach is what I believe to be the attitude of the hon. Member for Walsall, North, which is, broadly, that he wants more reflation. The second attitude is that he wants more selective assistance, particularly for the west midlands. However, there is a third attitude that has not yet been touched upon in the debate, and it involves the need to free markets generally. I was disappointed that my hon. Friend the Minister said nothing about that. The Government are putting far too little emphasis on that third approach.

As far as I can see, the Government have given up any serious attempt to reduce inflation below 5 per cent. and that is precisely why they are having to hold interest rates at about 14 per cent. The markets take the view that notwithstanding the rhetoric, the Government are not prepared to squeeze the economy any more. There seem to be strong social reasons for the Government's attitude. But it is no good attacking the Government as though they were logically carrying out all that they promise in their rhetoric. They seem to be prepared to print money to sustain a rate of inflation of about 5 per cent. per annum, which by any standard is a scandalous failure and represents a disgraceful giving-in to those who wish to see more reflation in the economy.

The second approach, which was broadly that of my hon. Friend the Minister, and is to a limited extent the approach of the hon. Member for Walsall, North, is that there should be more pump-priming, and that we should say that we are in favour of reduced public expenditure but nevertheless pride ourselves on the way in which we have spent more money. When attacked by the Labour party, we then say, "We've done better than you." But there seem to be some dangers in that. In the face of attacks from the hon. Member for Walsall, North, the extent to which the Government have spent money in order to try to buy their way out of unemployment has not perhaps been sufficiently stated. As the declining school rolls work their way through into the number of those requiring work, we may find that if, by chance, the unemployment figures fall in later years, we have nevertheless created a huge bureaucracy that is designed to train and employ people as an alternative to their being trained and employed by the private sector.

One has only to look at page 67 of the public expenditure White Paper and at the budget of the Manpower Services Commission to see how, over the past five years, expenditure on that has increased from a little over £600 million to £1,200 million. The figure is forecast to increase, in 1985-86, to something not far short of £1,600 million. In 1979-80, general labour market services cost £107 million, yet the cost is due to increase to something not far short of £700 million in 1985-86. Thus the Government are spending a lot of money, and in many instances it will cause great problems for the future. I am most grateful for the attendance of my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment. He, too, is often much attacked. Indeed, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is unfairly attacked. It is often said against her that she employs only people who agree with her and that she wishes only to employ from within the Tory party those who broadly share her prejudices. But in my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State we have an old-style Macmillan paternalist. As he often says when he goes around the local authorities, he believes in both social and, on occasion, racial engineering at the taxpayers' expense. It is thus grossly unfair to attack him and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in the way that I have described.

The urban programme, for example, has vastly expanded and is often an embarrassment to Tory councillors. If it is proposed to set up, say, an Afro-Caribbean centre and Tory councillors modestly point out that that seems to be a form of reverse discrimination, which on the whole the Tory party appears to be slightly against, Labour councillors can retort, "Not so — Sir George Young is wholly in favour, as are the Prime Minister, the Government and the Tory party". It is unfair to attack the Prime Minister for alleged bigotry when the Government provide taxpayers' money for schemes of that kind.

Hon. Members have only to consult page 116 of the public expenditure White Paper to see the extent to which, under the Government's allegedly tight monetarist policy, the urban programme has expanded from £83 million in 1979-80 to nearly £200 million in 1984-85 and is expected to rise to £230 million in 1987-88. The urban programme and the system of buying our way out of trouble, to which all Governments on the whole subscribe, lives and flourishes most generously and well under the present Administration, so the attacks that I have described are misinformed and unfair. The Government have not followed the logic of their rhetoric to any substantial extent. They have not tried to free labour markets.

The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-East rightly said that Wolverhampton had always been a town of immigrants, and the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) intervened to comment on the way in which the Irish have come to Wolverhampton.

Mrs. Renée Short: They are very nice people.

Mr. Budgen: All immigrants are nice people.

Mrs. Short: The hon. Gentleman should say that more often.

Mr. Budgen: If the hon. Lady will be patient, I am about to deal with the enterprise of the Asian community.

Wolverhampton illustrates the way in which a relatively free economy will grow as the population moves around. The Government, however, have signally failed to free the economy.

In this context, I was delighted at the substantial abolition of the British National Oil Corporation this week. I am glad that the Government have finally admitted that it is neither possible nor desirable to rig the oil market in such a way as to keep prices higher than would otherwise be dictated by the market. Plainly, that is good for the west midlands, which depend on heavy manufacturing industry and especially on the manufacture of motor cars.

What the Government have not done, however—and there is no sign of any intention to do this—is to make it easier and cheaper for employers to employ people by abolishing the wages councils. Recent press reports, which I believe, tell us that it is proposed to take young people out of the ambit of the wages councils——

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): Send them back up the chimneys.

Mr. Budgen: —but say that the wages councils in general will be allowed to continue. That means that we shall not be giving notice in June of our intention to withdraw from the International Labour Organisation and our continued commitment to the ILO will mean that the wages councils have to stay in being for a further five years.

The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East referred to my views about immigrants. The Asian community provides a remarkable illustration of how, probably by avoidance of the laws that inhibit employment, business can be expanded in very difficult circumstances. An excellent document produced by the west midlands county council low pay unit shows that the fastest growing industry in the west midlands is the textile industry, which is almost exclusively owned and worked by Asians. The low pay unit estimates that almost all wages in that industry are below the legal minima prescribed by the relevant wages council.

It has been suggested that entrepreneurs in that sector of the economy do not always obey all the provisions of the Offices, Shops and Railway Premises Act. To the extent that they disobey laws passed to protect the health of their employees I must make it plain that I regret that, but to the extent that they disobey the wages councils, which is wrong as a matter of law and thus cannot be supported, they are teaching the House and the Government a lesson. They are showing that it is possible for people to price themselves into work.

Mrs. Renée Short: With low wages and lousy working conditions.

Mr. Budgen: Yes, of course; that is all very unpleasant. Some of the conditions in which those people work are very bad and some of the wages paid are very low. Nevertheless, even if wages are not much more than the rate of supplementary benefit, it is surely better both for the employees and for the country as a whole that people should be getting a low wage rather than no wage at all. If the alternative is the misery of unemployment and social security, people working for, say £10 more than the supplementary benefit level are doing both themselves and the country a favour.

Unfortunately, the wages councils are among the factors which prevent that——

Mrs. Short: Does the Minister agree with the hon. Gentleman?

Mr. Budgen: Of course the Minister does not agree. As I understand it, the Government are about to give the wages councils a further lease on life. As the wages councils currently cover about 10 per cent. of the employed population, that is no small matter.

Of course, those who are under the wages councils want to keep them. They regard them as an element of protection. That is true both of employers and employees. However, the Government, who are allegedly committed to more free market solutions, seem on the whole to shy away from doing anything about the wages councils.

I do not want to give the impression that I agree with what has been said by my colleagues from Wolverhampton — a town of immigrants — but it is true that the Government have also failed to do anything about rent controls. If we were prepared to abolish the Rent Acts and to have a freer market in lettings, people would be able to move around the country more freely. It would be an advantage to have a more mobile work force in the country so that people could do in other areas what Wolverhampton has done in the past.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): Would not my hon. Friend agree that until those regulations are swept away and until we have a genuinely free market not only within the United Kingdom but also within the EEC——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are debating the west midlands, not the EEC or the United Kingdom.

Mr. Soames: My remarks apply to the west midlands as well as to the EEC. Would we not then have an opportunity to sweep away the rigidities that are holding back the growth of the economy as a whole?

Mr. Budgen: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's observations and agree with them, although he and I often do not regard the problem of the EEC in the same way.

I do not believe the Government's present policy is widely applauded in the west midlands. It is no good saying that enough has been done and simply pointing to the various small schemes by which the taxpayer is trying to ameliorate the worst conditions in the west midlands.

Many people favour a massive reflation on the old-style Macmillan model. I am not among them, but I think that we must recognise that there are definite limits to the tinkering upon which the Government pride themselves in the west midlands. We must lay a much stronger accent upon free markets. There must be a distinctive approach —not necessarily a Tory approach, but perhaps an old-fashioned liberal approach—to such matters. We must free the markets. That would benefit the west midlands greatly and there would be more employment, and that is a matter of concern not just to those who claim to represent only Labour interests but to everyone in the west midlands.

11.14 am

Miss Betty Boothroyd (West Bromwich, West): When the Prime Minister came to Birmingham she told the people of the west midlands:

"There is nothing inevitable about rising unemployment".

That was in 1979 when there were 118,000 people unemployed in the region. Today that figure has trebled, and about 400,000 people are looking for work. Even taking the Government's own doctored figures, 36 people are chasing every vacancy. I believe that the figure is higher than in any other region. I was interested in the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. Edwards), because one person in three is living close to or below the poverty line in that great region.

In each year that the Prime Minister has been the tenant of No. 10 Downing street, 1,000 people have lost their jobs in my constituency. Today in my constituency 7,000 people are out of work, and they and their neighbours are as sick and tired as I am of being told by the Tories that we are now in the fourth year of economic recovery— or, as we have heard this morning, the fifth year.

Conservative Members who have spoken this morning must have been wearing blinkers. In the black country and the entire west midlands we have yet to experience any form of economic recovery. Whole industries have been destroyed. Some of them have been listed this morning by my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick). Firms that were household names have gone out of existence. The past 12 months have been the worst year on record for company failures, with 750 backruptcies and nearly 1,300 liquidations.

Hon. Members have had a chance in the past 48 hours to study the latest "Labour Market Trends". They will have seen that the Manpower Services Commission concludes by stating that it does not see any chance of radical improvements in the region in the coming year. The MSC's findings are to some extent borne out by the CBI, which tells us that the recent rise in interest rates will add another £540 million to industry's repayment costs.

I do not know where the Under-Secretary of State has been in the past few weeks. He has been doing some very selective reading about the CBI's views. There is no doubt that high interest rates can only mean further regression as investment plans are dumped as a result of the Government's bungling over the sterling crisis.

Even the all-party Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee, reviewing the slump in sterling and the leap in interest rates, found itself criticising the ambiguities of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Few of us need reminding of its caustic comments. It reported:

"had the Chancellor been more explicit about his concern for sterling . . . events might have turned out more favourable."

How true. The Chancellor's antics could hardly be less favourable for industry and employment.

The west midlands director of the CBI has said that the Chancellor's antics have brought unwelcome news for west midlands industry. At a time when many companies were trying to invest their way into recovery, Mr. Cran, the regional director of the CBI, who was mentioned by the Minister this morning, went on record as saying:

"I see many small and middle size companies now scaling down their plans or postponing them altogether because the repayment cost is just too high".

The Under-Secretary of State seems to have been hiding himself under a bushel and doing some very selective reading in the past few weeks.

The west midlands has often been referred to as the once great powerhouse of Britain's economy. It takes a special kind of incompetence to turn such a region into a wasteland, but the Government have finally managed it.

In the many debates about the region over the years, some of us have shown that there is an alternative to the strategy of decline and decay pursued by the Conservative party. Today is no exception. Now, bodies and institutions outside the House have caught on to the fact that the Government's policies have failed, and they too are exposing that fact and are joining us in pressing for alternatives.

Only at the beginning of the year there was an illustration in the National Economic Development Office report which warned Ministers in uncompromising terms that Britain's infrastructures had been allowed to deteriorate so badly that there was a critical need for repair and renewal. The report argued for major increases in expenditure on roads, sewerage, housing, schools and hospitals. That is nothing new to the Opposition—we have been saying it for a long time. My right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) and I launched Labour's plan for jobs four years ago in Birmingham, and we made the same points then.

Nowhere is expenditure more crucially needed than on housing in the west midlands. That region has 288,000 houses in the private sector in need of urgent improvement, more than half of which are in need of major repair. In addition, 162,000 local authority houses have serious defects and 110,000 families are on council waiting lists, with a further 10,000 people classified as "homeless". Despite that critical need for homes, new starts in house building in the private sector have fallen. Because of the scale of cuts in housing expenditure during the past six years, fewer than 5,000 new houses are under construction, compared with a rate of 16,000 during the Labour Government's last years in office.

I am delighted that the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment is here this morning; he is very assiduous in these matters and very concerned about housing. I look forward to hearing what he intends to do about housing in the west midlands. If Conservative Members had any shame, they would run for cover at the mere mention of the report published two weeks ago by the Building Employers Confederation. It is a stinging indictment of Government housing policies. It makes it absolutely clear that new house building is lagging far behind any reasonable assessment of need.

It is typical of this Government's attitude that those in most need are those who have been hardest hit. We estimate that in the west midlands £360 million is needed annually to make a significant impact on the increasing rate of deterioration in housing stock. Yet in the current financial year our resources for housing were cut to little more than £180 million—that is, half of what is actually needed. That savage reduction in housing expenditure is nonsense—not least if we look to the future and make plans. By the 1990s, 164,000 new homes will be needed, with a further 10,000 by the turn of the century.

I wonder what message the Minister and the Government have today for those families in need of a home and for the building firms that are going bust. What message do they have for building firms, three quarters of which are working below capacity, and the thousands of construction workers on the dole? At the last count, in 1982, 35,000 construction workers in the west midlands were on the dole—and that was before the Government stopped calculating the figures industry by industry. Since then, we have not been able to discover the figures—and that is another of the Government's methods to cook the books. The need is there and the resources are there. We even have a stockpile of 430 million bricks. What we do not have is a Government with the political nous to bring all the resources together to meet the need.

I want to spend a few minutes discussing the water industry, which is another area of neglect criticised in the NEDO report. Many hon. Members may have heard the news this morning about the crumbling sewers in Bournemouth. Imagine what the sewers are like around the old black country towns of the west midlands, which has 22,000 miles of sewer, of which 10 per cent. are more than 100 years old and the remainder more than 60 years old. They represent huge assets essential to support the industrial and social structures of that region. They must be renewed and not allowed to deteriorate.

The same applies to the replacement and relining of old water mains. We need expenditure of about £10 million over the next 10 years just to cope with the most urgent work. Yet the Severn-Trent water authority's report shows that capital spend now is 60 per cent. less in real terms than it was 10 years ago. Even the "kitchen sink economists" must know that the longer we delay tackling renewal and repair, the more it will cost disproportionately to put things right.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): What is a kitchen sink economist?

Miss Boothroyd: The hon. Lady misses my cynicism —she will catch up with it one day.

I want to make some proposals about the motorways which are so important to the west midlands. At long last the Government have awarded us assisted area status—albeit second-class status. At least it means that the black country route can proceed, and that is welcome. We hope that it will make the area more attractive to industry, even though I understand that it will not link up with the M5 for another six years.

If the Government regard the efficient movement of goods as a vital link in the chain of economic regeneration, they cannot fail to recognise that there is still a great deal to be done. The opening of the M180 has improved communications to the east coast, especially to the port of Immingham. However, it is a matter of considerable concern to industrialists and local authorities alike in the black country that there is very poor communication with the haven ports of Ipswich, Harwich and especially Felixstowe, which is the fastest growing port serving the European Continent.

The Opposition have made proposals in many debates that we felt would go some way towards assisting recovery in our region. However, when we do so we tend to be accused by the Government and their supporters of throwing money at problems. Yet last year alone, the cost of unemployment benefits and tax loss to the Treasury was about £16 billion. It is the Conservative Government who are the big spenders, because unemployment is the biggest spender of all.

The Government consistently fail to distinguish between capital spending and current spending. We need spending for investment, yet the Government always fail to make the crucial distinction between money for investment and money for consumption. I fear that they may do so again next Tuesday in the Budget. They are past-masters in discouraging investment and in promoting the merits of tax cuts. We look for positive steps to stop the rot throughout the nation and to stop the rot in the west midlands. We want to regenerate and revitalise our region. We need to give hope to the people living there.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): I have listened with interest to Opposition Members, especially the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), who unfortunately is not here, so I shall leave my comment on his area until later.

I always find it difficult to understand the Opposition's venom on unemployment, as they played a major part in creating some of today's problems. I refer to the lunatic decisions of successive Labour Chancellors—or was it the one who presented 13 budgets? — and their determination to tax jobs. They first imposed the selective employment tax. Working in a service industry was considered unpatriotic and a betrayal of everything that we stood for. When it fell flat on its face, Labour had the impertinence to put a major tax on jobs in the form of the national insurance surcharge, which played as big a part as anything in the shake-out of the latter 1970s. I know, because I remember dealing with many companies which examined the number of their employees and said that they could not afford to employ that number if they could get a machine to do the job.

I do not accept criticism from the Labour party about unemployment, because it played a substantial part in creating it. Moreover, I do not accept criticism about unemployment from anyone anywhere when they drive a foreign car; nor do I accept any criticism concerning Servis washing machines from those who have not bought one. We are on our second and they are wonderful products. Servis is in difficulties only because so many people insist on buying foreign goods.

The Opposition's attitude is, "Stop the real world, we want to get off." They believe that Britain reigns supreme, that we should create everything we want and to blazes with the rest of the world. Week after week they tell us to give aid to the Third world but, given the opportunity to do something for the Third world, they say, "Do not give them jobs or anything to make to be exported to the developed West, thus enabling them to create their own wealth." We are supposed to give the Third world only food and largesse. We are not allowed to give anything that might possibly be at the expense of Britain. We are all good Socialists here, say the Opposition, but to blazes with the rest of the world. I utterly reject that attitude. I want every country to be able to create wealth and not to have to depend on handouts from the rest of us.

Much of what the Opposition have said harks back to the days of empire when we had a captive market where we could sell our finished goods for raw materials. It was a cosy arrangement. As the empire went its own way, we discovered that it wanted to make many of those products itself, and we now find ourselves alone. Far too many of us have failed to appreciate that we stand alone and that we can survive only by creating wealth from our own resources.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. King: No. Time is limited and I know that many Opposition Members wish to speak. There are grounds for optimism in the west midlands. We have gone through a period of change and tumult because many of the industries that have been supported for a century or so are no longer required. It is no good bemoaning the fact that Cradley Heath was the capital of Britain's, and at one stage the world's, chain industry. Shipping is in decline and one large ship can now do the work of 12. It is obvious that the demand for chains has fallen. It is not the Government's fault that the industry has fallen on hard times; it is just the way in which the world evolves. If we do not understand that, we shall never be able to tackle the challenges that it presents. We cannot seriously believe that we shall have a chain industry in Cradley Heath for ever and a day.

There are grounds for believing that the level of redundancies of the past few years is beginning to diminish. Indeed, the number of redundancies grew by only 1·1 per cent. in 1984. That shows that the worst might well be over. Moreover, in the nine months to December 1984, the number of job vacancies rose. In Birmingham, they were 17·2 per cent. higher than in the previous year, which represented a 23 per cent. increase on the year before that. In Walsall, there has been a 6·6 per cent. increase in registered job vacancies.

Mr. Nellist: Would the hon. Gentleman like £1 for every time that he has heard the Prime Minister say that unemployment is bottoming out on reaching a plateau or that we have turned the corner or that the economy is getting better? Does he agree that the increase in unemployment figures has slowed down in the past couple of years only because of the massaging of the dole figures, such as the removal from those figures of men over the age of 60, youngsters forced on to youth training schemes and women who are denied the right to claim full benefit?

Mr. King: Jobs will continue to change as the industrial base changes. It is a constant process. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment is always telling us how many people are unemployed and Opposition Members keep asking us how many are unemployed. Rarely do we ask how many jobs have been created and how many job vacancies there are. Most people believe that the number of vacancies is a fair indication, though not the only one, of whether the problem is being tackled and whether there are grounds for optimism. On that basis, there are grounds for optimism in the west midlands. There were no fewer than 117,392 job vacancies in the west midlands in the nine months to December 1984. We should not ignore the fact that jobs are being created, punch drunk though we might be from 10 years of redundancies.

The Government's initiative in giving intermediate status in regional aid to the area is to be applauded. It is long overdue, but what my hon. Friend the Minister said about the number of applications is encouraging. Business men are generally buoyant and optimistic that activity in the area is picking up. Only yesterday we heard that Swan Brand, the well known manufacturers of kettles and steam irons, is pulling out of Hong Kong to bring its entire manufacturing capacity back to the west midlands.

Mr. Nellist: Cheap labour.

Mr. King: The hon. Gentleman complains about cheap labour. One minute he wants jobs but when they are being brought back from the far east that is denigrated. I believe that it is to be applauded.

One of the problems is that we do not know what is and what is not British. Last weekend, I responded to the wishes of my wife. She said that in my long absences down here she wpuld welcome some soft melodious music. We do not have a decent stereo record player or tape deck so we went to see what was on offer. There were several British makes such as Fidelity, but there was no indication of whether they were British or how much of them was British. I wanted to buy British—I always have done whenever possible, not at any price but because I understand the relationship between buying British and creating jobs. It is difficult to establish that relationship in far too many goods.

I recently went to Glasgow to look round a subsidiary of a national company in an Industry and Parliament Trust operation. The company was bemoaning the fact that the Navy was thinking of fitting equipment from a Norwegian or German shipyard to new destroyers. Its representatives said, "Should it not be the Government's policy to buy British?" I said, "Indeed it should be, wherever possible, because taxpayers' money is providing the equipment." Then I looked outside and saw their brand new cars parked there. I said, "I see you have three Vauxhall Carlton cars." They said, "Yes, we buy British as well." I said, "You are wrong. It is a Vauxhall badge, but the car is made in Germany and is no more British than the German stabiliser unit for a naval destroyer." They had no idea that the cars were made overseas. We could go a long way to helping ourselves by marking British goods in our shops.

Many industrialists have told me that a great problem at present is a shortage of skilled labour in the west midlands as the economy picks up. We have failed to tackle that problem. The hon. Member for Walsall, North mentioned the closure of skillcentres. I am not one for creating crystal palaces of skillcentres if the alternative is to train more people where it matters in the front line of industry. Instead we should fund job creation and skill-training schemes in industries that are willing to offer successful training schemes.

My one criticism, which I have mentioned many times, is the shortage of essential apprentice schemes. I never hesitate to repeat the story that when I started as an apprentice about 25 years ago, I was paid what in today's terms would be £18 a week. Now apprentices receive more than £50 a week. In Germany, apprentices' pay is only 20 per cent. of adult pay; in Britain, it is 60 per cent. It is hardly surprising that we are not training enough apprentices.

When Jaguar tried to take the initiative and bring in about 200 apprentices, the unions objected. Jaguar said, "We can afford this training scheme, which we believe is essential, only if we can pay apprentices a wage that we can afford." The union said, "No deal," so no apprentices were taken on. The tragedy is that scores of youngsters who would have had a sound training have been denied it by a system that insists on certain rates of pay and nothing else. We must examine the payment of apprentices and try to introduce a scheme whereby industry can afford to take on many more.

Another way in which we can help ourselves is by moderating wage claims. If we reduced wage claims by 1 per cent., or even kept them in line with inflation, we could create about 1 million extra jobs during the next two years. That is a critical factor in industrial costs that compares badly with our competitors.

Mr. Nellist: The hon. Gentleman talks about reducing wages, and he mentioned youth wages earlier. Does he accept—it has been confirmed by the Department of Employment—that under this Government wages for school leavers, compared with adult rates, have fallen by 8 per cent. for boys and by 12 per cent. for girls but that youth unemployment has trebled? What is the relationship between cutting youngsters' wages and creating more jobs for them?

Mr. King: The hon. Gentleman should have heard me say that an apprentice today can command £50 a week compared with about £18 a week 25 years ago. I would say that it is not enough to knock 8 per cent. off £50. That will not price apprentices into training schemes. The essence of a training scheme is that youngsters go there to receive training. They should not expect to take out a deposit on a Honda motor bike or buy a Sony Walkman with their first pay packets. I could not do it, nor could many in my generation, or even older, when they started training. I do not want people to go without or to starve. I do not want a system of slavery. I want to get people on the bottom rung of the ladder into worthwhile jobs, but until we can get them on the bottom rung of the ladder they cannot start to play their part in the creation of wealth.

I applaud the small business initiatives set up by the Government. In 1983-84, about 400 companies received £75 million from 10,000 investors. Unfortunately, not all those businesses were in the west midlands, but no doubt many were. The package of initiatives introduced during the past few years recognises the important role of the small business.

Irrespective of the role of small businesses, our traditional industries in the west midlands still have a major role to play. It is a tragedy that the recent coal dispute played a major part in shedding yet more labour in the west midlands. The National Coal Board is one of the biggest purchasing authorities in Britain. If an industry does not work for 12 months, orders for supplies will not come to manufacturers and suppliers in the west midlands or anywhere else. Small wonder that jobs have been lost in that sector.

If that was not enough, a possible railway dispute is looming. The railways board announced £1·1 billion-worth of investment, which gives the lie to the suggestion that we are not interested in the infrastructure. One more strike, which will have devastating effects similar to those caused by the coal dispute, during which the railways board lost £250 million in income, will mean almost certainly that firms such as Metro Cammell in Saltley in Birmingham will not survive. The board will be unable to order the diesel rail cars that that company was hoping to make. Those are the facts of life. If there is a long rail strike, investment will not take place and suppliers to industry will be in difficulty. Opposition Members may say, "That has nothing to do with it", but I believe that it has everything to do with it.

Metro Cammell's subsidiary, Metro Cammell Weyman, produces buses. Here there is a problem. It is a major supplier to the bus industry, and, as we all know, for about a year the Transport Bill, which I believe has much merit, has tended to blight the bus manufacturing industry. I should welcome an initiative by the Government to reintroduce bus grants—perhaps to firms buying more than 20 buses—on a temporary basis, thereby enabling manufacturing to continue in that industry, which is vital to the area.

The motor industry provides about 5·7 per cent. of manufacturing jobs in the west midlands, and about a third of workers in the car industry as a whole work in the west midlands. There is great optimism in that industry. It is the tow industry that can pull the west midlands out of the recession by creating jobs not just in car manufacture but with suppliers. There is no doubt that the Austin Rover group has been extremely successful after investing £550 million in the west midlands area.

We all know the catalogue of achievements by Jaguar, which only a few years ago was bankrupt. It had clapped-out products; it was a disgrace to British industry and a typical example of everything that had gone wrong. It had a good basic product, but it was slapped together by people who had no motivation to do anything else. Since it was rescued from bankruptcy, output has doubled and the optimism of management and employees is unparalleled. What an asset it is to Coventry, which we usually hear described as an industrial desert. It is a shining jewel, achieving global sales of unprecedented proportions that it could only have dreamed about a few years ago. Just down the road, Talbot Peugeot is implementing a new model programme and will shortly announce a new car, which should do well in the United Kingdom market.

More Austin Rover Metros were sold in February than any other model. The arrival of the Rover 216—the Honda derivative, which is now almost 80 per cent. made in Britain—to supplement the Rover 213 means that more workers have been taken on. At Longbridge alone, about 1,000 new jobs have been created during the past 12 months.

The way forward is to produce products that people want. When Austin Rover eventually returns to the American market, which it had to leave a few years ago, I hope that productivity and the number of vehicles sold will increase accordingly. Only a few years ago, the company exported about 60,000 sports cars to America, which would represent about 12 per cent. of present production. If only we could get a fraction of that market back, there would be even more jobs and opportunities for people in the west midlands.

I look forward to 1987 when the new Rover "XX" is produced. I hope that it will be called MG, because "You can do it in an MG", as we used to say. The Americans might remember the advertisements with a picture of an MG in all the magazines and journals years ago. The new advertisements could state, "Your dad did it in an MG, now you can." That would be a good advertising line and I hope that it will be followed. Every car sold in America means more jobs for the west midlands.

There are enormous opportunities for industry in the west midlands, but there are many problems. The market for the car industry is heavily saturated. About 40 different companies are fighting for a market share in the United Kingdom, with about 800 different models. Competition is unparalleled. There is no easy solution. The Government cannot do anything to ensure that people buy British. They will buy British only if they think that it is the best—the best quality and design and available at the most competitive price. Alas, patriotism does not influence many people when they are purchasing something, although it plays a part for me.

The opportunities exist, but there are clouds on the horizon. The industry faces competition and other problems. Spanish imports cause one problem. An unfair number of Spanish cars as well as foundry products are imported. The traffic is one-way.

European legislation to clean up exhaust systems causes another problem. The Germans want to go it alone with catalysts. It is not possible to fit catalysts to Austin Rover cars because of the design of the cars and the engines. Yet one of the growth markets for that company is Germany. It has tied up with a chain of supermarkets so that it can sell cars in supermarkets. That project will be in jeopardy if the Germans insist on responding to the green parties and adopt a policy to clean up exhaust systems which is highly suspect and has not yet been totally proved in America or anywhere else.

We have to stand fast as a country and insist that our markets are not jeopardised by unilateral decisions taken in European Community states. We shall pay the price if we do not stand firm. I wish that we could stand up for the motor industry as we do for agriculture.

A few years ago I was a customer of a small company in Walsall called Circuit Coatings. Two gentlemen ran that company and had done for a number of years. It was a small company performing a useful service. It went through a period of change as the product line and service changed in response to the market. The two gentlemen seized the initiative and invested as much as they could. However, eventually they could not accommodate the demand for their products and service. They needed to invest more, but that was beyond their resources. Just at the right time, regional aid became available. They made an application and their company is one of the first half-dozen to have an application approved.

I rang the firm this morning and I could hear the operators installing the plant ready for commissioning on Monday morning. That firm is about to double its capacity. The initiative was taken and a partnership formed with the Department of Trade and Industry. Without that aid, only a modest amount could have been invested in that firm. The top-up grant allows something better to be purchased.

Mr. Bruce George (Walsall, South): I suggest that the hon. Gentleman rings Rubery Owen, GKN, F. H. Lloyd, or Charles Richards in Darlaston, because their phones will be silent. Their factories are no longer there. The hon. Gentleman should paint a more complete and true picture.

Mr. King: That makes my point. I used to deal with Rubery Owen years ago. I used to walk through the aircraft hangars and see the archaic machinery. That company was bamboozled by foreign imports because it did not modernise fast enough. That is a life and death example of what has gone wrong in the west midlands.

Management and union have been complacent. The tragedy is that successive generations of youngsters who would have got a job at Rubery Owen or somewhere similar are denied that opportunity because of the mistakes of their fathers and grandfathers in terms of union-management relationships.

The small firm to which I referred will now take on 15 more workers. In Walsall that is a small step forward. The first new employee starts on Monday morning. It is one tiny step for Walsall but certainly one major step forward for industry.

Mr. George Park (Coventry, North-East): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) for giving us the opportunity to discuss the west midlands once again. I had not realised that the Minister would reveal his ambitions to be a Gipsy Petulengro and give us answers before he had heard the questions. I suspect that media coverage has much to do with that.

In previous debates on the west midlands Opposition Members have been accused of talking down the region. We have been accused of that again this morning. All that we have done is to state the facts.

It is a fact that in June 1979 in the Coventry travel-to-work area 15,159 people were unemployed—that is 6·2 per cent. In the same area—I stress that, because the travel-to-work area has been altered—in January 1985, 37,388 people were unemployed—or 15·7 per cent. The figures are not realistic because they have been massaged. Nearly half of the total are long-term unemployed and 5,000 have been out of work for over three years.

Bad as those figures are, in parts of my constituency the unemployment rate is as high as 34 per cent. The granting of intermediate area status is welcome, although a long time in coming. What we may get will be at the expense of other areas.

Coventry and the region have made, and are making, strenuous efforts to pull themselves out of the disastrous position in which Government policies have put them. The west midlands enterprise board, an offshoot of the much-maligned county council, is already the largest source of risk development capital, with £7 million invested in 24 firms ranging from clothing manufacturers to welding robotics companies. Only this month the board joined the merchant bank, Lazard Brothers, to launch a unit trust scheme which could lead to about £10 million being invested in the west midlands.

When I asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what would happen to such initiatives, if and when the county council is abolished, he said that the district council would be able to pick them up. A choice part of his reply was that district councils could increase their rates to fund such initiatives. Apparently somebody had forgotten the rate-capping proposals.

About 14 months ago the West Midlands Industrial Development Association was set up, in co-operation with private industry, local authorities, chambers of commerce and Government agencies, to attract inward investment, and the targets which were then set have been met. The county council and Aston university, as a joint venture, are setting up a technology transfer centre to promote the transfer of high technology in local industry.

The Coventry business centre provides a source of free, independent, expert advice to budding entrepreneurs and the owners and managers of small businesses already in existence. The Warwick university science park provides a base and facilities for individuals and companies to develop new projects, which can then move on to the former site of the Talbot design centre, which has been purchased by Coventry city council.

Those are some initiatives that have been taken to help ourselves, apart from the efforts of individual local authorities through their development committees and chambers of commerce. The list is not exhaustive, and I have not mentioned the national exhibition centre or Birmingham airport, both of which generate jobs and industry.

Much of the effort is long-term and although the Government set great store by the creation of new small businesses, it would take many small businesses to put back into work the 22,000 who have lost their jobs in Coventry since the Conservatives came to office, leaving aside the high rate of bankruptcies. These people cannot be left to rot until the initiatives that I have mentioned come to fruition. Something must be done much sooner than that.

The city council, apart from the huge backlog it has on council housing, desperately wants to tackle the problem of 17,000 substandard private sector dwellings by increasing the annual programme of investment improvement grants from £2·3 million to £5 million. However, we know what happened last Wednesday, when the Government — in the teeth of objections from their supporters and the opposition of local authorities, Labour and Tory — pushed through further restrictions on the spending of capital receipts, with callous disregard for the human consequences in terms of employment and the recovery of the region.

The effects of this further squeeze, to meet some arbitrary cash limit enshrined in the public expenditure White Paper, will be wide-ranging. In education, the Lanchester polytechnic in Coventry needs major investment for equipment if it is to give additional training in high technology. A £1·5 million programme over four years is now threatened. If schools are to be rationalised as pupil numbers fall, additional expenditure will be required on some sites supported by receipts from the disposal of others. Capital restrictions will prevent Coventry from achieving a better and more efficient education service.

I referred to the science park at Warwick university. If it is to continue to develop the whole site, further major investment is needed. The city's power to make progress will be halved by the action taken last Wednesday, and the examples that have been given of threatened projects are not frivolous; those projects are essential to the recovery of the city. Some of them would reduce revenue expenditure in the medium term, which must be desirable, even within the Government's limited terms of reference.

Another disaster has been the housing benefit scheme. In Coventry, the administration of the scheme cost ratepayers £140,000 in 1984-85 and will cost them £260,000 in 1985-86 and £120,000 the year after that. The Government claim that they have saved the cost of 56,000 civil servants. That is a hollow saving, which transfers costs from Whitehall to local authorities and, at the same time, adds to the dole queues.

Besotted with the dogma that all public spending is, by definition, wrong, the Government fail to take account of changing work patterns in Coventry. A recent study by Coventry Workshop, a local resource centre, highlights the dramatic changes that have taken place in the last decade. Ten years ago, two thirds of the people at work in Coventry were employed in manufacturing. Tens of thousands of those jobs have disappeared and, for the first time in 50 years, only a minority are now employed in manufacturing.

Today, two out of every five people depend on central or local government for their jobs. Central and local government directly employ 20 per cent. Other public employers and nationalised industries bring the figure to 30 per cent., and 9,500 jobs in private firms rely on Government spending or investment. The study concludes that 37·4 per cent. of Coventry's work force depends on the state for their jobs.

It follows that, in their relentless campaign against public spending, by cutting grants to local authorities, rate capping, reducing the amount of capital expenditure, transferring costs to local authorities and needlessly increasing the price of gas, electricity and water, the Goverment contribute directly to the ever-increasing totals of the unemployed. As the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) said, it is ironic that in the current issue of the Coventry chamber of commerce newspaper it is stated that "in spite of the high unemployment levels, there are vacancies in industry that cannot be filled because there are not the people available with the skills required."

At the same time, the Government are closing skillcentres and imposing a moratorium on funds for high technology. The two just do not go together.

The Minister may refer to the new training initiative. I will only say of that that the scale of the need is far greater than the response so far. If the Government were serious in their wish to lift the region out of its current slough, they would stop relying on simplistic slogans about competition, as though that were the total solution. It has a part to play, but the Government could take some of the initiatives that are open to them.

The Department of the Environment could increase the funding for derelict land grants to enable more development to take place. Coventry was turned down flat when it wanted to develop an old gasworks site. The Department looked at the city as a whole and said that, overall, there was not much derelict land in the area where the city wished to develop that new industrial site.

Section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972 could be amended. That is the tuppeny rate provision, which is used by many local authorities to fund their economic development schemes. The value of that tuppeny rate is fixed in relation to 1973 rateable values, with no allowance for inflation, so that the real expenditure that is possible is falling.

The Department could ease the conditions attached to grants under the urban programme. At present, these grants are not available to new and large firms. That reduces the scope of the scheme and its usefulness. The Department could restore the cuts on housing, as my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North pointed out.

The Department of Education and Science could exert pressure on the Department of the Environment to ease restrictions on capital expenditure although I do not suppose that it will do so. This would permit training schemes to adapt and expand to meet industry's needs and to rationalise the schools' structure. The Department of Transport could support a new route from west midlands to the east-coast ports, which would help trade. It could support the planning stage for the completion of the north-south road at Coventry, which would relieve congestion and open up new industrial sites in my constituency.

Next week the Chancellor of the Exchequer could take action on the disparity between export-import tariffs on cars to and from Spain. The issue has been raised on many occasions and the right hon. Gentleman is well aware of it. The unique sales tax on motor cars could be removed. Its removal would have a beneficial effect throughout the region. I hope that the Chancellor will not, as has been rumoured, impose VAT on new commercial and industrial building work. Its imposition would bear heavily on the west midlands, where land values and rentals are low.

I have mentioned a few of the actions that could be taken to assist recovery. If there is no response, Ministers' expressions of concern over unemployment, bad housing and lack of adequate training will be seen by the people of the west midlands as the shedding of crocodile tears.

12.12 pm

Mr. J. F. Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): I listened with interest to the speech of the hon. Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Park) and agreed with him on several issues. He was right to draw attention to the need to improve communications between the west midlands and the east coast ports and to hasten the construction of a new stage of the M40. I agreed with his comments about the Coventry business centre and Warwick university's science park. It is interesting to contrast his thoughtful speech with those of his hon. Friends, which have been laden with gloom, doom and despondency. They have suggested that we live in a time when there is no hope, and that is far from the reality.

I was intrigued by the remarks of the hon. Members for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) and for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. Edwards) about investment abroad. Surely they recognise that from investments abroad will come profits which will be reinvested in our economy. These profits will produce jobs within the region. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King), drew attention to the results achieved by exporting capital abroad and by encouraging overseas countries to manufacture, which will enable them to strengthen their own economies. Surely it is better to provide them with the means to establish industry and to acquire skills rather than letting them remain dependent on food handouts.

I shall address myself principally to the economy of the west midlands and to employment. Unemployment is a major problem and is not confined to the United Kingdom or the west midlands. It extends thoughout the western world. All western nations have increased levels of unemployment, but the major difference between the United Kingdom and other western countries is that we are creating jobs faster than our European competitors.

We are increasing the number of jobs by about 1 per cent., whereas the increase in Germany and Italy is 0·4 per cent. In France there has been a 2·9 per cent. decrease in the number of jobs and in Spain a decrease of about 3 per cent. In the EEC as a whole, the number of jobs is declining by 0·6 per cent. That contrasts with the Government's measures, which are starting to work, albeit from a fairly low base.

Despite Labour Members' speeches, the news is not all bad, and I draw attention to the good news in the west midlands. Unemployment is a major problem, but it did not start in 1979. That issue was taken up by my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale (Mr. Trippier), the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. He was right to remind us that unemployment doubled under the Labour regime. The reasons are well known: a recession that affected western Europe, poor and complacent management, trade union intransigence and Government interference. We were overpaying ourselves and we experienced the new industrial revolution with its microchip and robotics.

Things are beginning to change and I am not as pessimistic as Labour Members. I have confidence in the inherent ability of midlanders. The qualities which forged the first industrial revoultion still exist for the beginning of the new industrial revolution.

Mrs. Currie: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pawsey: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that note of assent. It would be easy for companies and industries to follow Labour Members and collapse in a welter of gloom. The position is not as bad as they have sought to paint it. The majority of companies and industries in the west midlands have risen to the challenge that faces them. They are facing the problems that confront them. They have diversified, increased productivity and developed new markets.

My constituency has one of the heaviest of industries in the region in the form of the turbine division of GEC. That division has not enjoyed a home order of any size for years but its future and prosperity have been based on winning orders from abroad. The order from Hong Kong was the largest single order ever, worth £600 million. The division wins orders because it is competitive and efficient. It has a skilled work force that is allied to good management, and that management has invested consistently in new machines, new equipment and new methods.

The turbine division of GEC is not unique. As my hon. Friend the Member for Northfield said, Jaguar has not done too badly. It has been helped by a favourable exchange rate and good models. It has a skilled work force with confidence in its management. British Leyland also seems to have turned the corner. It has better products, higher productivity and improved quality.

Later in the year, a new Talbot motor car will be made at the Ryton factory in my constituency. Improved productivity and better quality should ensure sales of the new model. However, Talbot has a problem; it is dependent on the supply of completely knocked-down models to Iran. Unfortunately, Iran does not always pay as promptly as it should, and from time to time serious cash flow problems are created for the company. It has received some assistance from the Department of Trade and Industry, but I shall be grateful if my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will consider the matter again and advise what more might be done to assist Talbot.

An excellent booklet has been produced by the Manpower Services Commission. It is entitled "Labour Market Trends, Midlands Region 1985-1987". The heading "Labour Demand" appears on page 58. The first paragraph states:

"As expected, vacancies"

in the west midlands

"notified to Jobcentres in the nine months to December 1984 which totalled 117,392 have shown a 10 per cent. increase compared with the same period in 1983. This follows a 23·5 per cent. increase over the previous year."

There is more good news to be culled from the same work. The final paragraph on page 61 reads:

"One aspect of the labour market which did show a substantial improvement in 1984 was redundancies, with a reduction of 31 per cent. compared with 1983. Notifications so far received indicate a further reduction in 1985, although probably only a marginal one."

[Interruption.] I am pleased that the hon. Member for Coventry, North-West (Mr. Robinson) can read as well as I can. Perhaps he will acknowledge the good news from this admirable work. There is good evidence of a recovery.

I should like to suggest further measures that will assist our region. Improved communications could be significantly assisted by speeding up the development of the M40 and the A1-M1 link. The M1 is clogged, dogged and bogged with traffic, repairs and problems. A new second route from our region to London and the south is urgently needed. The M40 is overdue. I ask my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State to turn his attention to this need and to say something encouraging and positive about it. The A1-M1 link would provide a fast route to the east coast ports for exports from our region. Those motorways would provide jobs during their construction and, more importantly, would help to make our region more competitive.

The motor industry still contributes more to Britain's economy than any other industry. It accounts for about 1,500,000 jobs in total. The industry would be enormously helped by the removal of the 10 per cent. special car tax, which, effectively, is a tax on jobs. We have heard about one tax on jobs which Government have removed, and I believe it would be helpful if we removed this tax on jobs. If we did so, additional car sales of about 250,000 would be generated.

I suggest that we bring back the small engineering firms investment scheme. That would help engineering companies in the west midlands generally by improving their productivity, by allowing them to retool and by instituting new manufacturing methods to compete on a fair footing with other nations. It would also assist the machine tool industry. There is clearly a case for reintroducing that admirable scheme.

There is still far too much Government interference. Too often, new and old companies run the bureaucratic gauntlet of planning permissions, health and safety at work and job protection legislation with all the form filling that goes with running a 20th-century business. In the United States, firms employing 20 or fewer people are responsible for providing the majority of new jobs. I believe that we should do more to encourage small companies by cutting through some of the bureaucratic red tape that has built up.

I believe that, if the Victorians had had to work with the same jumble of red tape as our industries do, there would not have been the first industrial revolution. Stephenson would never have been an engineer — he would have been either a civil servant or an accountant. Although my right hon. Friends have done much to cut out red tape and to get rid of bureaucracy, more still needs to be done.

I do not doubt that all legislation is introduced for the best of reasons, but it does not always work as intended. One of my theories is summed up as "Pawsey's law of government"—nothing is so bad that it cannot be made worse by well-intentioned Ministers. We should be cutting, not creating, red tape.

Local government can help industry by creating a favourable climate in which companies can start and older companies can develop. I should like to refer to examples in my constituency. Rugby borough council has produced a range of starter units. These small units of about 500 sq ft are let without the benefit of extensive leases, red tape or bureaucracy. They are let on monthly tenancies at £25 a week. It is as easy and as simple as that. In short, those starter units are serving the purpose of the old garages, where so often new companies started. That is an effective and helpful way for local government to create new business.

Warwickshire county council has not sat on its hands either. With Rugby borough council, it has built new factories on reclaimed land and green field sites. Warwickshire county council has actively, aggressively and successfully marketed Warwickshire as a good place for new business.

I believe that the excellent booklet to which I have referred should be required reading for all Opposition Members. Referring to Warwickshire county council, page 130 states:

"County Council initiatives in providing land for high technology industries to help compensate for the decline of most traditional manufacturing appear to have been successful."

The county council has been successful in promoting not only high technology and new science-based industries but printing and distribution companies, bottling plants and engineering firms. All those businesses have found homes in Warwickshire. No wonder the MSC can say:

"The decline in manufacturing industry with its large-scale redundancies appears to have bottomed out in Warwickshire."

I should have liked to hear more of that note of hope from the Opposition.

Mr. Corbett: It is not true.

Mr. Pawsey: It is perfectly true. The Opposition have said today that they have cited official statistics which cannot be wrong. I point out that similar official information is in this booklet.

I have referred to my county of Warwickshire. I appreciate the fact that Warwickshire has done better, for various reasons, than certain other counties. The science park in Warwick, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Coventry, North-East, is proving to be a magnet to industry, so that little, if any, leftable space now remains. Its success is such that it has been drawing new companies into its orbit — companies anxious to participate in the new thinking and technologies developing at Warwick university.

Mr. Park: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the science park is on a 24-acre site? Ten acres have been developed. As the hon. Gentleman said, the park is practically full. I believe that there is only one vacant space left. We need additional investment to develop the remainder of the science park, because there is clearly a demand for this facility.

Mr. Pawsey: Not for the first time today, I agree with the hon. Gentleman. I am sure that, when my hon. Friend replies, he will refer to the excellent science park at Warwick. It is good news for the region. It helps to motivate and generally drive forward new thinking and new technologies.

Despite the good news, much remains to be done, not least in establishing the relationship between labour costs and jobs. That point was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Northfield. In the United States, real earnings have fallen and employment has risen. That is in marked contrast to the United Kingdom, where real earnings increased by 7 per cent. while in the same period employment fell by 3 per cent. That is not entirely a coincidence.

A further point that must be noted by employers, unions and Government is the clear relationship between rates of pay and the number of people employed in industry. If the implications of the American experience are understood, that will go a considerable way to ensuring that the current difficulties in the region and elsewhere will be overcome.

I should like to pursue that point a stage further as it relates to young people. In West Germany, 92 per cent. of school leavers go into work or further training. Apprentice pay is 20 per cent. of the adult rate. In Britain, an apprentice receives 60 per cent. of the adult rate. We then wonder why we have fewer apprentices than our competitors.

[Mr. Pawsey]

I am not the only one to have seen the MSC booklet. On Tuesday 12 March, one of our excellent regional newspapers the Coventry Evening Telegraph referred to the "Spotlight on signs of recovery."

Mr. Nellist: Oh, God.

Mr. Pawsey: It is no good the hon. Gentleman saying, "Oh, God." He reads the Coventry Evening Telegraph, as I do. I see his letters in it from time to time. That newspaper said:

"Spotlight on signs of recovery. Although cautious in its predictions, the report 'Labour market trends, Midlands Region 1985-1987', claims prospects are brighter than for the past five years. And it maintains the region's economy has entered a period of stability—which could lead to a small reduction in unemployment next year."

Hear that.

I sometimes wonder whether Opposition Members live in the same world. That is an impartial newspaper quoting the facts as it sees them.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): The hon. Gentleman need not depend upon the Coventry Evening Telegraph for such optimistic reports. He could have produced the Sunday Express, another impartial organ, edited by Sir John Junor. For the past five years it has been trying to talk up the economy, with no great success. The hon. Gentleman could produce a great deal of evidence, but none of it is impartial.

Mr. Pawsey: The hon. Gentleman might reflect that it is better to try to talk up the economy than to talk it down, as we have heard from the Opposition throughout this morning's debate. Why not a note of optimism for a change?

The message that I should like to leave with the House is not gloom and despondency but hope and renewal. The west midlands has the will, the skills the initiative and the drive. It has produced and delivered the goods in the past and it will produce and deliver them in the future. The west midlands is not on the way out. It is on the way up.

Mrs. Renée Short (Wolverhampton, North-East): I agree with the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) that we must not talk down the west midlands, but I am afraid that I do not share his optimism about the progress that is being made at present. The Minister's speech was depressing. It was a turgid reading of a turgid Civil Service brief. It added nothing and it contained no hope.

The House will remember the defence of the scandalous position that has developed in part of the west midlands rag trade by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen), who is no longer with us. The unions, particularly the Transport and General Workers Union, have launched a campaign against those sweat shops, where women are employed at just above social security rates of pay and where they work with unprotected, inadequate and old-fashioned machines, very often with small children playing around the floor. It is a disgrace that any Member of the House should defend that situation.

The Prime Minister is always telling us that we must emulate the United States; we must imitate everything that the United States does. While the pound crumbles and while our industrial areas such as the west midlands crumble and decline, becoming more unattractive to industry and residents alike, although such areas are crying out for real investment in resources to improve the quality of life and employment prospects, the Prime Minister toddles along behind the American President, supporting him in his infamous star wars project while maintaining a deaf ear to those of us who have been urging action to halt the decline of British science. I am glad that the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth, as well as my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Park), referred to the developments at Warwick. I shall enlarge on that in a moment.

The development and prosperity of the west midlands lie in the future development of industries based on science and engineering. We did not have a word about that from the Minister. Engineering of different sorts has been the basis of our prosperity in the west midlands. The progress that we have experienced, as everybody knows, was based on engineering. The famous names of the past, the pioneers of engineering and technical progress, made so many of our firms famous the world over. Sadly, many of those firms have now disappeared from the west midlands. Now we are losing some of our best university research students to America, where they are working in the forefront of science. America is getting the benefit of the work that they do—and those students were originally trained by us.

In 1965 the United Kingdom spent more on research than France and Germany, and twice as much as Japan. By 1980 we were spending less than France and three times less than West Germany and Japan. From 1965 to 1980 Japanese research grew by 17 per cent. per annum, West Germany's research grew by 14 per cent. per annum and that of the United Kingdom grew by only 3 per cent. There lies the miserable story of our decline.

In the United States basic research funding has grown by 40 per cent. during the Reagan Administration alone while here it has declined during the same period. Therefore, we are now seeing a prolonged period of massive decline in British research expenditure relative to the rest of the developed world. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary must take that on board. In spite of what the Prime Minister keeps telling us, we are becoming poorer relative to other developed countries.

In the west midlands we are continually being exhorted to place our hope in new technology, the generic term used carelessly and most of the time without real understanding of what it means in terms of investment, training, new building and marketing. One has to have all that to support, develop and market new technology. It can develop only as a result of research. It does not just materialise out of thin air. Therefore, less research spending undoubtedly means fewer new technology industries and a high level of unemployment, as we now have in the west midlands. The disaster that faces us if the present decline in research continues is very frightening.

If Japan's rate of increase of research expenditure continues at 17 per cent. per annum, as it has over the past 15 years, by 1990 her research expenditure will be 16 times ours. The situation is even worse than the figures imply, since 50 per cent. of United Kindom Government research is on—guess what?—defence. That is, of course, a far higher proportion than Japan spends on defence. The University Grants Committee has had its resources cut by this Government by about 15 per cent., and the Social Services Select Committee has reported to the House on the serious aspects of that policy in connection with medical education. That also affects our standing and our policies for research and employment in that area.

So if we are to have any chance of reducing unemployment in the west midlands, more resources must be directed into science and engineering research. How much money will be directed into that? We are in a grievous position, because of the Government's refusal to understand these problems—although, goodness knows, Opposition Members have told them about them time and again. We have pressed the matter with the Secretary of State for Education and Science and with Ministers in the Department of Trade and Industry, yet we receive no response.

Our steel industry will continue to decline, beaten by low-cost producers abroad, and unless we produce newer, better, more sophisticated steels, car bodies for the remnants of our car industry will be made of plastics and car engines will be made from ceramics. Thus, without very strong research in plastics and ceramics, there will be no car industry in the west midlands.

Perhaps even more importantly, semiconductor materials such as silicon and new ones besides will be used to develop new robotics to build computers, cars and anything else that one can think of. Yet last year the Science and Engineering Research Council spent £50 million on nuclear physics research, £40 million on astronomy but less than £4 million on materials research. Only 1·7 per cent. of SERC's expenditure was on that. That miserable level of support for scientific research as a whole has meant the loss of many brilliant researchers, scientists and engineers, who have for the most part gone to the United States and are working for Reagan's benefit, not ours. That is absolutely crazy.

Only yesterday I received a letter from the Post Office Engineering Union in Wolverhampton, which covers the whole of the black country. It reminded me that British Telecom, along with the British telecommunication equipment manufacturers, had recently researched and developed the digitial exchange now known as System X. It is very good, and has been hailed throughout the world as one of the most technically advanced systems and as the foremost on its field. It has been welcomed as a technical success and for the benefit that it will bring to the British telecommunications industry and its export potential. Thus we are talking about a marvellous new technology development that we could export.

BT has recently announced its intention to invite tenders for an alternative digitial exchange system known as System Y. Guess who BT has invited tenders from? They have been invited from three sources—all of them foreign. They have been invited from Ericsson of Sweden, Philips of the Netherlands and Northern Telecom of Canada. If the Minister knows about that, he will no doubt say that they all have British subsidiaries here. But the important point is that the investment in research, and, even more importantly, in technological developments, will remain in Sweden, the Netherlands and Canada. That is absolutely scandalous.

Of course that union campaigned against the privatisation of BT and against the importation of the communications equipment of foreign competitors. During its campaign against privatisation it pointed out that we faced the danger that foreign equipment would be imported into Britain. There can be no guarantee of work in the United Kingdom if such equipment is imported. The export potential from the continuing research and development of System X and advanced digital systems is dependent on a secure home market. That secure home market will disappear if important equipment is imported. It is scandalous to do such crazy, idiotic things when we have a lead in the new technology.

We spend substantially less then the United States, Japan, West Germany or France on research in higher education, industrial science and engineering. Our expenditure as a proportion of GDP is little more than half the average for those countries. That is the measure of our inability to compete.

The Advisory Board for the Research Councils has said, in its report on the science budget published last year, that it is vital that Britain's research infrastructure should be maintained in as strong a state as possible but that such research has been hit by Government cuts in the past few years and since 1980 a growing proportion of top grade proposals has gone unfunded. The loss of morale and the interruption of important research work has had a serious effect throughout the scientific sector.

In 23 important areas of science we publish well below 7 per cent. of world publications. It is extremely disturbing that with the exception of engineering, physics, agriculture and food science and oceanography we fall below other countries in other areas of research such as pharmacy, cardiovascular research, paediatrics, surgery and acoustics. Clearly, that has implications for science-based universities such as Aston and for the Birmingham medical research centre.

Last Friday, I had the opportunity to see some of the pioneering work on cancer research at the university medical research centre in Birmingham, and I spent some time with the staff responsible for the animal research laboratories. There is no doubt at all that the work is hindered due to inadequate resources. Some of our leading scientists in cancer research work at that centre, but every penny has to be counted and their work is hampered by the constant battle for money.

Other Opposition Members have referred to Government support for the construction industry. We have had many representations, not just from the building trade unions but from the building employers' Group of Eight. The Government's neglect of that industry is astounding. As many of my hon. Friends have said, throughout the west midlands there are vast areas of old and substandard housing. Some housing in Wolverhampton was built under the earliest public housing legislation and is long overdue for replacement. The building industry constantly pleads for a more discriminating approach to public spending by the Government and for more investment in construction work to rebuild an infrastructure and thus to provide jobs. Every £1 billion spent on construction provides 100,000 jobs. It is the quickest way to inject life into our declining economy, so why do the Government not do it? Perhaps the Minister will tell us today.

Thousands of people in Wolverhampton live in poor housing. Only last Saturday, representatives of the Wolverhampton Tenants Federation came to my surgery and presented a manifesto to me and my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. Edwards). I have sent a copy to the Secretary of State for the Environment and I shall be interested to have his comments. Tenants want to be consulted about repairs.

[Mrs. Renée Short]

They want more attention to be given to firms seeking modernisation contracts. They want no fly-by-night operators. Contracts should be given to modern firms with up-to-date equipment and a competent work force. The federation also supports the formation of housing co-operatives so that tenants can manage their own estates, control repairs and maintenance and thus reduce vandalism.

Those are all constructive, sensible ideas in line with Labour party housing policy. The National Home Improvement Council says that Britain is miserably housed, and that is certainly true in the west midlands. It also points out that public expenditure on housing today is worth only 35p in every pound compared with 1979. It states that housing has suffered the biggest cuts in spending and that there will be a shortage of half a million homes by 1986. We spend only 2·1 per cent. of GDP on residential construction. That is about a third of Germany's expenditure of 6·6 per cent. or France's 6·1 per cent. If the Government are serious about reducing unemployment and at the same time improving the quality of life for many thousands of people throughout the west midlands, there is a comparatively simple and painless way to do so.

I hope that the Minister will tell us what the Government intend to do to help families who are living in rotten, substandard housing and to improve the quality of life of so many families throughout the west midlands. Something can be done, but resources will be needed. However, the Minister can console himself by the thought that if he invests those resources, he will reduce considerably the number of those who are claiming unemployment and supplementary benefit, and will provide jobs at decent rates of pay, which is what the west midlands wants.

Mr. Lewis Stevens (Nuneaton): I have listened carefully to what the Opposition have said, in particular to the idea that 1979 was the magic date after which everything went wrong in the west midlands. It may be that everything started to go wrong for the Labour party in 1979, but that is not true of the west midlands.

I spent the first 20 years of my life in the heart of the black country. Since then, I have lived in various parts of the west midlands and worked in its industries. I remember the days when a great smoke haze hung over West Bromwich and Smethwick and never disappeared except on bank holidays. I also remember the industrial conditions of those days. Thinking of the steel industry, I remember the heat rising on the cold winter mornings and the smell of Woodbines being stamped out on the earth floor.

In those days, it was common for industry to use machinery and equipment that dated back in some cases to the 19th century. Tremendous changes were taking place in technology, but many industries in the west midlands failed to change their productive methods and their attitudes.

The west midlands possesses skills in a wide range of technologies, as well as the steel industry and plastics. People's skills are perhaps more flexible than in any other region. People can add to their skills with comparative ease, and comparatively little retraining is required. However, throughout the 1950s and 1960s, the writing was on the wall for many west midlands industries. If they did not change, and change quickly, they would suffer when they had to face the pressures of competition and the market. They have suffered.

There were many reasons why things went wrong in the west midlands, as in some other parts of the country. One cannot blame everything on the policies or the strategies of the present Government. We in the west midlands got it wrong. We failed to plan for the future, and we have suffered for it. That is nowhere more true than in the car industry. In 1971-72, the United Kingdom produced 1,750,000 cars a year. We are now producing only about 1 million, yet the uptake of cars in this country is at record levels. We were not in a position to take our opportunity.

It has been said that it would be easy to put things right. It would not be easy. However, perhaps coincidentally, a development is under way that started at about the same time as the recession. It may be that the recession shook parts of industry into considering what they were doing. It was not until the mid-1970s that managements in many industries in the midlands and elsewhere began to realise that the people who worked in the industry as a whole were themselves the company and that participation was necessary among the whole work force. Some members of the trade union movement were equally obstinate and would not look at it as a joint venture. In the end, everyone relies on the results of progression, improvement and money.

The west midlands is now trying to change, but it is a slow process. Work is being carried out at Warwick, Aston and Birmingham universities, which shows the co-operation of the academic environment with industry and the community. Things are beginning to come together. Advanced manufacturing technology research is now taking place. This year at Warwick an advanced technology centre is being set up in conjunction with Austin Rover. Previously, that was a fundamental weakness in our industries. The concept of invention has always been good, but the concept of development and production has always been bad. Now, at least, Warwick university is studying advanced manufacturing technology. It may be too large a project for an individual company to develop, so the university input is needed to look at requirements for the future.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) and other hon. Members mentioned communications. I agree that they are vital to the west midlands. I understand that the Railway Development Society wants to reopen some of the rail network to improve communications. That deserves consideration, if not total support. I accept that there may be some snags, but it might be another way to help the communications network.

I do not minimise the effect of unemployment. My constituency suffers from unemployment as part of the Coventry travel-to-work area. Indeed, I believe that we have suffered more than other areas because this is the second time that local industry has been badly affected. Traditionally, my area relied on the railway and mining industries, but there are no longer any pits in my constituency. I remember coming to see a Minister at the then Board of Trade in the late 1960s to complain about the closure of the last pit.

However, the area recovered because the car industry was fairly buoyant. The town expanded in the late 1960s and early 1970s because of the motor industry and allied trades. Yet we are now suffering unemployment again. One Opposition Member made a telling point in a debate recently. He said that no matter what the figures were, if a person wants work but is out of work, that is 100 per cent. unemployment for that person. I accept the tragedy of that statement.

My hon. Friend the Minister quite rightly said how much the Government are doing. It is wrong to ignore the effect of the intermediate area status, which will help the area. Many business people ask not for aid but only to be free of the negative effects of other people having aid. They want to compete on an equal basis. Now, at least, they will be able to do that, and that is terribly important.

Training initiatives have been brushed aside by Opposition Members. The Coventry section of "Labour Market Trends" gives a substantial list of skills in short supply. The training initiatives enable us to consider what trades are in shortage. The schemes are flexible and can help fulfil the needs.

The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) mentioned engineering and science research. There is a tremendous shortage of such graduates, but the same was true 30 years ago. It seems that successive Governments have pretended that the shortage does not exist and that industry does not care because there has been little pressure on universities to increase their number of science and engineering graduates. Indeed, many such graduates do not go into engineering. I do not know where they disappear to. Engineering should be given a high profile in education and financing. It is important that the west midlands has sufficient skilled graduates.

Warwick university has taken an initiative on an MSc integrated graduate development scheme, which has evolved with companies such as Serc, British Leyland, Lucas, Rolls-Royce and now British Aerospace, Short Brothers and Dunlop. Such involvement is a tremendous help.

I am not a protectionist, as protection will not cure the ills of the midlands, but the Government should be considerate towards companies that have spent money on development projects when they place orders. The Government also have much influence over orders—the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East mentioned system X. The Government no longer have complete control over that, because British Telecom is now private. The House frequently debates where defence contracts should go. In our recent debate on the Royal Air Force, the Ministry of Defence was lobbied about basic trainers. The Government have much influence on where contracts are placed. Technical industries in the west midlands should be considered carefully and at least given some preference.

Local authorities also have a part to play with planning permission. Many parts of the black country are not pleasant. Some areas are derelict and have become available for development. The West Midlands county council and other councils should be lenient with planning permissions to enable industry to expand. The same is true for housing. Big chunks of land no longer become available for housing development—it comes in bits. Developers and councils must co-operate closely and consider how sacrosanct the fringes of conurbations near green belts should be. If we want the area to develop industrially and domestically, we must examine the procedure carefully.

The general concept that the economy of the west midlands will improve dramatically as production increases has long gone. Most people accept readily that the output of the new technologies does not automatically mean jobs. It may mean wealth, but it does not mean new jobs. We cannot create more jobs unless production is increased. The midlands industries must concentrate on productivity, because automatically, if productivity increases in an industry that has reasonable labour relations, more and better-paid jobs will follow.

There is still an enormous need to modernise the industries in the area, and firms must look for new ways of meeting competition. I applaud the enterprise allowance scheme, which allows the development of products that are in demand. That is what competition is about. We import so much that we must now examine carefully how our companies can compete with overseas companies. They can do it.

I am certain that the people of the black country and the west midlands are prepared to fight. They do not fight at football matches; at least when I have watched West Bromwich Albion there has not been a major punch-up. The tradition of the black country and much of the midlands is one of people working hard and earning good money, and they are prepared to do so again. They ate well and lived well. They had high standards of family life, and in the old days much of their money went on their families. The same character and determination are there. Given the opportunity, the black country and the west midlands could come out of the recession, but they need Government help in providing training, new technology and better communications. Much help is already being given, but the Government must continually develop and speed up that aid.

The west midlands was the industrial heart of England. Unless that industrial heart beats strongly again, the wealth of Britain will not increase. Without that heart beating strongly, Britain will not move forward as it should.

1.7 pm

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): About three hours ago we heard a speech from the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which, had it not been about a matter so serious for hundreds of thousands of people in our area, would have been laughable. It was a cosmetic approach to the problems of the hundreds of thousands who are unemployed in the west midlands and of the many more people whose families must subsist at poverty levels.

Conservative Members have made many points during the debate but, given the time available, I cannot deal with all of them. I should tell the hon. Members for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) and for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) that I, too, have a copy of the MSC report entitled "Labour Market Trends". If one examines the latter months of the nine-month period covered in the report, especially November, December and the first part of this year, one discovers that instead of vacancies in the west midlands increasing, they have started to decrease again sharply. It is wrong to try to paint so rosy a picture. Even if we took the report at face value, the present position is like the calm before the storm, or the last flush coming to a dying man's cheeks. All the serious examinations of the west midlands economy offer no hope to the hundreds of thousands who are out of work.

The hon. Member for Northfield talked about Jaguar and the trade unions' refusal to accept the cheap labour educational dustbin of YTS. I supported their opposition. They tried to do what Massey Ferguson workers did in Coventry—to get management to pay young workers a decent training rate. At Massey Ferguson, YTS trainees receive £74 a week and jobs are guaranteed for them at the end of the scheme.

In the same breath that the hon. Member for Northfield condemned the unions, he told us how much profit Jaguar had made and how successful the last year or two had been. Its profits run into tens, if not hundreds, of millions of pounds. That money could have been used to provide decent training allowances for youngsters. That company spent £50,000 on a toy Jaguar car for Prince William's second birthday. That money could have been used to double the training allowance for 50 kids on YTS. The fact that those kids do not earn reasonable money has nothing to do with the unions but with management decisions.

I shall paint a different picture of what has happened to the British capitalist economy in recent years. I do not choose Left-wing or Socialist sources. When attacking the Government, the best source is their newspapers. A copy of The Times in November carried the following words beneath the appropriate pictures:

"After the war Great Britain was the third largest steel producer. Now we are 10th.

In 1900 Great Britain made 60 per cent. of the world's shipping. Today we make 3 per cent.

Britain once exported motor bikes to over 100 countries. Now we import almost every machine we buy.

After the war almost every car on the road was British. Now over half are foreign.

Britain pioneered the world machine tool industry. Now our share is 3·1 per cent.

Britain discovered the wireless. We now import 96 per cent. of all personal and portable radios.

Britain made the first practical computer. Now we have 5 per cent. of the information technology market.

We once made all the textile machinery in the world. We now make 8 per cent."

That is an incredible advertisement. Since the Spanish empire collapsed 300 or 400 hundred years ago, no economy in history has declined faster than Britain's in the last 30 years.

Britain used to be known as the workshop of the world. The west midlands might have been called the fitting shop. Britain is now the warehouse of the world. Companies have had the opportunity to reinvest and improve productivity by investing in new machinery, but they have refused to do so. They have lost not only world markets but some major home markets.

Tories say that we should look to small firms for a solution. British Leyland at Canley axed 8,000 jobs about four years ago. The Tories talk about portakabins or garages to start people off in business. We would need thousands of such units to replace the factories that have closed in the last three or four years. In Coventry, 60,000 jobs in manufacturing industry have been lost in the last 10 years. That is a haemorrhaging of jobs in Coventry which is reflected in the region as a whole.

To stress so much the importance of small firms is nothing short of ridiculous. It is a joke. The quickest way to establish a small firm under this Government is to start with a large firm. That is how many small firms have been created in the last six years. Tory Members do not seem to understand. They lecture us on economics and say that we do not have enough degrees to allow us to understand these issues. They do not understand that small firms are shock absorbers in a capitalist system.

If the economy is expanding, small firms will be set up to do the outwork for the bigger firms. As soon as the hint of recession comes, big firms cut their costs by bringing that work back inside and the small firms go down the drain. I predict that towards the end of this year that pattern will emerge again in Coventry and the rest of the west midlands.

Some hon. Members have said that the British economy is moving wonderfully. For the first time since Queen Elizabeth I, Britain is importing more factory-made goods than it exports—yet still Ministers paint a rosy picture of industry.

In April 1983, we were blessed with the appointment of the hon. Member for Coventry, South-West (Mr. Butcher) as the magic shadow to look after the west midlands. Since the day of his appointment as Under-Secretary of State, a job has been lost every 30 minutes in the west midlands under his so-called stewardship of decisions.

Figures illustrating the picture have been given by other hon. Members. Reference has been made to the 16·5 per cent. unemployment rate in the region as a whole, with 250,000 people unemployed. But those statistics do not take into account the kids on YTS, the unemployed men over 60 and the tens of thousands of unemployed women workers. In reality, almost 500,000 people in the west midlands region are now unemployed.

About 40 per cent. of the unemployed in Britain have been on the dole for over a year. In the west midlands, the figure is over 50 per cent. The Coventry unemployment rate, as my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Park), pointed out, is extremely high. In Hillfields, in the city centre of Coventry, the rate is 32 per cent.

In my area, 54 per cent. of people under the age of 19 have been out of work for over a year, and 61 per cent. of the over-45s have been unemployed for that length of time. That begins to give credence to the slogan that I recall seeing sprayed on subway walls in Coventry during the 1983 general election campaign: "Vote Tory. Retire at 16." That is how the youth of Coventry see the future under Tory rule.

Older workers are telling me that they are now part of the last in, first out, generation; that every time they get a job it lasts for six months to a year and that they are the first to be sacked.

Much has been said about apprenticeships. The Coventry Evening Telegraph carried a story yesterday saying that 12 trainee jobs announced by Talbot a fortnight ago resulted in applications from 350 youngsters and that 15 applications a day were still coming in. Naturally, most of those youngsters will be disappointed. That is true of other major factories in Coventry. Overall, there are a couple of hundred apprenticeships to be shared among a school-leaving population of 5,000.

In my area, there are people under 25 who have not worked since the present Prime Minister walked into 10 Downing street in May 1979. In other words, statistics supplied by the Department show that there are people in Coventry who have not been employed for six years. The chances of getting a job in the region are reduced by the fact that, whereas in Britain as a whole 21 people are chasing every vacancy, in the west midlands the figure is 31, and in Coventry it is even higher.

I agree with hon. Members who say that the so-called panacea of assisted area status will not fundamentally alter the position for the unemployed. A few hundred jobs may be created—nobody will turn those away, especially somebody like me who spent three years on the dole before coming here; every time one goes to the jobcentre and looks on the board one is hoping to find a job—but it will not provide jobs for the 35,000 people in my travel-to-work area who are unemployed, or the 250,000 throughout the region who are looking for work.

Surveys have been done by various professional organisations to evaluate the problem. An organisation called Cambridge Econometrics Ltd. did a survey for the county council as part of the council's strategic review. It may be the last review to be commissioned by it if the Government have their way and abolish the West Midlands county council.

The survey produced by that Cambridge organisation showed that if the policies which the Conservatives have carried out in the last five years are continued up to 1991—which we on the Labour Benches do not intend to allow to happen—there will be a further 30 per cent. fall in employment in manufacturing, 148,000 more jobs will be lost and there will be a 1 per cent. rise in service employment. The net effect of Government policies in the region in the coming five years will be another 144,000 jobs lost.

The county council has been doing its best—undertaking a finger-in-the-dyke operation—through the west midlands enterprise board, and by that means a few thousand jobs have been saved. We are pleased about that, but the abolition of the county council will, we estimate, kill off more jobs than the enterprise board has managed to save in the last two or three years, allowing for the targets that the Government have set for the abolition of the GLC and the metropolitan counties.

That action is political and has nothing to do with saving ratepayers' money or making services more efficient. That was best expressed by the Secretary of State for the Environment in an ITN interview 18 months ago. Having spoken about wicked Labour-controlled councils—of which the West Midlands county council is one—he was asked by the interviewer:

"But, Secretary of State, if they do not like it, surely the people can vote them out?"

The right hon. Gentleman replied:

"Yes, but that has not been working very well recently."

That is the real reason why the West Midlands county council, the other metropolitan councils and the GLC are to be abolished by the Government. They are Labour-controlled and the Tories wish to get rid of them without challenging the Labour party at the ballot box. We have lost 220,000 manufacturing jobs since the Prime Minister walked into No. 10. We have lost over a third of all manufacturing jobs in the west midlands. It is possible that this has been the most rapid deterioration in industrial employment that any region has suffered.

Statistics cannot describe the human misery of being on the dole. The rate of divorce is higher because of unemployment. Suicide is the second most common cause of death among young pople. There has been an increase in drug addiction, including heroine and other hard drugs. These are the social consequences of youngsters and older workers being presented with the blind alley of unemployment and told that there is no real future for them.

One in three households in the west midlands lives on or below the official poverty line. Among those in work, wage rates are declining rapidly. There are one or two who say that eveything will be all right in future. It was reported in the Coventry Evening Telegraph — that wonderful newspaper that gives workers good news—that Sir Michael Edwardes was promising 3,500 Dunlop workers that their future would be safe following the amalgamation with BTR. He said:

"I shall seek to obtain assurances that there will be no immediate intention to change existing employment arrangements."

This is a bloke who will get a golden handshake of about half a million pounds for being at Dunlop for a few months. He received a golden handshake of about a third of a million pounds when he left ICI. He presided over British Leyland at a time when 85,000 jobs were lost. He is on £3,000 a week at Dunlop and he has the gall to tell Coventry workers that their jobs are safe. As an individual and in carrying out Government policy, he has done more to destroy car workers' jobs in Coventry than anyone else.

Coventry was a showpiece for British capitalism for about 80 or 90 years. It was the fastest growing and richest working class town in Britain. It enjoyed that prosperity until the late 1960s. Wage rates started to decline in September 1971 when the toolroom agreement in the engineering sector was lost. Coventry had some of the best wage rates in the country because 75 per cent. of its workers were trade union members and because shop floor organisation in the major factories was extremely tight.

Industrial employment in the city was dominated by firms such as British Leyland, and especially by multinational companies. We have seen them remove investment from the region and take it abroad. Investment has been taken to countries where wage rates are poorer and where trade unions are largely illegal. Examples are Argentina, Korea, Brazil and South Africa. About £40 billion of investment has gone to those countries over the past six years.

Of course, some companies are making profits hand over fist. One example is GEC, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth. Over the past two years—I have been in this place for slightly less than two years—we have had redundancies within GEC in Coventry, South-East. It has been applying to the Government for the short-time working subsidy but it has £1,500 million—this has been derived from the company's profits—lying in the bank. It refuses to invest that money in the industry in Coventry and in other areas. It has refused to reduce working hours and dramatically to improve wage rates. In other words, it has refused to return the wealth that it has gained from exploiting its workers in the Coventry factory and elsewhere to the very people who created the wealth.

Mr. Pawsey rose——

Mr. Nellist: No, I shall not give way. Others wish to participate in the debate.

The problems in Coventry in the 1980s were developing in the 1970s and they have their roots in the 1960s. In 1966, the profits after tax of the major car companies fell from £65 million in 1965 to £30 million in 1966. However, the same firms distributed £33 million in dividends to the shareholders and declared a net loss of £3 million. That money should have gone into investment. The lack of investment in the car industry in Coventry since Canley was opened in the mid-1960s as the most modern car assembly plant in Europe sealed the fate of the workers. That has had social effects.

My hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, North-East referred to housing in Coventry. According to the Department of the Environment, there are in Coventry 1,000 unfit houses and 6,000 that lack basic amenities, such as an inside toilet or hot and cold running water. Imagine that happening in 1985. About 14,000 houses require repairs costing more than £3,000. About one in five houses in Coventry need some repair work. Last year the council estimated that, given the money then available, it would take 40 years to do that job. Since then, the money has been cut.

Last night and this morning I worked out what the Government have stolen during the last five years from Coventry city council. They have stolen 28 per cent. of the rate support grant, 38 per cent. of the capital allocation and 56 per cent. of the money that we would have had for housing if rates had been maintained at their 1980-81 levels. To put that in the language of bricks and mortar, more than £80 million has been taken from Coventry city council during the past five years alone. There are 8,000 people on the housing waiting and transfer lists. Four years ago, the city council built four council houses. This year and next year the council will not be able to afford to build a single council house, because £80 million has been stolen from the city. We shall demand that that money is returned to our local authority.

It does the Labour movement in Coventry no good when the city council, instead of fighting the Government's financial cuts on local authorities' expenditure—as Liverpool did last year—passes on the cuts in the form of closures of eight schools, as was recently announced. We shall look towards a battle in the year or so ahead to emulate Liverpool's actions in Coventry. We shall fight to get the £80 million stolen by the Tory Government returned to the city.

Mr. Pawsey: Look around.

Mr. Nellist: I stand on my own policies and principles and shall defend them. Not one Liberal Member has attended the debate, and the Conservative attendance has been less than the Labour attendance, despite the fact that there are twice as many Tory Members of Parliament as Labour Members of Parliament. The Opposition do not have to apologise for the remarks that they have made today.

Young people and workers over 45 in Coventry have no future with respect to jobs. When the present Secretary of State for Employment was Secretary of State for the Environment he went to Coventry, including the Wood End area, and was shocked by the state of housing. Every year since then, the Tory Government have repeatedly cut housing money for the city. Solutions to our problems as a city and a region do not lie even with the suggestions put forward by Labour Members during this debate. Those ameliorations will be welcomed, but we cannot have an island of Socialism in a sea of Tory capitalism. To get jobs into Coventry in particular and the west midlands as a whole we need, first, the resignation of the Tory Government and, secondly, a plan for industry, finance and the economy that can guarantee jobs to school leavers, reduce working hours and provide workers with early retirement and longer holidays. If every worker had holidays as long as Members of Parliament, half the dole queue would immediately be wiped away because new workers would be absorbed into the system. Plenty of reforms could be carried out to create jobs.

We shall be asked, "From where will the money come?" I believe that the money can be found in many places. If the Government had not spent £6 billion during the past 12 months trying to break the NUM, they could have built 60 new hospitals, 360 new schools and more than 60,000 new three-bedroomed houses—that would have gone a long way towards alleviating the working conditions of people in the west midlands. Instead, the Government chose to try to break the trade union. That lesson will not be lost on working people in the west midlands. We want the money that has been stolen from us and we need jobs. To achieve that, we need to get rid of the Tory Government.

Mr. John Forrester (Stoke-on-Trent, North): The House is indebted to my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) for initiating this debate because the region has a continuing problem, although we wish that it had not. He pointed out the realistic future as the Opposition see it.

Conservative Members' speeches could be described as being of the "whistling in the dark" variety. If there is pessimism, it is because we have had six years of misery and promises from the Government. The Opposition speeches were in stark contrast to the Minister's optimism. However, we must be fair to him because he said that, despite all the sunshine, it had not been reflected in the unemployment figures. There are 30,000 people in north Staffordshire who would say amen to that. In naval terminology his speech might be described as long on flannel but short on hope.

One applauds the principles of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) and his "buy British" campaign. About 12 years ago a high-powered deputation of leaders of the pottery industry saw a Conservative Minister about the inadequate labelling of inferior foreign imports. During the discussion the Minister asked, "Why don't you set up a factory in south-east Asia?" To the credit of the leaders of the industry, when they had recovered they told him that they wanted to provide jobs for the people of Stoke-on-Trent. That Minister, who was then at the Department of Trade and Industry, is now a member of the Cabinet. I hope that he will be successful in convincing members of the Government that we do not want to export capital and jobs, and that we want them here so that we can all buy British goods.

Those of us who live on the outskirts of the region have had a spin-off from its ailing giant centre in addition to our own problems. In the 1930s, people from north Staffordshire emigrated to Coventry and Birmingham to find work. Their sons, daughters and grandchildren should not come home, because we are in the same boat as they are. There is no sign of a fatted calf on the horizon with which to feed them.

Stoke is smarting from and confused by the Government's continuing refusal to grant us assisted area status. Outside London, Stoke shares with Preston—a much smaller town—the distinction of being the only industrial area which has no Government inner city supported or assisted area status. We feel strongly about that.

Hon. Members will be aware of the 2,400 redundancies at Michelin in Stoke, which take effect in three or four weeks. The recent MSC report — whichever page is quoted to support a point of view—tells us that that one event will increase Stoke's unemployment rate by 1·25 per cent. this year. The report tells us that the knock-on effect will come in 1986. Unless something unforeseen happens in Stoke, we can look forward only to rising unemployment in 1985-86.

We are supported by the north Staffordshire chamber of commerce and trade when we say that the unemployment rate is completely false. After massaging all the figures—I shall not go into how that is done—we believe our unemployment rate is about 18 per cent.

Each area has its own unemployment black spots. I understand that the MSC will publish its figures in wards some time in the future. I hope that the Government will see that that is sooner rather than later because then we shall be able to identify those areas of special need and deprivation. I feel that we may receive some startling and unpleasant statistics.

When the Government came into office they deliberately put up inflation so that they could bring it down again, and no one saw that as sensible. The charge against the Government is that with continuing unemployment and economic decay, they have done nothing. Sometimes they do things that make it worse. We hope, but not with a great deal of justification, that the Chancellor will give us a Budget on Tuesday that will at least increase some employment.

When I was young I thought that a Tory was a person who conserved his assets for the future. But this Government are busy selling off assets and spending money as if there were not going to be any tomorrow. Perhaps there is not for the Government, but who knows?

I think that everyone agrees that those who have been off work the longest will have the greatest difficulty in finding work in future. In Stoke 10,800 people have been off work for more than 52 weeks. In the west midlands the percentage is slightly higher than ours. I think that it is 46 per cent. and ours is 43·5 per cent. or thereabouts. In the United Kingdom it is only just over 39 per cent. Now our chamber of trade and commerce tells us that of those 10,800 people more than 6,000 have been off work for two years or more.

What is the future? We now realise that the traditional skills that people had are being replaced by new machinery and techniques. We know that the newer industries require totally different skills, yet at this critical time the Government are reducing their training programme and training opportunities. All of us have heard firms say to us, "We have jobs for XYZ skills, but we cannot get the people". That is crazy. If we do not make provision for training people for those jobs or other jobs in the future, we shall never be able to take advantage of any economic recovery, if it comes.

The problem of derelict land and underground dereliction in the west midlands affects many areas. If there is underground dereliction, before one develops the land one has to spend a great deal of money on site investigation. Those faults do not appear on National Coal Board records, certainly not on all of them, because many of the activities underground took place long before nationalisation and in the last century. If one has underground limestone workings—there are some in the west midlands—I understand that one can get money for renovating the land, but grant-aid for coal mining areas is specifically excluded. In Stoke it takes an extra £60 per square metre to put up a building because of the need to compensate for the possibility of subsidence. All houses have to be built on a concrete raft approved by the NCB. One new factory has sunk 12 inches in the past 12 months. A constituent of mine is trying to sell a house. He has made inquiries about it at the coal board and discovered that there is a pit shaft underneath his lounge. No one will buy that house from him. Therefore, we are desperate for the Government to take some action on the Waddilove report on subsidence. We ask them to take a realistic look at the problem of underground dereliction, which is so serious for many of our industrial areas.

Most of the large, older conurbations have a decaying urban environment and obsolescent infrastructure, and Stoke is no exception to that. I do not accuse the Government of being solely responsible for the deterioration of 80 or 90-year-old houses or for the collapse of Victorian sewers. We have 99,000 houses in Stoke, a quarter of which were built before 1914, and 15,000 of which are substandard, with one or more of the basic amenities missing. A high proportion of those houses are privately owned by either pensioners or low-income families. That restricts the local authority's ability to carry out comprehensive improvement schemes or maintenance. I heard the Secretary of State for Wales say the other day that authorities will not spend money on building new houses. If the Government give us the money, or allow us to spend our own capital receipts, we shall build the houses in Stoke to provide the accommodation that is urgently needed by elderly and single people. That would provide work for the construction industry, renew our housing stock and overcome some of our social problems.

It is debatable how much violence and vandalism is due to social conditions. Many factors are involved and sometimes there is no reason whatsoever. However, it is much more tempting for vandals to attack that which is dirty, ugly and obsolete rather than that which is clean, attractive and new.

In the long run, it is not in anyone's interest to allow our cities to stagnate and decay. Some Government will have to come along to pick up the pieces and the consequences of today's neglect. The Government bear a heavy responsibility, because the cost then may be exorbitant and quite unacceptable. I, too, acknowledge that the people of the west midlands are the salt of the earth. But do not let them be sacrificed on the altar of the Government's dogma.

1.40 pm

Mr. David Gilroy Bevan (Birmingham, Yardley): I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker, for calling me, and I apologise for the fact that I was unable to be in the Chamber at the beginning of the debate owing to constituency work. I came straight here by train.

But I should point out that until a moment ago, during our whole five-hour debate, with excellent contributions from hon. Members on both sides of the House, not a single member of the Liberal or Social Democratic parties was present. Not one had come to take part in this important debate. I hope that the people of the west midlands will take note of that and bear it in mind when the representatives of those parties go round proclaiming their diligence and support with regard to such important issues.

Together with the hon. Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Park) I was a member of the West Midlands county council for eight years. Unlike the motion, I do not decry its passing, because it regrettably did many counter-productive things during its lifetime. It was abrasive, and did many things to cause warring factions between the district councils in the area. Of course, one regrets that unemployment has been bad, but I am not full of the alarm, gloom and despondency that has been voiced today by Opposition Members about the economic, social and housing conditions to be found in the west midlands. At one stage they could not have been worse, but they are considerably better now.

When I remember that inflation was running at about 26 per cent. under the Labour Government, that the productivity rate was once on the floor, that the policy initiated by a Labour Secretary of State in 1945, which brought about assisted area status, ground exceedingly surely against the west midlands for 40 years until it inevitably brought us down, and when I remember the policies that forbade the west midlands to put one brick on another for many years in terms of denying industrial development certificates and directing them to other areas, I can well understand why the area suffered so much that it found it difficult to retrieve its position. However, it is retrieving it.

Indeed, I thank the Government for introducing legislation on defective housing which will do much to help. I also thank them for backing the proposal to sell council houses to tenants, who undoubtedly want to buy them. But my hon. Friend the Minister should not forget the Smith houses, although the Boots and Waites houses have been dealt with. We want fairness, equity and justice for the Smith houses as well.

I regret the passing from my area of factories such as Lucas. I regret the passing away of the Wilmot Breedons and the grassing over of factory sites. I also regret that in the rationalisation of Land Rover those factories should go, although only to just outside my constituency. Indeed, I am sure that my constituents will still be employed.

At one time, looking round the constituency, there were 22 British Leyland plants. Many have regrettably gone, but let us not forget that we poured a lot of money into BL but lost because of the regrettable actions of the unions there. Because of the unions and sometimes the management and the clapped-out plant, we lost more than the assisted areas gained in terms of subsidy. Indeed, I do not recognise the terms in which the car industry has been spoken about.

The hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) criticised the Government for attacking the miners, but some of us believe that a faction of the NUM was responsible for substantially jeopardising the position of workers in the west midlands by deliberate and progressive attempts to subvert the economy.

The greatest job creator and entrepreneur in the west midlands has been tourism, especially business conferences and business tourism. The hon. Member for Coventry, South-East smiles. Clearly, he is not interested in that, but the national exhibition centre has created 4,000 jobs. As a result, Sheldon ward in my constituency has 11 per cent. unemployment while the other two wards have more than 18 per cent. The exhibition centre, Birmingham International airport and station and the freeport have all played their part. I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will note the great acceleration in that sector of the economy and its implications for employment potential and productivity in the area. I hope that he will note, too, that the spend for a business visitor is twice as much as for a holiday tourist—£56 compared with £23 per day—with an average of £350 a business visit.

I hope, therefore, that my hon. Friend the Minister will do everything possible to encourage Government subsidy for the Birmingham convention centre, which will require about £54 million in addition to its own input and that of the Common Market. Even if the car race in Birmingham has to be temporarily denied, I hope that the Government will ensure that the 80 acres of dereliction are assisted so that 2,000 or more jobs can be created with great economic benefit to the area as a result of support being provided for the convention centre.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): It gives me no pleasure to say that Conservative attempts to paint a rosy picture are monstrous. Between January and February this year unemployment in the west midlands increased by 2,100. The Government are deliberately preventing the creation of jobs in Birmingham and the west midlands. I shall give one brief example.

Birmingham has 42,196 pre-war houses, six out of 10 of which—a total of 25,000—are in urgent need of repair. At the present rate of progress, due to the Government's failure to fork out the money or to allow the city to spend its own money, it will take 622 years to deal with the pre-war housing alone. In addition, there are monstrous problems with the 400 tower blocks—not just relatively minor inconveniences, such as damp and condensation, but water penetration into the blocks which poses serious doubts about their structural safety.

I put it to the Government in all seriousness that if they do not intend to help Birmingham and the west midlands, they should get out of the way and not hinder us.

It was 120 years ago that Joe Chamberlain, a radical Tory lord mayor, used ratepayers' money—there was no rate-capping; he raised the rate deliberately—to buy the gas company, the electricity company and the tram company and to build Corporation street and the Elan valley dam that was to guarantee supplies of fresh water for Birmingham. He and his supporters saw the need for Birmingham to be prepared for the 20th century. A similar job needs to be done now to prepare Birmingham for the 21st century.

The Minister knows very well about the state of housing in Birmingham. Specifically, I should like to ask him about the recent discovery of faults in the 1,400 Boswell houses in my constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker). Will the Minister undertake to consider sympathetically an application for Government aid under the housing defects legislation?

As well as creating jobs and the proud Birmingham of today, Chamberlain and his supporters created the art galleries, the museums, the parks and the open spaces. If the Government do not want to help us, I again urge them to get out of the way and to let us do the job ourselves.

Getting out of the way means letting the city spend the money raised through the activities of the council and the investments of previous years. The Government should stop pretending and leave us be. We are not concerned about M1. To my constituents, the M1 is at the bottom of the M6 and it leads to a place called London. They are not very fond of it. The M3 goes down the other side and leads to the English channel.

My constituents are not interested in such matters. The people of Birmingham, Coventry and the black country fuelled and fathered the first industrial revolution. Those skills were passed on and inherited. The blockheads on the Treasury Bench cannot understand that one learns such things at the kitchen table. One picks them up in conversations with one's parents. Of course, the skills must be re-applied; of course, we must learn lessons and develop new skills;but we have the basis on which to build. We can do it. The Government must not mess about. If they do not intend to give us proper development aid, if they mean to deny us the right to spend our money, let them leave us be and forget all about Birmingham. We did it before, and we will do it again.

1.52 pm

Mr. Bruce George (Walsall, South): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) for initiating this debate, and I thank the handful of my colleagues who have each spoken for less than 20 minutes.

I do not wish to sound the last post on behalf of my constituency. I wish only to make a few points. Five years ago, my constituency was relatively prosperous. Unemployment was about 5 per cent. The passage of five or six years has transformed the situation. Despite the rhetoric from the Conservative Benches, unemployment is now over 16 per cent.

That catastrophe is epitomised best by the small town of Darlaston. I was fortunate enough to be able to devote the very last Adjournment debate in the 1979 Parliament to Darlaston. The debate was relatively encouraging in the light of what had happened in the previous five or six years compared with what might have happened. A survey that I had undertaken among firms in Darlaston showed that there was a degree of optimism about the future.

The City of London managed to sell London bridge to the United States. However, when one visits Darlaston now, one sees great holes where factories used to be. Factories springing up in the rest of the world are testimony to what has happened in the town. The roll-call of dead and dying companies is terrifying — GKN, Rubery Owen, Charles Richards, Eaton Axles and F H Lloyd. My hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North and I pleaded with NEI last week to save the Wellman Cranes factory in my constituency. That plea fell on deaf ears. One of the few remaining employers of more than 200 people in Darlaston is Servis, which manufactures washing machines. The receiver is in at Servis, and the people of Darlaston must wait with bated breath over the weekend to find out whether that company will join the long list of defunct companies.

The situation is devastating. It is not that one major company has collapsed, leaving the town without its one industry. Dozens of companies have bitten the dust. A petition circulating in Darlaston has been initiated not by politicians but by the Darlaston council of churches, which is pleading with the Government to help Darlaston to get out of an appalling hole. I ask the Minister to speak to his colleagues. I hope that they will look at the petition and see that small town as a microcosm of the collapse and failure of the west midlands. We must get back on to our feet.

The Minister made an incredibly optimistic speech. Even the speech writers in the Kremlin would have blushed at its failure to touch reality, even on the edges. It reminds me of a visit that I made three years ago to Disneyland. The Minister's speech was about as real as Disneyland. There is no optimism in the west midlands. The problems are acute, and I know that the Minister, in reality, must be aware of that.

We want a mixed economy to emerge—not one that is wholly Socialist or wholly private. We must get our economy out of crisis so that we can give our constituents a degree of hope. The hope that they had some years ago has evaporated.

1.56 pm

Dr. John Gilbert (Dudley, East): I apologise for not having been here throughout the debate, but I returned from Germany only in the middle of the morning, having cut short my attendance at a conference.

I hope that the Government are aware of the appalling position in the black country, not least in my constituency which has an unemployment level of well over 20 per cent. Therefore, there must be some estates in my constituency where the rate is well over 30 per cent. We have had such figures for the past couple of years. No one has been spared; both large and small companies have gone under —for example, Round Oak at Brierley Hill and small firms employing only a handful of people. The position is not yet stable. Almost every day of every week the front page of the Express and Star reports job losses — perhaps 100, 200 or even 500, some to be lost immediately and some within a few weeks. I cannot recall seeing reports of jobs being created in my constituency. The position is the same both inside the enterprise zone——

Mrs. Renée Short: What a misnomer.

Dr. Gilbert: I agree with my hon. Friend. The position is the same both within and outside the enterprise zone. The recession has hit farms, modern buildings, and new small industrial estates as well as firms in traditional manufacturing industries in the heart of Dudley and Netherton. Not only metal firms, such as boilermakers, have suffered; so, too, have the textile and service industries, bakeries, petrol stations and the freightliner terminal. The list is endless. There has not been a form of economic activity in Dudley that has not suffered.

It has all come upon us recently. I remember that only four or five years ago Dudley was a relatively prosperous community, with the lowest juvenile unemployment rate in the country. Now there is no prospect of hope for the future. It is not as though expenditure is not necessary. We have a new general hospital at Russels Hall, which cannot be completely opened. Hundreds of houses, both owner-occupied and tenanted, have been affected by subsidence. The people living in those houses have no idea of what the future is for them in their homes. There is an appalling backlog on the council house waiting lists. I am sure that all my colleagues hear of similar problems week in and week out through correspondence and at their surgeries.

Some of the council houses which are in an appalling state of disrepair were built not many years ago. The state of our schools is also appalling. I have been around nursery and secondary schools with dampness, windows that will not open and disgraceful toilet and washing facilities, all of which are crying out for repair, but the Government will not spend money or let Dudley council spend any.

We have derelict land crying out to be converted to playing fields or new changing facilities. Most basic of all, we have a 19th century sewerage and drainage system which floods winter after winter, but the council is not allowed to spend the money necessary to take care of it. Moreover, only a couple of days ago, the Government announced that they are closing our training centre. That is unbelievable and there is no excuse for it. Its places are filled, it is making a profit and it is ensuring a throughput of trainees, but there was not the slightest sign of the Government being prepared to change their mind.

We have, in the Minister with responsibility for the west midlands, a very pleasant young man who, no doubt, is doing his best. He is useless as a Minister, but that is not his fault. He is not allowed to do his job because he has no money to do it. All he can do is receive deputations, smile at them blandly and say how sorry he is. We are all sorry, but he is not doing anything.

Black country people are extremely resilient. The industrial revolution on which the country's wealth is founded was started and carried on there. It is still the greatest reservoir of skilled manpower in the country. We are now paying the price for being generous when other regions had heavy unemployment. We kept quiet about ours and were happy to be throttled by the need for industrial development certificates and all that bureaucratic paraphernalia. But we must now tell the Government that it is time that they recognised what an industrial desert they have created in the heartland of British industry. We are now suffering as much as any other region. We are asking not for charity but for a fair crack of the whip—and now.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson (Coventry, North-West): I also congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) on securing this debate. It is timely, and other Opposition Members will try to repeat it in later Sessions.

The debate takes place against the background of recently published figures which show that, contrary to what the Minister said with such perverse logic, unemployment is again on the increase in the west midlands. As my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) said, it has increased by 2,100 since 1 January. The number of vacancies has dropped and the number of people chasing them has increased. In the west midlands, no fewer than 35 people are chasing every vacancy. No fewer than 1,500 redundancies were announced in January and West Midlands county council has put up a list of another 12 companies which are announcing redundancies in February and March.

Since the Government came to power, we have lost more than 300,000 jobs in the west midlands, 265,000 of them in manufacturing industry. We take no joy in those figures. Indeed, they cause us far greater sadness and give us far greater concern for action than they evidently do any member of the Government or Conservative Member. Labour Members cannot be accused of publicising bad news. It is our duty as an Opposition to oppose the policies that have caused the problems.

A few days ago, I was in Geneva, where I spoke up for the British motor industry and preached the achievements of Jaguar, Austin Rover and Land Rover. That is what we do when we go abroad, but to come to the House and pretend that we do not have other than a tragic waste of resources, a tragic level of human misery and a dangerously declining manufacturing base in the west midlands is to turn the world on its head. We cannot be expected to do that, and we will not do that. We shall continue to show the Government and the Departments concerned the error of their ways until they come to see it.

I pay tribute to the many excellent speeches from Opposition Members. My hon. Friends will understand that in the short time available to me I cannot speak to all of them, but I hope that it will not be invidious if I mention one or two during my speech. In allowing the debate to go as far as we have, we succeeded, despite an inordinately long speech by the Minister, in allowing everyone who wished to speak the opportunity to do so. My hon. Friends will be grateful for that.

The debate has ranged more widely than purely industrial matters. Many hon. Members have mentioned housing, and there is no doubt that the Government's record on housing, as on industry, is one of the worst of any Government who have taken office since the war. It is a simple fact that, despite the pick-up in private sector starts and the small pick-up in private sector completions, fewer houses are being started and completed now, in the private sector as well as in the public sector, than when the Government came to office. Housing has had the same savaging as industrial and regional policy have had at the hands of the Government.

During the six years of the Government's tenure, they have produced a record second to none in terms of destructive achievement. Despite that, to listen to some Conservative Members—I exclude the hon. Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Stevens)—it would all appear to have been the fault of previous Governments, especially the Labour Government. Does the Minister not yet understand that the Government have been in office for no less than six years? How long does he want? No doubt he would like 16 or 60 years, and if we gave him that time he would probably achieve even more destruction. Six years is a long time to prove a point, and it is too long for the dangerous experiment on which the Government have embarked.

When the Minister asks us to consider the Government's achievements at the end of those wretched six years, he says, "Exports are reaching new records in volume and value terms." We notice the nice difference that he wishes to make there. He says that GNP is at a record high and that manufacturing output is higher than it was when they came to office. Those claims amount to nothing more than the fact that we dug an almighty hole and that we are slowly beginning to return to where we were before we dug it. That is the Government's achievement.

It is not enough to say that exports are at a record high when, during those six years, the Government have created a massive deficit on manufacturing trade, with which a future Government—a Labour Government—will have to deal. Oil is a finite resource, and it will run out. After oil, the country will have to live off its manufacturing base, which was and shall be again the west midlands. On net exports, the Government have turned a surplus into a massive deficit of between £4 billion and £6 billion.

Of course, GNP has grown by 4·5 per cent., but it has done so in six years. I asked the Under-Secretary of State to say what other country comparable to Britain can boast such a pathetic achievement. There is none. Every other Government have done better.

Manufacturing output is still below its 1973 level. Which other Governments have increased their manufacturing output by such a small amount? The Minister said that he could not answer that question. Perhaps he is not interested in it. I shall give him the answer. No other country has managed to achieve so little. No other country has done as badly as we have in terms of exports, the balance of trade on manufactures, GNP or investment. That bad record applies particularly to the west midlands and to manufacturing.

The Under-Secretary of State made a disgraceful speech. We do not expect that of him, because we understand that he cares about manufacturing. The speech was deplorable in its irrelevance. The Under-Secretary will not face up to the simple truth that his Government's record is appalling and worse than that of any other Government in the OECD.

Over 50 per cent of the unemployed in the west midlands have been out of work for more than one year. Nearly 60 per cent. of those over 25 have been unemployed for over a year and 61 per cent. of those over 45 have been unemployed for more than one year and will probably never get another job in their lives. That is the stark human tragedy that the Minister tries to dress up as economic success. That is why I say that his speech was disgraceful.

It is often said that we have no policies to put against present policies. The sooner we stop present policies, the better. We have the skills in the west midlands. We have the money that can be invested in the west midlands. The massive car industry needs to be backed by the Government. It needs more money. Will the Under-Secretary undertake to respond to any call for further support from the Land Rover and Austin Rover divisions of British Leyland? Will he assure us that he will not allow either division to pass to Japanese control? If he cannot support them, will he ensure that they do not pass to Honda or any other foreign country? What about the small engineering firms investment scheme? That has made an important contribution to the re-equipment of manufacturing industries in the west midlands.

Why is British Telecom ordering a system other than system X after we put so much effort into developing a standard British system to meet BT's requirements, its specifications and costs, which would give us a home market from which we could export? We could accept it if the job were put to competitive tender, but Plessey and GLC in Coventry were excluded from tendering. May we have some answers?

What does the Minister intend to do about Spanish imports, which could have a dramatic impact on the ability of Austin Rover to supply the home market? Many Government Members have pushed the Minister about that.

We need a positive policy. Under this Government, 230,000 jobs have been lost. Soon that will be 300,000. Youth unemployment has trebled, liquidations are at a record level and housing starts are still down on what they were when they came to office. Over 60 per cent. of housing is substandard and 30 per cent. of our capacity has been lost. Investment in manufacturing industry is still 25 per cent. down. Output is still below its peak in 1973. Since the Government came to office, 1,200 factories have been closed.

The Government have no policies. Hope for the west midlands will come when the west midlanders vote to put a Labour Government into power.

2.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir George Young): I have listened with interest to what has been a good debate. I appreciate the concern of hon. Members who have spoken with feeling about the issues which face their constituents. In no way do I underestimate the difficulties that the region has faced and is facing as a result of the economic recession in recent years. However, we must not allow ourselves to become overwhelmed by the problems and fail to recognise the variety of possible solutions.

From the debate, two distinct images of the west midlands have emerged. One was painted graphically by the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) and substantiated by some of his hon. Friends. That depicted a region full of self-pity, even despair, devoid of hope and looking increasingly to Whitehall for the resolution of its problems through the injection of substantial sums of public money.

The other image to emerge was that painted by my hon. Friends the Members for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey), for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King), for Nuneaton (Mr. Stevens) and for Birmingham, Yardley (Mr. Bevan). That showed a region full of determination to tackle its problems, facing them with self-confidence, enterprise and a recognition that the region's capacity to change, modernise and invest is more likely to re-create the prosperous future which we all want to see, rather than a solution based on massive injections of public money.

From my visits to the west midlands—I have visited most of the cities represented by hon. Members who have spoken today—it is clear to me that the picture painted by my hon. Friends has been more representative of the traditions of the area and of the views of those I met on my visits than the picture of despair painted by Labour Members.

The hon. Member for Coventry, North-West (Mr. Robinson) said that, given a choice, the people of the west midlands would vote for his policies. In 1983 those people were offered the very solutions that we have been offered today by Labour Members, and we won more seats in the west midlands than we had ever won before, and two of my hon. Friends who won seats at that election have spoken in this debate.

Mr. Winnick: Wait until next time.

Sir George Young: Threats of electoral retribution do not cut much ice.

The hon. Member for Coventry, North-West said on several occasions that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary had made an appalling speech and that the Government's record was appalling. My hon. Friend produced a whole range of statistics to substantiate his view. The hon. Gentleman produced not one, nor was he able at any point to challenge any of the information that my hon. Friend adduced.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: I am challenged and I feel bound to respond. The Minister asks what figures I quoted to contradict the figures given by the Under-Secretary. I quoted figures specifically about exports, which are at a record level, but that is not the issue. The Minister must understand, even if his hon. Friend did not, that it is a question not just of exports but of net exports—that is, the state of our balance of trade on manufacturing—and that has deteriorated terribly.

I spoke about GDP output. The Under-Secretary spoke at inordinate length very early in the debate, which we did not expect him to do, and he did not adduce an argument on the GDP point that I made. What sort of achievement is a 4·5 per cent. increase in GDP in six years? Is that not worse than for any other comparable country in the OECD network?

Sir George Young: The hon. Gentleman asked that rhetorical question halfway through my hon. Friend's speech, but my hon. Friend did not speak only about exports. He talked also of investment, the increase in output and a whole range of economic indicators.

During the debate, my hon. Friends have drawn on evidence from the MSC. All of that substantiated our case that there are signs of an upturn in the economy in the west midlands. It does Opposition Members no credit to ignore the statistics simply because they do not like them.

The private sector has responded well to some of the opportunities that my Department has offered — for example, urban development grants; 34 schemes have been approved involving grants of £17·5 million, which has produced in its wake private investment of £88·4 million, and a significant number of applications are in the pipeline.

Progress in the region's two enterprise zones is encouraging, and I do not recall any Opposition Member referring to those.

Dr. Gilbert: I did.

Sir George Young: Almost all the sites in the Telford enterprise zone have been taken in the 14 months since its designation.

There is evidence that the private sector of housing is prepared to tackle the unpromising sites and estates in partnership with local authorities and to build attractive homes at prices that people can afford. We should not forget the satisfaction that my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham Yardley, (Mr. Bevan) mentioned of the 70,000 former council tenants who have bought their own homes and realised a major ambition in so doing.

Nothing that I have heard today leads me to change my view that the Government are right to pursue their resolve to abolish the West Midlands county council. The WMCC has carried out some economic development work that has been of benefit to its area but the district councils in the area are already supporting impressive economic schemes. It is right to give the primary local authority economic development role to district councils. If they wish to do so, they will be able to enter into joint voluntary working arrangements with one another and to set up enterprise boards. The Government have actively sponsored the setting up of the West Midlands industrial development agency, which has an important role to play in these matters.

Several Labour Members have defended the West Midlands county council. I remind them that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), an Opposition Front Bench environment spokesman, said that he would not lift one finger to save the county council. [Interruption.] That is an environmental issue and we should attach some weight to his remarks.

I shall try to deal now with some of the issues which have been raised in the debate. If I do not deal with them all, either my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry or I will try to write to those concerned. My hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth mentioned some good news from GEC, Jaguar and British Leyland. He referred to Talbot and Iran and said that Iran appeared to be a slow payer. We shall take up that issue and do what we can to resolve it.

The Government's car service has supported the car industry in the west midlands in a modest way. I am happy to say that the service buys all its cars from British manufacturers. Last year it bought 42 cars from Austin Rover, some of which were produced by west midland workers.

A successful development such as the Warwick science park should be able to attract private sector investment to augment the public resources which have been provided by local authorities. I commend the approach of the Birmingham city council, which brought in Barclays bank as a partner in the Aston science park venture.

The hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) talked about local government. He advocated policies of confrontation in local government from which the leader of his party, the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock), has already dissociated himself. These policies are being abandoned by the hon. Gentleman's friends who are in control of some local authorities in the west midlands.

Mr. Nellist: Will the Minister answer my question about——

Sir George Young: I wish to try to make progress and deal with some of the issues which have been raised. I have spent about 180 hours with the hon. Gentleman debating local government in Committee. That has been quite enough and I do not want any more of it now.

Mr. Nellist rose——

Sir George Young: My hon. Friend the Member for Northfield mentioned buses and Metro-Cammell. My hon. Friend will know that demand for buses has been falling for some years as demand for bus services has declined. Our proposals may result in some difficulties for manufacturers, at least in the short term. I shall pass on my hon. Friend's suggestion to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. However, the longer that the Government fail to tackle the underlying problems, the further the decline of the bus industry will go and the harder it will be to reverse it.

Transport has been discussed during the debate, especially the black country route. The Government have given unequivocal support to the black country route, which is a major scheme which will cost about £42 million. We named the scheme in April 1984 for transport supplementary grant purposes. In December 1984 the transport supplementary grant settlement of the West Midlands county council made special allowance for the black country route to allow swift progress. The scheme has been designated as a project of regional or national importance, which means that the resources for it are ring-fenced. We have supported the WMCC's application to Brussels for regional development fund grant for the scheme, which has been successful.

We should have regard to the entire housing picture instead of concentrating on public sector starts or improvements. The hon. Member for Coventry, North-West, who wound up on behalf of the Opposition, told us that the figures for private sector starts and completions show a steady increase. That should be contrasted with the decline in the number of public sector starts.

Public sector starts are down because local authorities are rightly switching their resources to modernising, improving and converting stock we already have rather than building new accommodation for rent.

Mr. Corbett: Boswell.

Sir George Young: The problem of the Boswell homes has only recently been drawn to my Department's attention. The Boswell house is a possible candidate for designation under the Housing Defects Act 1984, and the case is being considered by my Department.

My hon. Friend the Member for Yardley asked about Smith houses. Because of his representations, we carefully considered the case for designating Smith houses under section 1 of the Housing Defects Act but concluded that this was not possible because it appeared that the use of colliery shale as an infill material had caused the particular problems in Birmingham. I understand the concern of owners of Smith houses in Birmingham. I am sorry that the city has taken no action to designate these houses in a local scheme under section 12 of the Act. The city and my hon. Friend may take some comfort from what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said in the debate on Wednesday when we considered HIP allocations for next year. He recognised that "some authorities have difficulties in meeting their obligations under this Act in addition to their other commitments."

He said that, in response to representations, he was "prepared to consider sympathetically requests from authorities that cannot otherwise meet their obligations under the Housing Defects Act for additional allocations towards the cost of repurchasing or reinstatement grants."—[Official Report, 13 March 1985; Vol. 75, c. 348.]

That point was aimed specifically at the houses that have been designated by the Secretary of State rather than the houses under any local scheme. If Birmingham has houses that are already designated, that might offer some comfort. [Interruption.] I am trying to deal with all the questions. The more I am interrupted, the less able I will be to do so.

The Opposition did not mention the fact that, in the west midlands county as a whole, spending on grants has increased from £8·8 million in 1981-82 to £25·6 million in 1982-83 and to £56 million in 1983-84. Forecast expenditure for the current year is expected to be about £49 million.

Mr. Corbett: What about next year?

Sir George Young: It will be more than the £5 million which the Labour Government spent in 1979-80. These are impressive figures and mean that a great deal of valuable repair work has been carried out.

I was asked about some of the difficult-to-let estates. This is a priority for my Department, and I was pleased to note that our consultants under the priority estate projects are active in the west midlands, for example in Coventry and Sandwell, giving advice and informal help to authorities that are seeking to launch their own intensive management projects.

Hon. Members asked about derelict land and the land registers. In the west midlands, the land register holdings contain more than 10,000 acres of vacant and underused land on 1,100 sites. Since the registers were published, nearly 3,000 acres have been removed from the registers, enabling valuable land to be brought back into productive use. I shall examine two specific questions raised during the debate where it appears that there has been some difficulty in obtaining derelict land grant.

Grants under the European regional development fund have been available to certain districts since 1984. Since November last year they have been available to the much wider west midlands assisted area. A total of 61 schemes have been approved, with nearly £22 million of grant aid.

A number of development grant schemes which are getting under way in the west midlands enable the public sector to put some money up front and bring in private sector funding behind it. On my visits to Wolverhampton recently, I came across excellent urban programme schemes. The Chubb building, a Victorian lock factory, has been converted to new enterprise workshops, one of which houses an individual who is setting up an electronic engineering business. I came across also the narrow boat project which is run in conjunction with the probation service. It provides youngsters with skills in the metal industries. The end product—the narrow boat—is used to give mentally and physically handicapped young people the enjoyment of canal trips. A small amount of public money has been used to give wide benefits.

We have heard a great deal about hon. Members' anxieties and the issues. I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and I have shown the House that the Government take seriously the problems facing the west midlands. We are prepared to play our part. I have outlined a number of schemes that my Department has put forward through the urban programme, urban development grant, and derelict land grant. There are now signs that local authorities recognise the value of such schemes. They are taking them up with my Department. A number of worthwhile jobs have already been created through the use of such schemes. The best help that local government can give industry and employment in the west midlands——

It being half-past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Housing (Portsmouth)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

2.31 pm

Mr. Michael Hancock (Portsmouth, South): I appreciate that Portsmouth has the highest HIP allocation in the south-east, but that fact reinforces what I am going to say. I am fortunate to have the opportunity to bring Portsmouth's problems to the attention of Parliament. Portsmouth, unfortunately, has all the problems of urban deprivation, bad housing, high unemployment and all the other problems associated more with inner cities in the north of England. Because Portsmouth is set in what some people would consider the somewhat rarefied air of the south coast, its problems are partly or completely ignored by various Government Departments. That is true particularly of housing.

I should like to praise Portsmouth's housing department, in particular the letting section under Mr. Chilcott and Miss Harvey, for the valiant efforts that it has made for housing homeless people and people seeking assistance in the city under the most difficult circumstances. To a certain extent, I also praise the new chairman of the housing committee, Councillor Gregory, who is a member of the Conservative party. To his credit, he has seen how desperate the position is becoming in Portsmouth and has tried to rectify the past 15 years of what I consider to be his colleagues' mismanagement of housing.

My experience as a member of the city council for 14 years and of the housing committee for eight years tells me that housing in my city is the worst that it has been for 25 years. There were 3,987 housing applications received in 1984-85, about 600 of which came from old age pensioners seeking special accommodation.

There are 3,500 people seeking housing assistance in Portsmouth. When we consider that two thirds of the people who apply for housing in Portsmouth never reach the list, the total figure is far in excess of that. The figure does not take into account the 5,000 people living in multi-occupied premises. There is an enormous problem with transfer applications. At present, about 1,800 people are seeking transfers. The problem is not helped by the fact that the 27,000 housing units that we had at our disposal five years ago have now been reduced to only 23,600.

I see the merits of and encourage those people seeking to buy their own homes. Many of them would be foolish if they did not take advantage of the offers being made under the present system for buying council houses. It is OK to pursue that policy provided we ensure that we do not deny housing opportunities for people wanting houses. The situation in Portsmouth, with about 3,500 fewer houses in the past three or four years, is making the task of the housing department and the city council to service the needs of the community virtually impossible to carry out. We need some thoughts and guidance from the Government about that, if about nothing else.

As I have said, the housing waiting list has steadily increased since 1979, to such an extent that the housing department recently published a document which said that its present points scheme was considered to be inadequate accurately to reflect the applicants' housing needs and ensure that those persons in most need of city council housing were given priority on the waiting list. It also felt that it was not an accurate way to measure true housing needs in Portsmouth. The figures produced by the council show that about 11,000 houses are in need of repairs costing over £2,500, and 27,500 properties need external repairs of one form or another. The council's estimate is that at least one in 20 houses need new roofs, as a start to providing good housing for the people.

Despite the extensive home improvement programme in the city—I was an instigator of that programme in 1971, and have fully supported it ever since — the Government's action, with VAT on improvement grants, has made, and will continue to make, the task of seeking to improve those old houses, many of which are 80 or 90 years old, and some of which are 100 years old, extremely difficult to carry out. Many of the people in them are elderly and cannot afford the finance that is now needed. In my constituency, the average for updating and modernising a two-up, two-down, terrace house with the front door going straight on to the street is over £16,000, which is no small sum of money for anybody, let alone for those who are heading towards retirement or have already retired.

With that large number of unfit properties and properties in need of repair, once again the Government should have given sympathetic consideration to the special categories of housing which, unfortunately, have been denied to the city. I am sure that the Minister and his colleagues will argue now and in future that Portsmouth has an extensive home improvement programme, but it is nowhere near enough. If we do not get improved resources, the day of the bulldozer rampaging through the streets of Portsmouth will return. We shall face the consequences of slum clearance again rather than home improvements. That is a sad dereliction of responsibility and of the ambition that the Government pursued with such vigour, with, I am sure, the total agreement of the House, during the first two or three years of their Administration from 1979.

I have already referred to the problems of multi-occupation. Portsmouth has the largest polytechnic in the country, with about 8,500 students. Coupled with seasonal trade, people working in the holiday industry and people coming to the city for holidays, that makes the housing problem particularly difficult in Portsmouth, South. Because of the large numbers of people in multi-occupation, the city council cannot get to grips with and tackle some of the problems that have arisen, some of which would make the antics of Mr. Rachman in the 1960s pale into insignificance by comparison. It is not an uncommon occurrence for landlords to torment and harass residents in the city of Portsmouth, and make their lives a living hell. Despite that, it is difficult, if not impossible, for the city council to do anything but make a token gesture in offering rehousing for people living in such conditions.

The same can be said of the post-war and pre-war blocks of flats all over the constituency of Portsmouth, South and the city as a whole. Families with children live on the 17th floor of blocks that are occupied predominantly by elderly people. There is an enormous pressure on, for example, a mother looking after three children on the 17th floor of a tower block, where it is not an infrequent occurrence for the lifts to be out of action for a day or so a week, making the young mother virtually captive with her young children in the high-rise block. Hon. Members need think only of the problems for the nearby community and for the elderly, with the noise of the childen running about. Once again, because of the constraints on housing finance, the city council is unable to deal with those problems. It should be remembered that I am talking about not one or two but a huge number of people.

DHSS payments in the city of Portsmouth represent one of the biggest scandals of our time with regard to public finance. I recently asked the Secretary of State for Social Services about the amount of money being paid in DHSS payments for bed and breakfast accommodation in the city. I was told that the figures were so great and that it would take so long and cost so much to provide them that he did not want to do so. I hope that the Under-Secretary of State will seek some guidance from the DHSS about the situation in Portsmouth. It is not rare for payments in excess of £180 a week to be paid for a husband, wife and two children to live in bed and breakfast accommodation. In many instances, payments of £200 a week for a family are the norm.

Once again, the council can rehouse only a few such families each month. The cost in national resources is enormous. There is not likely to be any incentive for the man to find a job, and in most cases there is no likelihood, at least in the foreseeable future, of him ever obtaining a home.

For example, an unemployed man who is now drawing £180 a week from the DHSS for bed and breakfast accommodation would need a job paying in excess of £230 a week if he was to earn that £180 a week. Such jobs do not arise very frequently in Portsmouth. There is no incentive for him to get a job, because he knows that if he finds a job he will not be able to keep his family in his present bed and breakfast accommodation. Thus, there is a disincentive for him to help himself and to find a job. The city council is faced with the impossible task of trying to find houses for such people virtually daily as applicants come to them.

If we gave the city more resources and it was able to provide accommodation, we could probably save about £100 a week in public money on those families alone. Those resources could then be better used in other areas, in trying to help the community in Portsmouth and in other parts of the country. I hope that the Minister will look carefully at the way in which the Government spend their money on DHSS payments to keep people in accommodation that is often substandard. Frequently, they are nothing more than a licence for the owners of those properties to print money. They should be exposed, and the Government should take action, particularly in areas such as Portsmouth, where the problem is widespread and needs to be investigated and sorted out.

I shall now concentrate on some of the specific problems of the buildings in Portsmouth, and on the Leamington and Solihull blocks in particular. They are 20-year-old tower blocks. In the past three years the city council has spent £2·25 million on those blocks, trying to refurbish them. More than 50 flats in them have major water penetration problems. In a recent report, the city council says that it is having to seek advice from the Department of the Environment and specialist architects in order to try to solve the problem. In the meantime, those living there have to stuff towels round windows 12 floors up in order to stop water being blown into their living rooms. They have to roll back carpets in bedrooms and move beds away from the walls. Yet those blocks are not 20 years old and £2·25 million of public money has been spent in the past three years.

In Portsdown park one can witness a classic blunder in local authority housing. Five hundred and twenty units were built in the highest brick building in Europe. It was begun in 1965 and completed in the early 1970s, yet it has never been right. Present estimates range from £2 million to £4 million, and even to £9 million, to put it right. Even to demolish part of it and to try to rekindle some enthusiasm within the community for living there would cost about £4 million. That money is not available.

In the meantime, 520 families are condemned to living in an environment that neither I nor the Minister would want to live in. Yet the city council has no alternative but to condemn them to living in such properties. The council would describe that as an unfortunate occurrence. I call it a damning indictment of the way in which Government housing policy has gone hopelessly adrift.

The same applies to the many post-war blocks in my constituency. Those blocks require money to be spent on them urgently. Lifts are needed to the third and fourth floors. Parents with shopping and up to three children under the age of five cannot cope with three of four flights of stairs. The flats themselves are riddled with damp, the windows are falling out and there are safety problems for children playing on balconies 30 or 40 ft up. Those blocks constitute a real hazard, but there is no enthusiasm or drive to alter the situation or to bring home the facts to Ministers.

I hope that the Minister will now take an initiative and, if necessary, come to Portsmouth with the Secretary of State and tour the streets. When the Secretary of State came to discuss rate capping he arrived in a helicopter. The cloud was so low that he might as well have been flying over Timbuctoo for all the chance he had of seeing not just the beauty of the city, but the problems that it faces. Nor would he have gleaned much from conversations at the town hall with Conservative politicians who can see no further than their noses. Most of them deny that these things are happening. They do not wish to face the reality of people living in squalor and difficulty.

People whose homes are wet from floor to ceiling in every room are given the pat answer from the environmental health department that it is "condensation", because, in its heart of heart., the housing department knows that it can do nothing about the problem. It cannot transfer people out, it cannot carry out remedial work and it cannot build new homes, because it does not have the money. We have sold nearly 3,500 council houses, but we cannot use the proceeds to rekindle the housing programme. We cannot use our own money to solve our own problems, because we are tied hand and foot by the Government.

Portsmouth has all the problems of any other inner city area, but, sadly, those problems have been ignored. I ask the Minister to bear in mind five points. First, we hope that he and the Secretary of State will visit Portsmouth pretty sharply.

Secondly, I hope that he will hold an investigation into the housing situation in the city before the next housing investment programme allocation is made. That investigation should go into the problems that I have described, to see whether the city's problems merit a greater allocation of resources.

Thirdly, the Secretary of State should consider the problems of three specific areas — Portsdown park, Leamington and Solihull house and the upgrading of postwar blocks of more than four storeys—because that is where people in council accommodation are suffering most.

Fourthly, the Government should reconsider VAT on home improvements, because it is a sure deterrent to home improvement and creates further unemployment. In view of the large number of properties that require improvements, there should also be a special allocation of resources so that the council has sufficient staff to cater for the demand that would undoubtedly come if the Government would relinquish their grip and rectify the VAT situation.

Lastly, I hope that the Minister will seriously consider making resources available to enable Portsmouth to start afresh with a house building programme that will cater for the true needs of housing in Portsmouth. We can build properties for the elderly until the cows come home, and rightly so, but we also have to accommodate people who have perhaps two or three children and are living in bad conditions in one room in a multi-occupied dwelling. We need a housing programme that relates to the true needs of the community. I hope that the Minister will take note of those points.

2.51 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir George Young): I can give a very prompt response to the request of the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) that a Minister should visit Portsmouth. At this very moment my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government is in Portsmouth. I see from his timetable that he is now talking to the leader, the deputy leader and chief officers of the council. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that the Government have honoured that obligation most promptly.

The question of VAT on home improvements is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who is probably putting the finishing touches to his Budget at the moment. I shall see that that point is passed on to the Treasury.

The hon. Gentleman's other points relate directly or indirectly to the HIP allocation for Portsmouth in the forthcoming year. The hon. Gentleman asks specifically about three estates. Broadly, it is for Portsmouth to decide whether to apply the resources made available to it to those particular areas or to other claims on the housing programme. The Government would not intervene in what we see as local decisions best taken by the hon. Gentleman himself—I believe that he is still a city councillor—and by other locally elected members.

The problems facing Portsmouth are not unique. Many other local authorities face similar problems. The Government have made available, for the next year, housing capital expenditure for local authorities totalling £2,324 million. That comprises an initial allocation of some £1,600 million, plus nearly £400 million holdback to take account of flexibilities within the control system, and also for a reserve to help with supplementary allocations for those authorities that complied with the call for capital expenditure restraint. There is also the prescribed proportion of capital receipts generated by authorities in 1985-86, which is expected to be about £325 million.

I hope that the hon. Member will accept that the Government have to put a ceiling on the total resources available in that area. Public expenditure must be controlled and public sector housing must contribute to the needs of the economy. We have tried to make sure that the allocations are made, as far as possible, on a basis of need.

The hon. Gentleman recognises that Portsmouth has done moderately well. In November 1983 we told local authorities that they could plan their 1985-86 programme on the basis that their allocation in that year would be at least 80 per cent. of their allocation in 1984-85. The allocation to Portsmouth more than meets that assurance. It is in fact 95 per cent. of the allocation made in 1984-85.

My Department is aware of the special problems in Portsmouth related to defective stock. We have recognised that in the HIP allocations over the past few years. For 1985-86, Portsmouth has been given the highest allocation of all the 65 authorities in the south-east. The total is £6·4 million, including £90,000 for the home insulation scheme. I believe that the council also has substantial receipts available to help to fund the housing programme. Use of those receipts from the sale of assets has allowed the local authority almost to double housing resources in the past three years.

The Government are grateful to those authorities which have kept their spending within the levels requested, and they recognise that this may have involved the authority in taking difficult decisions about priorities. Authorities such as Portsmouth will be assisted with a supplementary allocation in 1985-86 equal to 5 per cent. of the aggregate of the basic allocations made for housing and other services. Further, it is open to Portsmouth to apply for an additional allocation under the homes insulation scheme if it finds that funds under that heading become fully committed.

I was pleased to hear what the hon. Gentleman said about the inflow of capital receipts from the sale of council houses. Portsmouth's scheme was in operation before the right-to-buy scheme was introduced under the 1980 Act, and since records were started in October 1980 more than 3,000 dwellings have been sold. That is good news and is fully in accordance with the Government's objective of bringing home ownership within the reach of as many people as possible. Portsmouth has already sold more than 50 unimproved dwellings for improvement by purchasers under the homesteading arrangements and over 50 low-cost homes in conjunction with developers. It is anticipated that the private sector will complete 500 new dwellings this year, and that is most welcome news. All those initiatives will help to reduce the pressure on rented accommodation.

We recognise that Portsmouth is a densely built-up area and that spare land for housing is difficult to find. For that reason we are giving sympathetic consideration to an application for a derelict land grant for a scheme at Glory Hole, Eastney, for a marina and 139 housing units. The application is for a 50 per cent. capital grant of more than £1·150 million over two years.

On improvements, I understand that annual expenditure on grants is about £3 million compared with £841,000 in 1979-80, and that represents a sizeable increase, mirroring what has happened nationally.

The waiting list of those who have made inquiries about a grant has been reduced significantly over the past few months. To put that in a broader context, Portsmouth obviously understands and is acting on the Government's commitment to improve the housing stock. That commitment has been demonstrated by the measures that we have taken over the past two or three years, introducing a favourable regime for improvement grants.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the large number of elderly applicants, and on checking the waiting lists I can confirm what he said. More than 500 elderly persons were accepted on to the waiting list between February 1984 and February 1985. The council recognises that as an area of greatest need and has, therefore, concentrated in its new build programme on homes for the elderly. I note that 90 units were completed in 1984-85, more are under construction and two new schemes are due to start in 1985-86, providing 77 units of sheltered accommodation. I understand that Portsmouth is also looking at other ways to meet the needs of the elderly, especially by investigating the possible use of a central communication alarm system. That would link elderly public and private sector tenants and owner-occupiers to a central alarm system, allowing them to stay independent and living in their own homes as long as possible.

I would like to commend again the research report recently published by Dr. Anthea Tinker in my Department entitled "Staying at Home: Helping Elderly People". Copies were sent to Portsmouth city council as well as to the health authorities. The report examines in detail alternatives to sheltered housing or institutional care which enable the more dependent elderly to remain in their own homes. That is what many old people wish to do. Alarm and care schemes are often cheaper than sheltered housing.

Dealing with defective housing stock, we recognise the city council's concern about the Orlit and Reema properties that have been designated under the Housing Defects Act. We took that into account in deciding the HIP allocation. While it is for local authorities to decide their expenditure priorities and ensure that their statutory obligations are met, this year a new indicator was introduced within the generalised needs index that is intended to reflect the need for expenditure on prefabricated reinforced concrete houses. That increases the generalised needs index score of authorities with large numbers of PRC dwellings in their areas. We have also given greater weight within the index to disrepair in the public sector stock.

We have tried to help Portsmouth through the urban programme. I am happy to tell the hon. Gentleman that we have today decided to approve a scheme for the Hertford street play area—I hope it is in the hon. Gentleman's constituency—for £35,000 capital expenditure to enable the local authority to upgrade the play area by providing a range of play facilities together with associated landscaping and environmental improvements.

We have also decided to help the Beneficial Foundation Resource Centre, which encourages the provision of opportunities for work, work experience and training for the unemployed. Although the project is time-expired, and normally we would look to Portsmouth to pick it up, the level of unemployment in Portsmouth is such that it has been given a two-year phased extension.

I noted what the hon. Gentleman said about some of the other problems. I was disturbed to learn that there are still families living at the top of tower blocks. There is general agreement that that is not the best place for families with children to live. I hope that Portsmouth will take steps to rehouse those families in suitable accommodation.

On the question of renovating stock, Portsmouth is undertaking a large modernisation programme with a spend of £6·5 million in 1983-84 and a projected £7·3 million in 1984-85. The council will continue to concentrate its efforts on that programme in the coming year.

As time has run out I cannot deal with the other issues, but I undertake to take a personal interest in the allocation of HIP resources to Portsmouth for next year in the light of what the hon. Gentleman has said.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at Three o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRANSPORT

London Regional Transport (Fares Increase)

1. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, when he next meets the chairman of London Regional Transport, he will discuss the expected effect of the January 1985 fares increase on passenger-miles travelled on its bus and underground systems.

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): Our discussions with the chairman of London Regional Transport cover a wide range of matters, including LRT's future business prospects.

Mr. Banks: Will the Minister tell the House why the Secretary of State is allowing the chairman of London Regional Transport to cut a further 39 bus routes in April? Is the Minister aware that if that cut takes place one quarter of all London's bus routes will have been affected by cuts since London Transport became a Government quango? When the Minister or the Secretary of State next sees Doctor Bright, can he be told that Londoners do not want any more one-person-operated buses because they consider them to be slow, inefficient and dangerous?

Mrs. Chalker: The hon. Gentleman must not believe everything that he reads in the newspapers. As the hon. Gentleman is chairman-elect of the Greater London council, I have to tell him that the net effect of LRT's plans for the buses is a reduction of 0·6 per cent.—about 2 million passenger miles out of a total of 170 million bus miles. Of the routes which have been changed, only three are not covered by other buses. There has been a loss of 2·25 miles of bus route because of a change in demand. In other areas where demand has been established, new bus routes have been introduced. One-person-operated buses are a major contributor to cost savings. They are used across the country without any real difficulty. The hon. Gentleman ought to be looking for improved services for passengers instead of, as he seems to be doing, staying in the past.

Mr. Tracey: I tend to share my hon. Friend's view of the partial remarks of the chairman-elect of the Greater London council. However, does she agree that the ratepayers of London will be much more enamoured of the professional stewardship of LRT than of the blanket subsidies which were being thrown at London transport by the GLC, since those were simply a drain on ratepayers' pockets?

Mrs. Chalker: My hon. Friend is right. Had the GLC gone ahead with its planned subsidy levels, the marginal external benefits at those levels would have been equivalent to only one seventh of the increased cost which would have fallen upon the ratepayers. That is exactly why business management was required in London Regional Transport.

Channel Tunnel

2. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment his Department has made of the impact of a Channel tunnel on the traffic between London and Paris, Amsterdam and Brussels; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): No assessment has been made of the impact of a fixed link on specific inter-city routes. That would vary according to the nature of the fixed link, on which no decision has yet been made.

Mr. Adley: Is my hon. Friend familiar with his Department's estimate that without the TGV or any new British Rail lines, up to 1·7 million air passengers from Heathrow would transfer to a rail tunnel if such a thing were built? With the TGV, the London-Brussels journey time would be reduced to three hours. In the light of my hon. Friend's rather surprising answer, will he give the House an assurance that, as the Government are now reviewing airports policy, full account will be taken of the Channel tunnel so that we do not find ourselves in a position where it takes longer to get from London to Stansted than from London to Paris?

Mr. Mitchell: We shall take my hon. Friend's point into account, but it is only fair to say that Paris is only one of the many hundreds of routes served from Heathrow.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will positive consideration be given to siting any terminus for the Channel tunnel rail line in London docklands where, as the hon. Gentleman is probably aware, there is considerable interest in that terminus? Is that already on his Department's agenda for positive consideration, and will he encourage that development?

Mr. Mitchell: It is a little premature for us to know that when we do not know exactly what form, if any, the cross-Channel link will take, but I shall certainly keep the hon. Gentleman's point in mind.

Mr. Hill: My hon. Friend will know that there have been many studies on the cost of linking the major cities of Europe once the Channel tunnel is built. May I draw his attention to the fact that I was the author of one called "Bridges and Tunnels of Europe, 1974", in which much valuable information is contained, although, naturally, it will need updating?

Mr. Mitchell: I shall ask my hon. Friend for a copy of that excellent document.

Mr. Snape: I assure the Minister that I have no books on this subject to peddle. Has the hon. Gentleman considered the impact that the Channel tunnel would have on railway freight carriage? Would it not give the railways a much better opportunity to compete on long-distance freight with other modes of transport? Will the Government consider the environmental aspects of the Channel tunnel before coming to a decision on any of the three schemes that they have before them?

Mr. Mitchell: Yes, we shall take that into account. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that substantial environmental considerations will be taken into account in the assessment of the relative options.

Concessionary Fares

3. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he plans any changes in his Department's arrangements for monitoring the nature and extent of concessionary fares schemes.

Mr. David Mitchell: I see no need for the Department to collect information centrally. Under the Transport Bill, local authorities establishing concessionary fare schemes will have to publish details and supply copies on request.

Mr. Pike: Will the Minister take the opportunity, during the passage of the Transport Bill, to ensure that no elderly or disabled person suffers any detriment as a result of the Bill? Would it not be a good starting point to ensure that all pensioners and disabled people have the same concession as that which is good enough for people in London?

Mr. Mitchell: It is for each elected local authority to decide what it believes to be the right priorities for the people in its area. As the hon. Gentleman well knows, I cannot give the sort of undertaking for which he is asking. I can only give him the undertaking that, if the Bill does not go through, the chronic decline of the bus industry will continue, leaving more and more people isolated without bus services. With the Bill on the statute book, there will at least be a substantial opportunity for the revitalisation of the industry.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: Will my hon. Friend reiterate, perhaps for the umpteenth time, that Conservative Members are completely committed to the continuance of concessionary fares for the elderly? Will he take the opportunity to draw to the attention of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment the fact that local authorities of another persuasion are still spending ratepayers' money advertising the fact that the Bill will abolish concessionary fares?

Mr. Mitchell: I join my hon. Friend in confirming that local authorities up and down the country will wish to continue concessionary fares.

I also join my hon. Friend in condemning the scandalous way in which ratepayers' money is being used to finance party political propaganda against the Transport Bill. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike), who represents an area which has spent over £130,000 of ratepayers' money campaigning against the measure and frightening old-age pensioners, should be ashamed of what is happening in his authority.

Mr. Rogers: I shall not be drawn into the question of money which the Government are spending on a measure of an overtly political nature. Apart from any arrangements for concessionary fares, does the Minister accept that the removal of £48 million that was available as subsidy for the aged and elderly will mean a continuation of the Government's mean and spiteful policy towards that sector of the community?

Mr. Mitchell: I trust that the hon. Gentleman is not intentionally confusing the House by comparing things which are not alike. He is comparing the outturn in one year with the provision in another year. As he will well know, the two rarely have much relationship to each other.

Sir John Page: Is my hon. Friend aware that unscrupulous people in the London area are still trying to spread alarm and despondancy among pensioners and the disabled about the future of concessionary fares after the GLC is abolished? Will he make a further authoritative statement on the subject of concessionary fares in London, underlining the fall-back position enshrined in the Bill?

Mr. Mitchell: I can confirm that there is no such threat in the London area. I am glad to take the opportunity of reassuring my hon. Friend, and, through him, the many thousands of people who have been scandalously and unreasonably frightened in the matter.

Mrs. Dunwoody: If the Minister is really serious, what objection can he have to writing a guarantee of this kind into the Transport Bill? If we are to take him at his word, let him propose a Government clause to make sure that concessionary fares will be not only monitored but retained. If he does that, then and only then shall we believe that they are to be protected.

Mr. Mitchell: I would not wish to launch into such an attack upon the rights of local authorities — [HON. MEMBERS "Oh".]—to make their own decisions in the light of their own circumstances and what they believe to be the right priorities for people in their areas.

Traffic Offences (Penalties)

5. Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he is satisfied with the effectiveness of the present system of penalties for traffic offences.

Mrs. Chalker: On 31 Janauary my right hon. Friend announced the setting up of a review body to consider certain aspects of traffic law, including penalties. We are most concerned to have a system of road traffic law that is both fair and effective.

Mr. Gregory: I thank my hon. Friend for that comment. Will she take account of the widely varying disparities throughout the county, particularly with regard to construction and use? If, unfortunately, the rear light of her vehicle is not functioning as she goes through one county, she may be advised to present a note to the police station when the fault has been rectified, but in another county there is an immediate prosecution. I hope that the review will deal with disparities of that sort.

Mrs. Chalker: I am aware of the anxiety that my hon. Friend has mentioned. It is a matter for the review, under Mr. North. I am sure that the review body will look at that matter and at others where there seems to be inequality between one county and another. Some of the matters are for the Home Office, but it is a joint review between my Department and the Home Office.

Mr. Higgins: Will my hon. Friend give me an assurance that the review will cover the activities of motor cyclists? They seem increasingly to be attempting to commit suicide by driving in and out between moving vehicles. Will she give particular attention to that matter? A considerable number of motor cyclists drive on the outside of moving traffic and go on the wrong side of islands in the middle of the road.

Mrs. Chalker: Those activities are already outside the law. It is a matter of concern and of enforcement of the law. No motorist who ignores the "Highway Code" can be safe on the road. In the review we shall have to look at better ways of ensuring that the "Highway Code" is implemented.

Mr. Roger King: Does my hon. Friend agree that, as with all aspects of the law, sensible traffic law should be readily obeyed by motorists? Does she further agree with the Select Committee report on road safety that a trial speed limit of 80 miles an hour on our motorways would be one step forward along that path?

Mrs. Chalker: I wish that all sensible road laws were obeyed by motorists. Unfortunately, that is not so. I shall be coming to the House with our reaction to the Select Committee's suggestions on road safety. We are concerned to improve road safety, and that is why we are looking carefully at the range of suggestions made by the Select Committee.

Mr. Tony Banks: It is a matter not only of the review of the system of traffic offences, but of policing. Will the hon. Lady be speaking to her right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department and asking for an increase in the number of traffic wardens in London so that illegal parking and illegal use of bus lanes can be eliminated? Do we not need more policing of such matters?

Mrs. Chalker: I think that the chairman-elect of the GLC knows already that the use of traffic wardens in the Greater London area is being discussed between his colleagues in the GLC, the London Boroughs Association, the Association of Labour Authorities and my Department, and we shall shortly be having a further meeting. Merely extending the traffic warden system will not necessarily improve the behaviour of motorists who park in a particular area.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Will my hon. Friend look at speeding offences, which seem to be on the increase, particularly on motorways, with 80 miles an hour now being the traditional speed? Will she also look at the offence of drunken driving, particularly as a number of garages now have an off-licence facility? Could the penalties for drunken driving be increased?

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary updates maximum penalties, and there is a regular review of different penalties for different offences. The fines for drunken driving are £2,000, obligatory disqualification and up to six months in gaol. They are harsh, and if they need to be made harsher, I am sure that the review body will recommend that.

Railway Ancillary Services

6. Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he last discussed the options for contracting out ancillary activities on the railways with the chairman of British Rail.

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): Last December BR published its new criteria for the supply of support services. At our regular meetings the chairman keeps me informed of progress in applying them.

Mr. Jones: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that reply. The existence of these criteria will come as a great surprise to most businesses. Will he ensure that the chairman of British Rail spends more time promoting the existence of these criteria than making half-baked proposals for denying second-class passengers access to first-class dining cars?

Mr. Ridley: I do not think that all that my hon. Friend has read in the press about dining cars is true. I strongly support what he said about the need for industry to get to know about these new criteria, because literally millions of pounds worth of business is let out by British Rail, and there are opportunities for firms, for more jobs, for improving the service and for saving money for British Rail, of which I hope the whole of industry will avail itself.

Mr. Flannery: In view of the privisation of certain sections of the Health Service, where money is shamelessly being made out of the elderly and sick—and by some hon. Members — and when people are being put on the dole and work is not being done, can we be assured that any consideration of privatisation of the railway service will be abandoned?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman must not ask me about the Health Service. If private contractors can do work for or supply goods or services to British Rail that are cheaper and better, the hon. Gentleman, like every other hon. Member, should be pleased to hear about it.

Mr. Snape: Does the Secretary of State accept that for those skilled tradesmen who formerly worked in British Rail Engineering Ltd. at Shildon, Horwich, and some at Swindon, privatisation has meant only a one-way ticket to the dole queue? When will he get British Rail to invest in the skills of its work force and give us a railway that is similar to railways in the rest of the developed world instead of seeking to destroy it?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman is not right. BREL will always be able to tender for British Rail orders that are put out to competition. The main reason for the decline in the work force at BREL has been the high level of investment in British Rail rolling stock, which is of a superior quality and requires less maintenance.

Motor Insurance

7. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will report progress in preparing legislation to implement the second European Community directive on motor insurance requiring compulsory insurance for third party injury and property damage.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Michael Spicer): At the request of some organisations, we extended by six weeks the consultation deadline of 31 December. A number of points still have to be sorted out before we can bring considered proposals to the House for extending compulsory motor insurance to include third party property damage.
